"One minute, Mr. Cossey," he said, very quietly, for it was one of his peculiarities to become abnormally quiet in circumstances of real emergency, "and then I think that we may close this painful interview. When first I knew you I did not like you. Afterward, through various circumstances, I modified my opinion, and set my dislike down to prejudice. You are quite right in saying that I encouraged the idea of a marriage between you and my daughter, and also that I forbade the house to Col. Quaritch. I did so because, to be honest, I saw no other way of avoiding the utter ruin of my family; but perhaps I was wrong in so doing. I hope that you may never be placed in a position which will force you to such a decision. Also at the time, indeed never till this moment, have I quite realized how the matter really stood. I did not understand how strongly my daughter was attached in another direction, perhaps I was unwilling to understand it. Nor did I altogether understand the course of action by which it seems you obtained a promise of marriage from my daughter in the first instance. I was anxious for the marriage because I believed you to be a better man than you are, and because I thought that it would place my daughter and her descendants in a much improved position, and that she would in time become attached to you. I forbade Col. Quaritch the house because I thought that an alliance with him would be the most undesirable for everybody concerned. I find that in all this I was acting wrongly, and I frankly admit it. Perhaps as we grow old we grow worldly also, and you and your agents pressed me very hard, Mr. Cossey. Still I have always told you that my daughter was a free agent, and must decide for herself, and therefore I owe you no apology on that score. So much, then, for the question of your engagement to Miss de la Molle. It is done with. And now as regards the threats you make. I shall try to meet them as occasion arises, and if I cannot do so it will be my misfortune. But one thing they show me, though I am sorry to have to say it to any man in a house which I can still call my own—they show me that my first impressions of you were the correct ones. You are not a gentleman, Mr. Cossey, and I must beg to decline the honor of your further acquaintance," and with another bow he opened the vestibule door, and stood holding the handle in his hand.

Edward Cossey looked round with a stare of rage, and then, muttering one most comprehensive curse, he stalked from the room, and in another minute was driving fast through the ancient gateway.

Poor man! Let us pity him, for he also certainly got his full due.

George followed him to the outer door, and then he did a thing that nobody had seen him do before—he burst out into a loud laugh.

He burst out into a loud laugh.

"What are you making that noise about?" asked his master, sternly. "This is no laughing matter."

"Him!" replied George, pointing to the retreating dog cart; "he's a-going to pull down the castle and throw it into the moat and to send the plow over it, is he? Him—that varmint! Why, them old towers will be a-standing there when his beggarly bones is dust, and when his name ain't no more a name; and there'll be one of the old blood sitting in them, too. I knaw it, and I hev allus knawed it. Come, squire, though you allus du say how as I'm a rule, what did I tell yer? Didn't I tell yer that Providence weren't a-going to let this place go to any layers or bankers or thim sort. Why, of course I did. And now you see. Not but what it is all owing to the colonel. He was the man that found it, but then God Almighty taught him how to do it. But he's a good un, he is; and a gentleman, not like him;" and he once more pointed with unutterable scorn to the road down which Edward Cossey had vanished.

"Now look here," said the squire, "don't you stand talking here all day about things you don't understand. That's the way you waste time. You be off and look after this gold, it should not be left alone, you know. We will come down presently to Molehill, for I suppose that is where it is. No, I can't stop to hear the story now, and besides, I want Col. Quaritch to tell it to me."

"All right, squire," said George, touching his red night cap, "I'll be off;" and he started.

"George," hallooed his master after him, but George did not stop. He had a trick of deafness when the squire was calling and he wanted to go somewhere else.

"Confound you!" roared the old gentleman, "why don't you stop when I call you?"

This time George brought his long, lank frame to a standstill.

"Eh? pardon, squire."

"Beg pardon, yes—you're always begging pardon. Look here, you had better bring your wife and have dinner in the servants' hall today, and drink a glass of port."

"Thank you, squire," said George, again touching his red nightcap.

"And look here, George. Give me your hand, man. Here's a merry Christmas to you. We've gone through some queerish times about this place together, but now it almost looks as though we were going to end our days in peace and plenty."

"Same to you, squire, I'm sure—same to you," said George, pulling off his cap. "Yes, yes, we've had some bad years, what with poor Mr. James and that Quest and Cossey (he's the master varmint of the lot, he is), and the bad times, and the Moat farm and all; but, bless you, squire, now that there'll be some ready money and no debts, why, if I don't make out somehow so that you all get a good living out of the place, I'm a Dutchman. Yes, it's been a bad time, and we're getting old, but there, that's how it is, the sky almost allus clears toward nightfall. God Almighty has a mind to let one down easy, I suppose."

"If you would talk a little less about God Almighty, and come to church a little more, it would be a good thing, as I've told you before," said the squire; "but there, go along with you."

And the honest fellow went.

CHAPTER XLIII.

CHRISTMAS CHIMES.

The squire turned and entered the house. He generally was fairly noisy in his movements, but on this occasion he was exceptionally so. Possibly he had a reason for it.

On reaching the vestibule he found Harold and Ida standing side by side as though they were being drilled. It was impossible to resist the conclusion that they had suddenly assumed that attitude because it happened to be the first position into which they could conveniently fall.

There was a moment's silence, and then Harold took Ida's hand and led her up to where her father was standing.

"Mr. De la Molle," he said simply, "once more I ask you for your daughter in marriage. I am quite aware of my many disqualifications, especially those of my age and the smallness of my means; but Ida and myself hope and believe that, under all the circumstances, you will no longer withhold your consent," and he paused.

"Quaritch," answered the squire, "I have already in your presence told Mr. Cossey under what circumstances I was favorably inclined to his proposal, so I need not repeat all that. As regards your means, although they would have been quite insufficient to avert the ruin which threatened us, still you have, I believe, a competence, and, owing to your wonderful and most providential discovery, the fear of ruin seems to have passed away. It is owing to you that that discovery, which, by the way, I want to hear all about, has been made; had it not been for you it never would have been made at all, and therefore I certainly have no right to say anything more about your means. As regards your age—well, after all, 44 is not the limit of life; and if Ida does not object to marrying a man of those years, I cannot object to her doing so. With reference to your want of occupation, I think that if you marry Ida this place will, as times are, keep your hands pretty full, especially when you have an obstinate donkey like that fellow George to deal with—for I am getting too old and stupid to look after it myself; and, besides, things are so topsy turvy that I can't understand them. There is one thing more that I want to say; I forbade you the house. Well, you are a generous minded man, and it is human to err, and I think that perhaps you will understand my action and not bear me a grudge on that account. Also, I dare say that at the time—and possibly at other times—I said things that I should be sorry for if I could remember what they were, which I can't; and if so, I apologize to you as a gentleman should when he finds himself in the wrong. And now I say, God bless you both, and I hope you will be happy in life together; and so come here, Ida, my love, and give me a kiss. You have been a good daughter all your life, and so Quaritch may be sure that you will be a good wife too."

Ida did as she was bid, and then she went over to her lover and took his hand, and he kissed her on the forehead, and so, after all their troubles, they finally ratified the contract.

And we, who have followed them thus far, and have perhaps been a little moved with their struggles, hopes and fears, will not surely grudge to re-echo the squire's old fashioned prayer, "God bless them both."

God bless them both. Long may they live, and happily.

Long may they live, and for very long may their children's children of the race, if not of the name, of De la Molle, pass in and out through the old Norman gateway and past the sturdy Norman towers. The Boisseys, who built them, here had their habitation for six generations. The De la Molles, who wedded the heiress of the Boisseys, lived here for thirteen generations. May the Quaritches, whose ancestor married Ida, heiress of the De la Molles, endure as long!

Surely it is permitted to us to lift a corner of the curtain of futurity and to see, in spirit, Ida Quaritch, stately and beautiful, as we knew her, but of a happier countenance, seated, on some Christmas Eve to come, in the drawing room of the castle and telling to the children at her knees the wonderful tale of how their father and old George, on this very night, when the great gale blew, long years ago, discovered the ruddy pile of gold hoarded in that awful storehouse amid the bones of Saxon or Danish heroes, and thus saved her to be their mother. We can surely see the wide and wondering eyes and the fixed faces as for the tenth time they listen to a story before which the joys of Crusoe will grow pale, and hear the eager appeals for confirmation made to the military looking gentleman, very grizzled now, but grown better looking with the advancing years, who is standing warming himself before the fire, the best and most beloved husband and father in the whole country side.

Perhaps there may be a vacant chair and another tomb among the ranks of the departed De la Molles; perhaps the ancient walls will no longer echo to the sound of the old squire's stentorian voice. And what of that? It is our common lot.

But when he goes the country side will lose a man of whom they will not see the like again, for the breed is dead or dying; a man whose very prejudices, inconsistencies and occasional wrong headed violence will be held, when he is no longer here, to have been endearing qualities. And for manliness, for downright English, God fearing virtues, for love of queen, country, family and home, they may search in vain to find his equal among the thin blooded gentility of the cosmopolitan Englishmen of the dawning Twentieth century. His faults were many, and at one time he went near to sacrificing his daughter to save his house, but he would not have been the man he was without them.

And so to him, too, farewell. Perhaps he will find himself better placed in the Valhalla of his forefathers, surrounded by those stout old De la Molles whose memory he regarded with so much affection, than here in the Victorian era. For, as has been said elsewhere, the old squire would undoubtedly have looked better in a chain shirt and a battle ax than ever he did in a frock coat, especially with his retainer George armed to the teeth behind him.

They kissed, and it was done; and out from the church tower in the meadows broke with clash and clangor the glad sound of the Christmas bells. Out it swept over pitle and fallow, over grove and wood. It floated down the valley of the Ell, it beat against Dead Man's Mount (henceforth to the vulgar mind more haunted than ever), and echoed up the castle's Norman towers and down the oak clad vestibule. Away over the common went the glad message of Earth's Saviour, away high into the air, startling the rooks upon their airy courses, as though the iron notes of the world's rejoicing would fain float to the throned feet of the World's Everlasting King.

Peace and good will, ay, and happiness, to the children of men while their span is, and hope for the beyond, and Heaven's blessing on holy love and all good things that are. This was what those liquid notes seemed to say to the most happy pair who stood hand in hand in the vestibule and thought of all they had escaped and all that they had won.

And they went and looked at the chest brimful of red gold.

"Well, Quaritch, if you and Ida have quite done staring at each other, which isn't very interesting to a third party, perhaps you will not mind telling us how you happened on old Sir James de la Molle's hoard."

Thus adjured, Harold began his thrilling story, telling the whole history of the night in detail, and if his hearers had expected to be astonished, certainly their expectations were considerably more that fulfilled.

"Upon my word," said the squire when he had done, "I think I am beginning to grow superstitious in my old age. Hang me if I don't believe it was the finger of Providence itself that pointed out those letters to you. Any way, I'm off to see the spoil. Run and get your hat, Ida, my dear, and we will all go together."

And they went and looked at the chest brimful of red gold, yes, and passed down, all three of them, into those chill presences in the bowels of the mount, and, coming thence awed and silent, sealed up the place forever.

CONCLUSION

GOOD-BY.

On the following morning such inhabitants of Boisingham as happened to be about were much interested at seeing an ordinary farm tumbrel coming down the main street, and being driven, or rather led, by no less a person than George himself, while behind it walked the well known form of the old squire, arm in arm with Col. Quaritch.

They were still more interested, however, when the tumbrel drew up at the door of the bank—not Cossey's, but the opposition bank—where, although it was Boxing Day, the manager and the clerk were waiting, apparently, for its coming.

But their interest culminated when they perceived that the cart only contained a few flour sacks, and yet that each of these sacks seemed to require three or four men to lift it with any comfort.

Thus was the gold safely housed. Upon being weighed its value was found to be about £53,000 of modern money. As, however, some of the coins were exceedingly rare, and of great value to museums and collectors, this value was considerably increased, and the treasure was ultimately sold for £55,254. Only Ida kept back enough of the choicest coins to make a gold waistband or girdle and a necklace for herself, destined, no doubt, in future days to form the most cherished heirloom of the Quaritch family.

On that same evening the squire and Harold went to London and opened up communications with the solicitor to the treasury. Fortunately they were able to refer to the will of Sir Edward de la Molle, the second baronet, in which he specially devised to his cousin, Geoffrey Dofferleigh, and his heirs forever, not only his estates, but his lands, "together with the treasure hid thereon or elsewhere by my late murdered father, Sir James de la Molle." Also they produced the writing which Ida had found in the old Bible, and the parchment discovered by George among the coin. These three documents formed a chain of evidence which even officials interested for the treasury could not refuse to admit, and in the upshot the crown renounced its claims, and the property in the gold passed to the squire, subject to the payment of the same successson duty which he would have been called upon to meet had he inherited a like sum from a cousin at the present time.

And so it came to pass that when the mortgage money was due it was paid to the last farthing, capital and interest, and Edward Cossey lost his hold upon Honham forever.

As for Edward Cossey himself, we may say one more word about him. In due course of time he got over his violent passion for Ida sufficiently to allow him to make a brilliant marriage with the only daughter of an impecunious peer. She keeps her name and title and he plays the part of the necessary husband. Anyhow, my reader, if it is your glorious fortune to frequent the gilded saloons of the great, you may meet Lady Honoria Tallbit and Mr. Cossey. If you do meet him, however, it may be as well to avoid him, for the events of his life have not been of a nature to improve his temper. This much then of Edward Cossey.

If after leaving the gilded saloons aforesaid you should happen to wander down Piccadilly or the Strand, as the case may be, you may meet another character in this history. You may see a sweet, pale face, still stamped with a child like roundness and simplicity, but half hidden in the coarse hood of the nun. You may see her, and if you care to follow you may find what is the work wherein she seeks her peace. It would shock you; you would fly from it in horror; but in her work of mercy and loving kindness—and she does it unflinchingly—and among her fellow nuns there is no one more beloved than Sister Agnes. So good-by to her also.

Harold Quaritch and Ida were married in the spring, and the village children strewed the churchyard path—the same path where in anguish of soul they had met and parted on that dreary winter's night—with primroses and violets.

And there at the old church door, when the wreath is on her brow and the veil about her face, let us bid farewell to Ida and her husband, Harold Quaritch.

THE END.

The Bachelor Girl.

It is more or less fun in this world to be a girl. Even being a working girl, and a hard working girl at that, is not enough to rub off the bloom, providing she only takes things in a nice, manly sort of a way. Everything comes to him who waits, but he who waits gracefully and with pleasure has a deal more fun. Girls all wait for husbands, but the girls who sing—even the girls who whistle—while they wait, are just that much more attractive.

The bachelor girl ought always to bear one thing in mind. "It gives one a stiff neck and a wry face with wrinkles on it to look too long over one's shoulder." The bachelor girl who isn't absolutely averse to some day becoming a Benedict should keep her conscience, her liver and her forehead clear. "Get thy spindle and thy distaff ready, and God will send thee flax," says the old proverb. A revived edition might well read, "Get thy heart and thy life ready, and God will send thee a husband!"—Leslie's Newspaper.

MERIT DESERVES IT.

We are not in the habit of puffing up any patent medicine, but where merit deserves it we are always ready to notice the same particularly for the benefit of mankind. We have heard much of the fame of The Great Sierra Kidney and Liver Cure, but lately we have received positive proof of its healing qualities. A gentleman well known to us had suffered for years of kidney complaint. The Great Sierra Kidney and Liver Cure was recommended to him. He has given it a trial and now assures us that a wonderful change has come over him, and that he is entirely cured. Thanks to your great and scientific vegetable remedy.—Jewish Times and Observer, San Francisco, Cal.

SAN FRANCISCO, Jan. 7.

Sierra Chemical Co.:

GENTLEMEN:—I have used your Great Sierra Kidney and Liver Cure with wonderful satisfaction, and can recommend it fully for kidney and liver disorders.

HEALTH AND STRENGTH

Soon replace weakness and languor, if that reliable medicine, Hood's Sarsaparilla, is fairly and faithfully tried. It is the best medicine to keep the blood pure and to expel the germs of scrofula, salt rheum, and other poisons which cause so much suffering, and sooner or later undermine the general health. By its peculiar curative power, Hood's Sarsaparilla strengthens the system while it eradicates disease.

"We could not be without Hood's Sarsaparilla. It is the best medicine we ever kept in the house. My family are all taking it." MRS. J. M. BARBER, San Joaquin and Fremont Streets, Stockton, Cal.

INGENUITY OF THE AFFLICTED.

Painters Without Hands—The Tongue Not Necessary to Speech.

Few examples of human ingenuity are more interesting than the devices which have been employed by cripples to enable them to pursue some calling, and there are few subjects more interesting and curious than the means by which the deaf have heard what was passing around them, and the dumb have made themselves understood.

Passing over the well known case of Miss Biffin, who, though born without hands or arms, attained considerable eminence as a miniature painter, it may be noted that there are abundant instances recorded of persons who could not only write, but paint tolerably well, with their toes.

There was, for instance, at Cogges hall, in Essex, a man named Carter, who was so thoroughly paralyzed that he had quite lost the use of his hands, and was obliged to be on his back. He partly supported himself by his beautiful drawings, which he did with his mouth; and he could copy an old wood cut or plate so closely that it was difficult to distinguish it from the original.

Sir Charles Bell, too, tells us of a Russian beggar born without hands, who frequented the high road to Moscow, and committed many murders before he was discovered and executed. His method of work was peculiar. He used to throw himself against a person who was giving him alms, and, having stunned him, proceeded to seize him with his teeth, and so drag him into the wood. There are therefore many occupations which can be followed even if a person have no hands.

To prove that the tongue is not absolutely necessary for speech would be an easy matter, since there are many authentic cases of persons, who, having lost their tongues owing to some accident or operation, have yet managed to speak distinctly. But to convey thoughts without speech, to speak without words is another matter. Perhaps the most curious example of this form of ingenuity—either in fact or fiction—is the means by which the paralytic old Noirtier, in "Monte Cristo," was able to speak to anybody who understood his system. He, it will be remembered, had sight and hearing left to him, and he expressed approbation by closing his eyes, his refusal to any proposal by winking them several times, and if he had some desire or feeling to express he raised them to heaven. By this code, together with the aid of a dictionary so arranged that he could see a page as a finger was rapidly run down it, he contrived to hold converse on any subject.

After such examples of devices to supply the places of missing senses or members of the body as those we have mentioned, it would be indeed surprising if there were no natural way of overcoming the many disadvantages incidental to deafness. But as a matter of fact there is a method, and a very simple method, by which many deaf people can hear, and that, too, without artificial instruments. In "King John," Hubert says:

I saw a smith stand with his hammer, thus,
The whilst his iron did on the anvil cool,
With open mouth, swallowing a tailor's news.

Scott, too, has passages to the same effect, and we often hear of a particular person "swallowing it all in"—i. e., listening with his mouth wide open. Now, there is a sound physiological reason for opening the mouth under such circumstances. There are two opposite openings in the ear—namely, the external opening, which is known to all of us, and the internal opening, called the eustachian tube, which passes from the internal auditory organs to the back of the mouth, just where the nostrils open into it.

It therefore follows that a person who opens his mouth has a better chance of hearing than if he keeps it shut. In short, the inner opening is an auxiliary to the outer one. There is at least one case in which the latter opening alone has had to do service, as the following advertisement from a copy of The Daily Post of some thirty years ago will clearly show: "Missing on Sunday afternoon, a young man of weak intellect. The lobes of his ears are closed, but when spoken to he opens his mouth, and is then able to hear." It is clear, then, that the accidental destruction of one or more parts does not necessarily destroy the sense of hearing, provided that the injury does not reach the more essential part of mechanism, the brain.—London Tid-Bits.

Just His Way.

"There goes a singular man," observed a Woodward avenue grocer as an old gentleman passed out with a package under his arm.

"How singular?"

"He always begins business by asking if we have any strawberries. In season we say yes, and out of season we say no. If we have 'em he doesn't buy; if we don't have 'em he looks disappointed for a minute and then gives his order. His trade is worth $3,000 a year to me. I lost it once and had to apologize to him."

"How?"

"I had a smart aleck of a clerk who replied that we had no strawberries but lots of chestnuts, and the old man walked out as stiff as a ramrod. I apologized, discharged the clerk, and he returned. He's my strawberry as long as we use him well."—Detroit Free Press.

Ducks in China.

It is stated that there are more ducks in China than all the world outside of it. They are kept on every farm, on the private roads, and on all the lakes, rivers, and small streams. There are many boats on each of which as many as 2,000 are kept. Their eggs constitute one of the most important articles of food. They are hatched in establishments fitted up for the purpose. Some of them turn out as many as 50,000 young ducks every year. Salted and smoked ducks are sold in all the towns, and many of them are exported to countries where Chinamen reside.—Brooklyn Eagle

Russian Women in the Past.

In olden times the position of women in Russia was deplorable, and, as elsewhere, it has only improved by degrees. Herberstein declares that no woman was deemed virtuous unless she lived in domestic seclusion and was never seen outside home; and Jenkinson says that, except on their way to church at Christmas and Easter or when paying visits, it was an accident if you ever saw a Russian lady. This habit has survived more or less even to this century, for Bremner speaks of the women as "guarded with Oriental seclusion," and Theophile Gautier attests the same thing. So strong in the Sixteenth century was the prejudice against women that even fowls or animals killed by their hands were regarded as unclean; and often, if their husbands were absent, they might be seen standing at their doors and begging some passer-by to perform for them the butcher's office.

Not infrequently the murder of husbands avenged the maltreatment of wives; to meet which a law was ordained that for this crime women should be buried with their heads only above the ground, there to be left till they were starved to death. In olden days marriages were always arranged by intermediaries, and no one would have dreamed of conducting his own suit.

One of the most popular changes effected by Peter the Great was the regulation that no couple should be married without the consent of both parties, and that they should be allowed to meet for at least six weeks before marriage. The intending bridegroom sent his future wife such symbolical presents as needles and thread, raisins and fruit, and a whip.

On the wedding day there was always the show of resistance on the part of the bride so common everywhere; the bride would resist to the uttermost leaving her house to go to the church, and would sob and make a great noise all the way thither. In the church it was etiquette for her to fall down at her husband's feet, and to knock her head on his shoe in token of her subjection. It is said that for three days after marriage she risked her character if she spoke more than a few words at mealtime "with great manners and reverence" to her husband. It was customary for husbands to make their wives and daughters an allowance for paint, and so fond were the ladies of this mode of adornment that Jenkinson compared them to millers' wives who looked as if they had been beaten about the face with bags of meal.—The Gentleman's Magazine.

Fattening Terrapin.

Col. Tilghman and Mr. M T. Goldsborough are largely engaged in the propagation of terrapin, and have about 3,000 confined in a pond, where they are fed and prepared for market. In winter they lie dormant and do not eat at all, but in summer time they seem to have ravenous appetites. The principal food given them is hard crabs, and it takes about 500 to 600 crabs a day to feed them. The crabs are put into a large hopper alive and back led to pieces in passing through the machinery. They are then thrown into the pond for the terrapin, which are so eager to get at their food that they climb up over the backs of each other.

The terrapin have learned to know what the noise of the hackling machine means, and as soon as it commences to run they begin to gather around and show signs of impatience until their food is given them.—Baltimore Sun.

An Unlucky Day in Mexico.

Tuesday is the unlucky day in Mexico. The popular sentiment concerning it is embodied, as is the case with Mexican proverbs and terse sayings generally, in a jingle:

En Martes ni te cases, ni te embarques,
Ni de tu casa te apartes.

Which, rendered literally, means: On Tuesday, neither be thou married, nor go forth (begin, start, enter upon), nor separate thyself from thy house. Belief in the ill luck of Tuesday is a Spanish superstition, reference to which is found in a letter written by Fray Juan de Zumarraga some years before he left Spain for Mexico. Possibly it is a native Mexican superstition, also—though a sufficient reason for its prompt acceptance by the Mexicans, perhaps, is to be found in the fact that on a Tuesday (Aug. 13, 1521) was completed the conquest of the capital city of Tenochtitlan, or Mexico.—Scribner's.

What London Says of Us.

Republican simplicity seems to be fast disappearing from Washington society, where, as I learn from one of the journals of that capital, "the seating of guests at official dinners, at which the court rules of precedence are obligatory, is a matter of nice exactness." In cases where desperately knotty points present themselves, it seems the dinner list is sent to the White House to be "diagrammed." The diagrammer, who is the authority on all these grave points of precedence, is a certain Mr. Pruden, one of the White House secretaries. He must have some trouble, since, as my journal informs me, "the ranking of the diplomat is still an unsettled question," and it is earnestly urged that this vexed question should be promptly settled once for all by an act of congress.—London Truth.

Mrs. Langtry's Furniture.

Mrs. Langtry's hobby is fine furniture. Her dressing is simple enough off the stage. She likes tailor made costumes, rich but simple, and not particularly expensive, but her home is a home of artistic design and taste. It is full of all sorts of little objects of beauty, refinement and expense. Pottery of all sorts and of all nations is scattered about, glassware is abundant and pictures are everywhere. The furniture is not simply for show, but for beauty and ease, and Mrs. Langtry never comes to New York that she doesn't at least pass a couple of days in visiting the principal furniture warehouses and choosing some new things for her house on Twenty third street.—New York Journal.

GIRL AND GOLD.

It Is Sometimes the One and Sometimes the Other That Makes Jewelry Crock.

Every jeweler has doubtless met with many curious incidents in his business career, but I think that an experience of mine is worth relating. Shortly after the holidays there came into my place a pleasant mannered young man who expressed a desire to look at some gold necklaces. It is needless to say that I sold him one. It was 14 carats and very pretty. Two days later the door was flung open and in rushed the same young man, boiling with rage. He threw the necklace on the counter, demanded the return of his money, and threatened to expose me as a swindler. It took half an hour to learn his story.

It seems that after presenting the necklace to his lady love he had taken her to a reception ornamented with his present. After the first dance there was a commotion in one corner of the room, and the rivals of our customer's best girl were tittering among themselves and whispering about her.

The young lady looked in the glass and almost fainted at the sight. Her beautiful neck was almost black from the friction of the necklace. She changed her mind about fainting, returned home with her brother, and sent the necklace back to her young man with a note that she did not like his brass.

I tested the necklace in his presence, and proved to him that it was full 14 carats. About that time a young physician called to purchase a scarf pin. He had overheard part of the story and asked to hear the balance, as he believed he could throw some light on the subject. Pretty soon he laughed outright and said: "Why, sir, the trouble is with your girl and not the necklace. She has too much sulphur, iron, mercury, salt or acid in her blood, and as any of these substances has an affinity for gold the explanation is clear. I have patients for whom mercurial medicines have been prescribed, and the result is that their fingers upon which rings are worn discolor at once." My customer cooled off and carried his purchase away.

In connection with this subject a good story is told at the expense of a Maiden Lane dealer. He gave his sister an 18 carat ring as a present. He is a practical joker, and she asked him if the ring was gold. He replied that it was. That evening the young lady had occasion to remove the ring from her finger, and she noticed that the skin was greatly discolored. "Jim has carried his jokes too far," she exclaimed, and opening the window threw the trinket into the street; some gamin picked it up. When my friend learned of it he came to me for consolation, and I explained my own experience. His sister is sorry for her haste.

"All is not gold that glitters," nor is everything brass that discolors. A person wearing a 14 carat ring on one finger and a 10 carat on another may have noticed that the finger with the higher carat will be discolored and the other one not. The reason is that the ring of the lower carat fits snugly, and the other is rather loose, thus causing a friction.—Jeweler's Weekly.

Where Men Lose Their Nerve.

Did you ever notice the conduct of a man who is forced by circumstances to enter a fashionable millinery store unaccompanied by a female body guard? If not, it will be found entertaining.

His fellow men will pity him, but the women will laugh at him. It is one of the few positions in which masculinity is wholly at the mercy of the fair sex. Said a well known Fifth avenue milliner the other day:

"It may appear incredible, but I have seen men—men who have led in battle, who habitually mount the rostrum, who pass their lives in constant friction with their fellows, or who enjoy a reputation as favorites among women in society—enter this place alone to execute commissions for their wives, and fall suddenly into the condition of great, bashful, overgrown school boys when called upon to face the girls and 'speak a piece.'

"Why is it? That's a metaphysical problem. But there is always something in the atmosphere of a place devoted exclusively to the labor and personal adornment of women which painfully disconcerts a man unless he is attended by his wife, and even then he is by no means at his ease. As an instance of this, a gentleman of acknowledged nerve and prominent in national politics came in here recently to order a bonnet for his wife, to be sent home on approval. Before he left I was really sorry for him. A number of ladies were trying on hats, and he became so nervous that I firmly believe he didn't know the colors or the price of the bonnet he selected. He kept fidgeting and glancing about him like a thief, and when his business was concluded made a dash for the door without leaving the address, so I had to call him back. I shouldn't wonder if he took a drink to steady himself when he got outside.

"It's a queer thing, isn't it?"—New York Star.

Respect for he Dead.

One of Governor Hoard's good stories is that of an old Dutchman who married two days after the burial of his first wife. A charivari was in order, and after the demonstration had continued for some time the Dutchman appeared at the door and said: "Don't you know there vas a one funeral in dos house only two days ago? Of you hef no respect for me you should for the dead." Mr. Hoard thought this a case of monumental gall.—Chicago Herald.

A new automatic magazine rifle, invented by R. Dewhurst and H. A. Pitcher, has been brought out at Neillsville, Wis., where it is making quite a sensation. Like the Maxim gun, the cartridges may be fired singly, by pulling the trigger for each desired discharge, or the gun may be set so as to fire itself off, with great rapidity, until all the cartridges in the magazine are used.—Scientific American.

Morphy Beat Satan.

In the autumn of 1861, Morphy, then on his way to the Confederate army near Manassas, was invited by the Rev. R. R. Harrison, of Richmond, to spend the evening with a number of other distinguished guests at his residence. After supper, while they were assembled in the parlors, attention was called to a colored engraving entitled "Jen d'Echecs," which was hanging in the room. It represented Satan, in style and dress after the German idea of Mephistopheles, engaged in a game of chess with a young man. The board lay on a tomb, and the guardian angel of the youth looked down with deep sadness and interest upon the position of the pieces on the board. The young man's pieces represented the manly virtues, and many of them had already been captured. Satan's pieces represented the tempting vices. The position of the pieces as shown in the engraving was one that had often been studied with care by the Richmond players, and the young man's game was regarded as hopeless. The position was set up in Morphy's presence, and he asked if the position was correct. After careful comparision of the position on the board and in the engraving, he was answered in the affirmative. Morphy then remarked, in his quiet but always dignified manner, that he believed he could take the young man's position and win the game. All those who knew anything of chess expressed surprise, but Morphy vindicated his belief in a short time. He took the young man's game and played against each gentleman in succession and won. The devil had no chance against the genius of Paul Morphy.—New Orleans Picayune.

Suggestive Hypnotism.

A lady boarded car 212, of the Franklin avenue line, recently, and sat directly opposite the stove. A gentleman was with her. After riding a block she told her escort that the heat of the car was unbearable and at her suggestion they moved nearer to the door. A passenger soon got on and the conductor coming in to collect his fare she asked him to open a ventilator. He did so, politely. Soon the lady rapped on the door with her umbrella.

"Please turn the damper in the stove!" said she.

"Certainly, madam," said the conductor, and the damper was turned.

In a few minutes the lady began fanning herself vigorously with a hymn book, and remarked that "Conductors didn't seem to have any judgment about heating cars."

At this juncture the conductor reentered the car for another fare and the lady said with asperity:

"Conductor, I wish you would leave that door open. The heat from that stove is positively depressing."

"I am sorry to say, madam, but there has been no fire in that stove today," said the conductor, and the thermometer instantly fell twenty degrees.—Brooklyn Eagle.

Sending a Shock.

Among certain eastern nations the Englishman is supposed, from the success with which he uses certain simple remedies, to be endowed with magic powers, as a "medicine man." It is not only the people classed as uncivilized, however, who regard medicine as a black art, which can do anything.

A woman recently visited the office of a physician who has become celebrated for his successful use of electricity in various diseases and inquired:

"If anybody had headaches in the back of their neck, and was so nervous they could fly, do you think your batteries would help 'em?"

"I might recommend electricity," said the doctor; "but I must know more about your symptoms."

"Bless you, they aren't my symptoms!"

"Then come another day with the patient."

"But I can't bring her."

"Why not?"

"Because she lives out west. I know you can telegraph that far, and I thought maybe you could set your batteries to work on her."—Youth's Companion.

Old Wines in Savannah.

Some of the oldest families here have Madeira nearly a century old. One gentleman has several lots of the famous All Saints' Madeira, imported in 1791 and 1793, the year of the great fire in Savannah. Two pipes imported that year, one for the great-grandfather of the late William Gibbons and one for the father of Nat Heyward, a prominent South Carolina planter. The night of the fire one pipe was left under the bluff by mistake, and the other was burned upon the bay. The pipe under the bluff was divided between Gibbons and Heyward as the only fair way of settling their loss. The gentleman who now has several lots of the wine bought it from Gibbons' and Heyward's descendants eighty years after its division. Then there is the famous Hunter wine, imported about the same time. Some of it is still in the hands of friends of the family. The late Mr. De Renne, who inherited some of this wine, was often offered $100 a bottle for it. One gentleman has over twenty lots imported from the old Madeira house of Newton Gordon from 1802 to 1830. Savannah was a large wine importing port a century ago.—Savannah (Ga.) News.

Notes About a Rich Man.

John Wanamaker is playfully spoken of as John Moneymaker in Philadelphia, but his life is not all devoted to the accumulation of wealth. Here are some authentic notes about him. His country place at Jenkintown is the apple of one of his eyes. His flowers, his cattle, and the beautifying of the place absorb him as completely when out of town as business does at the store. He entertains liberally, and there is a hail fellow freedom and jollity about him that are contagious. He has a splendid collection of roses and orchids, and his rhododendrons are famous in the neighborhood.—Pittsburg Bulletin.

THE TAILOR'S COMMENT.

He Has to Credit His Customers to Keep the Trade, Which Is Hard to Get.

"Fine custom tailoring is not what it used to be," said a Brooklyn man in the business to an Eagle reporter, "and the big houses are just driving us to the wall. I suppose it is the same in everything else, but, of course, you know our trade is the first to suffer from competition of that kind."

"How is that?"

"I am surprised that you ask me such a question," replied the tailor, slightly elevating his eyebrows, "when you should know, if you do not, that we must get a large profit on a custom made suit of clothes to make any money. Why? Because there has been an unwritten law from time immemorial which allows a man to pay his taitor's bill last of all. Now, a person can't get credit to any amount in one of the big establishments. If he orders a suit at such a place he must leave a deposit, and the balance is demanded when the clothes are delivered. On the other hand, a tailor who has a small shop must cater to his customers by allowing credit. Now, in these times of sharp competition, high rents and heavy expenses for skilled labor, you will see that it takes the profit upon a great many suits of clothes to pay running expenses and lay up something for dull times. When there was less competition we could get along, but now, beside the big establishments where they can get up a suit of clothes for almost nothing, there are innumerable shops where they sell fashionable looking clothes—imitations of the clothes we keep, of course—for just about half the money we can sell the real goods for. In former years, the fine custom tailors and the ready made stores monopolized the business. Neither interfered with the trade of the other, and consequently we had a certain hold on our customers, who, in order to get new clothes of us, would pay their bills rather than be forced into buying ready made garments. Now they leave our bills unpaid and go to one of the cheap custom stores, pay cash for inferior goods, and then come back and tell us how exorbitant our prices are. Why, it's enough to drive a man crazy sometimes. Yes, the better class of small tailoring shops are being driven out of business, and it's too bad, for the establishments that are driving them out are doing a much inferior kind of work. The great object with them is to make up and sell fashionable goods at a low figure. Now, I will not say that the material they use is all shoddy—far from it. It is surprising for what a small sum they can sell really good clothes. How do they do it? Well, in the first place, they rely to a great degree upon transient trade. Secondly, the credit system is tabooed and they get cash for their goods. Thirdly, they pay the lowest wages possible to their help. Fourthly, they do not pretend to put the finish on their goods that a first class tailor does. A man argues in this way when he patronizes one of these shops: He says to himself: 'I have been paying $16 for trousers, while here is a man who says he can get me up a pair equally good for $8. I know that he can't do it, but I also know that for fit and appearance his $8 trousers will for a considerable time be as good as my $16 pair, consequently I will buy the $8 ones and when they are worn out I can get another pair, paying for both pairs what I would ordinarily pay for one.' Now, you see, if his argument is a good one he would be very foolish if he did not take advantage of the cheaper man. After all," concluded the tailor, sighing, "if it weren't that we were expected to give such long credit I don't know that we would be any worse off than our neighbors. That is what is killing us."—Brooklyn Eagle.

Natural Gas in Indiana.

Some idea of the vast importance of the natural gas interests of Indiana may be gained from a study of the report recently made by the state geologist. He has been collecting all the information he could possibly get concerning the subject, and from the results of his investigation we learn that the gas area of Indiana is 165 miles in length by 65 miles in width; altogether there are 381 paying wells in the district. The entire flow of gas is placed at 600,000,000 feet of which, it is calculated, something like 1,000,000 feet go to waste. The average flow of gas from each well is stated as being about 150,000 feet. The report further mentions the fact that during the past two years seventy-nine manufactories have located in Indiana, simply and solely because of the fact that they could obtain this fuel. Their combined capital is stated, in Fire and Water, as reaching $4,500,000, and it is said that they will employ 5,800 men.—Scientific American.

Why.

It is a pity that some people are not so quick with their hands as they are with their tongues. A farmer once had a very lazy helper. One day he returned from market and found his man sound asleep under a tree.

"What!" exclaimed the farmer, "asleep when you should be at work? You are an idle wretch, and not worthy that the sun should shine upon you?"

"I know it; I know it," said the man, sitting up and yawning, "and that's the reason I lay down here in the shade!"—Youth's Companion.

The recipe for making the original eau de cologne was discovered 200 years ago, and since that time it has been intrusted to only ten persons. The written copy of the recipe is kept in a crystal goblet, under triple locks, in a room in which the essential oils are mixed.

Dangerous Laconism.

Man, in awful hurry, looks in elevator door—"Up?" Boy, calmly—"Down." Man flies upstairs, five floors, three steps at a time, elevator passes him on second floor. Man recovers breath and lies in wait. "Whammade jutemme yous goin down for?" Boy, still calm—"Didn't thought you asked me if I was up, and I said I was down."—Bob Burdette.

TOO POLITE

He was a very courteous man,
With manners perfect quite;
No one was ever more urbane,
Or could be more polite.

To hear him murmur, "Thank you, sir!"
Was really quite a treat;
To see him bow, with inborn grace,
Was happiness complete.

But though a man be most polite,
Some time he's sure to slip
From grace, and once a cruel fate
Made even this one trip.

For one day a sweet girl said "Yes"
(How strange are Cupid's pranks!)
And then he lost her, once for all,
Because he murmured, "Thanks!"
—Somerville Journal.

Gauged by Moisture.

'I can tell you how large an audience there is in the house any evening without looking," said the leader of a Broadway theatre orchestra the other day.

"How?" interrupted a reporter.

"My violin bow tells the tale. When the house is full the moisture coming from the audience lessens the tension of the hairs on the bow, and I am compelled to tighten them many times during an evening. If the air is dry, of course, this is avoided. You have no idea how the sound of a violin is affected by the weather. Damp atmosphere will loosen and flatten the strings, and the result is a screeching sound from the instrument. The body of the instrument is also affected by the atmosphere. Moisture gets into the wood and the violin gives forth an unnatural tone. The moisture thus lowers the pitch, and it is exceedingly difficult to keep the instrument rightly tuned on a damp evening. The wind instruments are affected in an opposite way. Dampness contracts the metal, and the result is a higher pitch. It frequently happens that there is a difference of an entire note between the wind and string instruments in playing a selection."—New York Star.

The Business of the Living.

Edmund Burke once said, referring to the American colonies then in revolt against England, that he did not know how to indict a nation. It would be even more difficult to impeach a century. Each age has its own individuality. Some are bad, some are good; but most are neither wholly bad, nor wholly good, but like Mohammed's coffin, hung between heaven and earth. Even the Eighteenth century, of which Carlyle said, "it blew its own brains out in the French revolution," did some noble things before it committed suicide. It gave birth to this republic.

The truth is that the charge of insanity cannot be brought against any age, as a whole. A writ de lunatico inquirendo will not apply. All the same, the children of an age have it laid upon them as a sacred duty to discover and kill out of it the characteristic evils. The Nineteenth century embodies infinite nobility; but it has its foibles, its self-indulgencies of feelings and conduct, and its gigantic iniquities. It is the business of those now living to right these wrongs. Each generation should weed its own garden. Bequeath flowers to the future, not weeds.—St. Louis Republic

Gerome on Modern Art.

The famous French artist, Gerome, contributes the following to an article on himself in The Century: "You ask me about my method of teaching. It is very simple, but this simplicity is the result of long experience. The question is to lead young people into a straightforward, true path; to provide them with a compass which will keep them from going astray; to habituate them to love nature (the true), and to regard it with an eye at once intelligent, delicate and firm, being mindful also of the plastic side. Some know how to copy a thing and will reproduce it almost exactly; others put into it poetry, charm, power and make of it a work of art. The first are workmen; the second are artists. An abyss separates the mason from the architect.

"Today, in this epoch of moral and intellectual disorder, there seems to be a sovereign contempt for those who seek to elevate themselves, to move the spectator, to have some imagination; for those who are not content to remain fettered to the earth, dabbling in the mud of realism. It is today the fashion to which all the world sacrifices, because it is only granted to a few to have a well balanced mind, and because it is easier to paint three fried eggs than to execute the ceiling of the Sistine chapel.

"But all this will pass like a shadowy phantom and it need not make us uneasy."

Cause of His Sleeplessness.

It now appears that Count Herbert Bismarck was on the eve of being engaged to an English lady who shares the friendship of the Princess of Wales, when his cruel papa forbade the banns. What a lucky escape for the girl! The Bismarckian husband must be a species of Grand Turk and the Thirteenth century savage, from all accounts. Bismarck himself, contrary to every domestic precedent, rules Mrs. Bis, and won't allow her to read as much as a newspaper in which the word progress or woman's rights appears. No wonder he is troubled with insomnia.—Boston Herald.

The Marriageable Age.

A Hungarian statistician has been investigating the results derived from marriage at different ages. He collected data in 30,000 cases, and after careful study announces that the children of mothers under 20 and fathers under 24 are liable to have weakly constitutions. The healthiest children are those of fathers from 25 to 40 and mothers from 20 to 30. The best marriages are those where the husband is the wife's senior. A man from 30 to 40 should take a wife from 20 to 30. The vitality of the children of a mother five years older than the father would be seriously impaired.—San Francisco Chronicle.

Domestic Animals of Ancient Peruvians.

Herr Nehring, speaking of the domestic animals of the ancient Peruvians, observed that the subject was scientifically important, because all the other peoples of ancient America were very poor in this kind of property as compared with the Peruvians and Bolivians and some of the Central American peoples; and, secondly, because the influence of domestication on the formation of races could be better followed on these animals than on those of the Old World. We are concerned in Peru especially with the dog, llama, alpaca, and guinea pig. The speaker had examined eighteen dog mummies from ancient Peruvian graves, and had determined that they belonged to three different races—a shepherd's dog, a dachshund, and a bull dog or pug. He believed that the "Inca dog" was derived, not from South American Canidæ, but from the Mexican wolf (Lupus occidentalis), perhaps through the feebler Texan variety; and that several races had been formed from it in Peru through domestication. In this Herr Nehring dissents from and contradicts Von Tschudi's opinion that the varities had arisen from crossing with European dogs. As the dog and likewise the llama and alpaca are undoubtedly of America, so, also, in the speaker's opinion, is the guinea pig, notwithstanding B. Hensel and other authors believe that it was introduced from Europe.—Popular Science Monthly.

A New Industry in Russia.

The St. Petersburg correspondent of The North British Mail says that during the last few months a new industry has sprung up in Russia in the form of nicotine extract. This product not only finds a sale in Russia, but is already exported in considerable quantities, especially to South America. The lees obtained, when preparing the tobacco leaf, have been used for a long time for destroying parasites on plants, and they have also been found efficacious when applied as an antidote to the various skin diseases to which sheep are liable. It has now, however, been discovered that this product affords a remedy for another destructive agent—namely: the dry rot among sheep—and last autumn the Russian firm of Nikolai, Bogdanow & Co. started works in Moscow for the production of nicotine extract on a large scale. Four to five poods of common Machorka tobacco yield only about one pood of the extract, but in such a concentrated form that a teaspoonful is sufficient for nearly two pints of water, and the works produce about 50 poods of the extract per diem. The Russian government has decided to exempt this product from excise duty. Any other uses to which this nicotine may be applied, although not difficult to imagine, have not yet transpired.

Look Out for Short Bills.

A local business man has lately been twice made the victim of a fraud that is not common among crooks in the "green." On presenting money at the bank for deposit, he has had $5 bills returned as worthless because they were too short.

On examination it was found that a section from one-half of an inch to one inch in width had been cut out of the bills, and that the remaining sections had been pasted together. The illusion was increased in a way that its very simplicity was doubtless the reason of its success.

The letters taken from the words "United States" by the section cut out were crudely reprinted with pen and ink on the shortened greenback, and in the majority of cases the holder would not detect the fraud unless the bill were measured or held up to the light, when the junction of the two parts could be plainly seen.

The bills thus mutilated had had in one case the letters "ted" removed, and in the others the letters "st." The object of the operator is finally to get enough sections to make a new $5 bill, which by skillful pasting could be easily passed under ordinary circumstances.—Springfield Republican.

Emma Abbott's Husband.

The late Eugene Irving Wetherell, the husband of Emma Abbott, first saw the singer when, as the traveling salesman of a drug firm, he was forced to spend a night in a country town, and went to the school house to hear a musical entertainment. The principal performer was Miss Abbott, who was working her way to New York to obtain a musical education. She sold her magnificent head of hair to meet first expenses, and then with her father, the keeper of a small music store at Peoria, Ills., started for the metropolis, giving concerts on the way, wherever opportunity offered. Mr. Wetherell afterward met Miss Abbott when she was singing in Rev. Dr. Chapin's church in New York, and so interested some rich men in her that they sent her to Europe, where she afterward became the protege of the Baroness Rothschild. The couple were married in London fifteen years ago, and when Miss Abbott returned to this country Wetherell became her business manager. He was most honorable in all his transactions, and met with great financial success. He left a fortune estimated at over $1,000,000.—Chicago Herald.

A Grain Problem.

St. Paul grain men have been vexing their souls over a problem touching a grain bin and its contents, the solution of which has dawned upon not a few of them. It is this: Given a bin; dump into it, separately, five distinct qualities of wheat, for instance; open the spout at the bottom and the query is: "Which layer of wheat comes out first?" The uninitiated say at once, with few exceptions: "The first layer at the bottom, of course!" W. A. Van Slyke was determined to get at the facts, and watched the bin with his eagle eye very closely the other day, after having caused a layer of barley to be placed on top of several layers of different kinds of wheat. The spout was opened and the barley came rushing out first.—St. Paul Pioneer Press.

County Official Paper.

There would be no idle talk about Nevada being returned to the condition of a Territory if the resources of the State were better known. Among the mountain ranges that extend over Nevada there are many valleys having areas ranging from a few hundred up to thousands of acres. In most of these valleys the soil is exceedingly fertile and the climate delightful. Nowhere else in the United States could better homes be made than in these valleys and there is room enough in them for hundreds of thousands of people. Such men as settled the territory east of the Allegheny mountains and cleared the vast forests that covered so much of that territory, could go into these valleys of Nevada and in ten years make lovelier homes and far more valuable properties than they and their descendents have been able to make in many generations. These statements are deliberately made and are entirely true. The best service the leading men of Nevada can do for their State is to promote the settlement of these valleys. There are resources that can never be worked out like mines, but will continue to increase in value with time.

In the Sixth Congressional District the nomination of a Republican candidate is equivalent to an election. No other District in the State has more important interests to be served in Congress than this. Inyo County is directly interested in the improvement of San Pedro harbor and of other harbors on the Coast. The irrigation question, also, is of vast importance to Inyo. To promote those interests only a man of energy, pluck, tact, perserverance and great knowledge will be of any service to the District in Congress. For several years past the Sixth District has been almost totally ignored by Congress; not a single one of the great interests of the District that needs Congressional aid has received assistance there. This was not from lack of effort on the part of our representatives in Congress, but the failure of all such efforts to secure aid shows clearly enough the need of sending as our representative the ablest man that can be found in the District. It would be a great injustice to the whole District to confer the nomination upon any man by way of compliment unless he has also all the qualities needed to make an efficient representative. For the same reason geographical boundaries should be ignored and the ablest man in the District be nominated no matter where he happens to have his home.

SPEED PROGRAMME.

TUESDAY.

RUNNING—½ mile dash for untried horses. Purse, $75.
TROTTING—½ and repeat, for 2 year-olds. Purse, $100.

WEDNESDAY.

TROTTING—2 in 3, mile heats, for stallions owned in district. Purse, $150.
RUNNING—½ mile and repeat for saddle horses Purse, $75.

THURSDAY.

RUNNING—2 in 3, mile heats. Free for all horses owned in district. Purse, $150.
TROTTING—2 in 3 mile heats, for double team. Purse, $100.

FRIDAY.

RUNNING—½ mile dash, free for all owned in district. Purse, $100.
TROTTING—2 in 3, mile heats. Free for all owned in district. Purse, $150.
RUNNING—1 mile, for Indian horses. No entrance fee. Purse, $25.

RULES.

In all the above races 3 or more to enter, 2 or more to start. Entrance fee, 10 per cent. of purse.

All entries to be made with the Secretary on or before 12 o'clock m. of the day preceding the race.

California State Agricultural Society Rules to govern running races. National Trotting Association Rules to govern trotting races.

In all exhibits of animals for premiums, other things being equal, blooded stock will be preferred.

All articles included in the above list, except the first department, to be on exhibition at the Pavilion on second day and remain during the Fair.

Special premiums will be allowed for articles exhibited not included in above list.

If you have entries to make, attend to it at once, and when your entries are made, see to it that they are on time and at place for examination by the committee.

Accept no rumors in regard to the business of the exhibition. If you do not know what to do, inquire of the officers whose duty it is to tell you. One half of the trouble and disappointment at the Fair is caused by relying on hearsay. Attend to your business yourself. If it is done wrong you know where the blame lies.

Read the rules, and, by example, at least, assist in enforcing them; but don't forget that mistakes will occur where many people are congregated. The Board endeavors to do justice to all.

If the Superintendents and Committeemen are not always ready at the appointed hour, keep your stock and articles where you can command them at any time. Remember that we have but little time to do much business; patience, with a little system, will overcome many obstacles.

The Board will give the same special attention to details that has contributed to success in the past. It remains for the exhibitors to achieve still better results for the Fair of 1890.

ADMISSION.

Life Membership	$50 00
Membership ticket, admitting member, wife and minor children	5 00

BORN.

SALIZAR—At Lone Pine, July 23d, to Mr. and Mrs. C. Salizar, a son.

OLIVAS—At Lone Pine, July 25th, to Mr. and Mrs. J. Olivas, a daughter.

NICKERSON—At Keeler, July 26th, to Mr. and Mrs. R. B. Nickerson, a son.

Ed Walker came from Olancha last Monday. His stay in town was short.

A new road is to be made from Alvord northward. This is much needed by the settlers.

Mrs. Hannah Pitman came down from Mound House on Wednesday and is visiting with Mrs. Eldred.

Mr. Mike Lasky arrived at Lone Pine recently from San Francisco; he was at Independence yesterday.

A strike of ore is reported in the Defiance mine at Darwin. No particulars are given of the extent of the body.

Mr. Frank Fitzgerald and Mrs. Fitzgerald arrived in Los Angeles last Saturday. They went by sea from San Francisco and had a pleasant trip.

Mr Lowell Engley came down from Big Pine on Wednesday to meet some of his college class motes who are on a tour among the mountains.

Last Friday morning Charles Barlow was caught by a belt in a mill at Candelaria and instantly killed. Deceased was aged 18 years. His mother is a widow and lives at Hawthorne.

A. R. Conklin, T. C. Boland and S. G. Sneden left on the north bound train Thursday morning for San Francisco. They are delegates from Inyo to the Republican State Convention.

The date for holding the Republican County Convention has been changed from September 16th to September 11th. The change was made in order not to interfere with the Mexican celebration.

W. S. Enos lost a fine jack last week, which was valued at fifteen hundred dollars. It swelled up about the breast and neck and appeared to suffocate. It is surmised that this animal and others have died of poison, the virus being communicated by flies that had been upon carrion.

Nat Randall came in from Cerro Gordo last Sunday. Nat has been in Cerro Gordo twenty-one years. He was one of the first men there when ore was first struck and has stayed with the camp ever since. This was the first time in eleven years that he had been to Independence.

Mr. P. W. Forbes gives notice that he will ask the Democratic nomination for District Attorney. Mr. Forbes has already served one term in the same office. He aimed always at a faithful discharge of his official duties, was courteous and obliging, and made a good officer.

J. E. Shepherd gives notice that he will be a candidate for the Democratic nomination for County Clerk. Mr. Shepherd needs no introduction to the people of Inyo County. From childhood he has lived in Owens Valley and is well and favorably known. He is competent and would make an efficient officer.

The Carson and Colorado Railroad Company offer round trip tickets to Carson and back for $19 25. These tickets are for the benefit of parties who may want to attend the Chautauqua meeting at Lake Tahoe. The tickets will be good to and including Sept. 1st. From Carson to Lake Tahoe, $3 00; board, $1.00 a day; lodging, 25 cts. to 50 cts. a night.

Last Tuesday morning Captain Brunson began shipping marble from the quarry to San Francisco. All the cars that can be hauled in each train will be loaded and sent on for an indefinite time. Most of the marble now going out is of the yellow variety for the Mills building. The force of men employed at the quarry will be further increased.

Last Saturday Mr. and Mrs. J. C. Irwin and their daughter Nettie, Mr. and Mrs. J. C. Roeper and the Misses Nettie, Rosie and Effie Roeper, J. Willett and W. F. Matlack left town on a trip to Monache and the Whitney country. It was like a small army beginning; a march when the party started all on horseback and a long train of pack animals loaded with supplies and equipage.

The Fair Directors met last Tuesday. The Constitution of the association was amended by striking out from Section 10 a provision for Directors being represented by proxy. The Attorney General gave a written opinion some time ago that proxies were not legal and the amendment was made accordingly. A bill of six dollars was allowed for advertising. The Secretary was instructed to solicit subscriptions in aid of the Fair, and the Board adjourned subject to call by the President.

Last Tuesday night a party of Indians went to a saloon kept by a man named Cox at Fresno Flats. They demanded whiskey but he refused to let them have it and drove them out of his place. The same evening they waylaid Cox and nearly beat him to death; his skull was broken and he is not expected to live. A party of whites went to the place as soon as the alarm was given and one Indian was fatally shot. Murder is sure to be the result of letting Indians have whiskey.

Sylvania.

J. J. Gunn and Arthur Smith got back from Sylvania last Saturday. Mr. Gunn says that he found much more ore in sight than he expected. The Climax and Liberal mines held under bond by Mr. Fyfe show up large ore bodies and in the opinion of Mr. Gunn give plenty of evidence of being good mines. The Hazel Green, State Line, Buser and Great Western mines are owned by Buser and Son. Less work has been done on any of these mines than on the two first named but all of them are good prospects. Mr. Gunn was at Eureka, Nevada during all the palmy days of that big camp and he is of the opinion that Sylvania gives good promise of proving quite as rich. Mr. Kincaid, the owner of the Liberal and Climax mines, has given extension of time until August 14th for Mr. Fyfe to pay up the balance of the purchase price. The latter appears to have had no difficulty in getting the necessary capital and is going ahead with work at the camp.

SUPERVISORS' PROCEEDINGS.

Indian Fight.

Under-Sheriff Yaney came back to Independence Saturday evening from his chase after the Indian murderer, Jack Gunn. Mr. Yaney in substance told the following story of his adventure. He left Lone Pine on Monday accompanied by Hilario Arambula and four Indians. The party struck out for the Coso mountains. On arriving where the Indian was last seen a search was made to discover his trail; this was soon taken up and the hunt was then begun. The trail led south-west into the vast lava beds east from Little Lake. Arambula was on the lead and when he reached the top of a small ridge he raised a shout from which the others understood that the Indian was in sight. When Mr. Yaney got to the top of the ridge he saw two Indian men and two women, all of them being on foot and less than two hundred yards ahead of their pursuers. Some of the pursuers at once began firing. The Indian who was with Gunn fired back but probably not more than once and then he fell riddled with bullets. One of the squaws, apparently his mother, rushed between his pursuers and Gunn and shouted, "You no shoot my boy, you no shoot my boy." In the meantime Gunn was running as rapidly as possible toward a mass of lava that was near. Several shots were fired at him but the woman was in the way and he kept dodging about all the time so that none of the shots appeared to take effect. The Indian got into the lava unhurt, so far as his pursuers could tell and as night was now coming on Mr. Yaney thought it would be useless to continue the hunt and he therefore returned with his party. Other Indians gathered together the effects of the man who was killed and as their custom is, burned them. Mr. Yaney got his gun, an old breech-loading musket, and destroyed it. On Sunday Sheriff Eldred went to Lone Pine and as a result of inquiries made by him there, he sent Mr. Yaney out again next day accompanied by W. T. Grant to hunt for the Indian. Mr. Grant knows the country well where the Indian is beleived to be, and the chances are that he will be run down and captured or killed.

There is good reason to expect that the Indian murderer, Jack Gunn, will be brought in unhurt. A party of Indians are on his trail and feel confident of capturing him.

To The Electors of Inyo County.

Upon my late visit to the Nothern portion of the County, I was much surprised to learn that a report was in circulation that I was a candidate for the office of Superior Judge, in the interest of other parties, and my object was to promote the chances of other aspirants for that important position. I have my faults, but that of duplicity has never been attributed to me. I desire to say to the voters of Inyo County that I am a candidate to the finish—I am such entirely in my own interest—I would deem it a high honor to acquire the position—if nominated and elected I will be the Judge—holding the scales of Justice equi poised—and administering the law without fear or favor.

Respectfully yours,
A. R. CONKLIN.

THE KISS.

The snow is white on wood and wold,
The wind is in the firs,
So dead my heart is with the cold,
No pulse within it stirs.
Even to see your face, my dear,
Your face that was my sun;
There is no spring this bitter year,
And summer's dreams are done.

The snakes that lie about my heart
Are in their wintry sleep;
Their fangs no more deal sting and smart,
No more they curl and creep.
Love with the summer ceased to be;
The frost is firm and fast.
God, keep the summer far from me,
And the snakes' sleep last!

Touch of your hand could not suffice
To waken them once more;
Nor could the sunshine of your eyes
A ruined spring restore.
But, ah—your lips! You know the rest;
The snows are summer rain.
My eyes are wet, and in my breast
The snakes' fangs meet again.

—Leaves of Life.

DOCTOR BOB.

Unc' Primus' wife, Priscilla, who kept the dairy on Tom-in-Luck plantation, died about midsummer, in the twelfth year after Mawse Tom and Mis' Nannie were married and settled on a place of their own. She left, among other valuables, a flowered pitcher that was the cause of quarrel between Unc' Primus and his sister-in-law, Aunt Tempe.

Aunt Priscy had left no children, but Unc' Primus had a niece to whom he wished to present the flowered pitcher, while Mom Rhody declared that Aunt Priscy had willed that particular pitcher to her nearest of kin, Aunt Tempe.

Backed by Mom Rhody, Aunt Tempe got possession of the pitcher, but in the struggle the spout was broken off, and this small fragment Unc' Primus pocketed, vowing vengeance.

"Hit's a gret pity," said Mom Rhody, uneasily, "det Primus is sister's son's wife's nephew ter ole Unc' December over ter Mawse Coe's," and she speedily procured a rabbit's left hind foot for Aunt Tempe to wear in her bosom.

Thus panoplied, Aunt Tempe defied Unc' Primus, who, in less than three months, took a second wife, professed himself at peace with all the world, and made over to Aunt Tempe whatever possessions of her deceased sister he had not already bestowed upon his niece.

"Dat 'ceitful Primus!" said Mom Rhody; and when, on a day in September, Aunt Tempe was taken ill, Mom Rhody declared, mysteriously, that it was just what she had expected.

But it was not what any one else would have expected, for Aunt Tempe was a robust, cheerful woman, brisk and tidy, and frolicsome as a kitten with Mis' Nannie's children. That Aunt Tempe should be ill was incomprehensible, and so strangely ill! She had no fever, she complained of no "misery" anywhere; she simply stopped in the midst of cutting out the plantation clothing, and announced with solemnity that "somethin' or 'nother wuz wrong." As Mom Rhody stated it:

Of a Friday by noon,
'Cordin' ter change ob de moon,
Sis' Tempe her wuk wuz done.

Mom Rhody had a gift at oracular jingles that procured her great esteem on the plantation. It was not hidden from the negroes that this old nurse, who had "raised" Mawse Tom, was deep in the lore of the evil one and all his works—not to do them, but to give warning thereof; for Mom Rhody was a sister in the church that stood in the sandy bottom beside the creek, a shouting and fasting member, a leader in "prah meetin's," as one called to wage a perpetual warfare, so she said, against Satan and his imps, and Mom Rhody held that Friday was the devil's own day.

"Hukkom I know dat?" said she. "De is signs a-plenty. Doan' ev'ybody see jay buds is skaase o' Fridays, 'long o' totin' sticks ter men' de fishs below. When you see mischance happen o' dat day debbil got a han' in dat job by means o' his ministers, sho'ly—mo'n perticklar effen moon changes."

When it was suggested that the doctor should be sent for, Mom Rhody shook her head, and said: "No white man's doctor top side o' de yeth couldn' do Sis' Tempe no good."

Mom Rhody did not hesitate to express this opinion to Mawse Tom himself, seeing that she had "raised" him. But Mawse Tom would not listen to such nonsense, he said, and as Aunt Tempe had now been lying ill some days without improvement, Christopher Columbus was dispatched for the family physician, who felt Aunt Tempe's pulse and looked at her tongue, and asked if she had any pain.

Aunt Tempe said, "No; only a general gin out." The doctor thought at first that she was "playing 'possum," but day by day she grew worse, until at last it was indisputable that she was very ill. She could not move, except to turn her poor head upon her pillow, and roll her eyes beseechingly. The power of speech was gone.

"I done told Mawse Tom he gwan fling away his money on white man's doctor!" grumbled Mom Rhody. "En now I tell you, Mis' Nannie, honey, Sis' Tempe is done gin up ter die, douten Doctor Bob is sont fur."

Doctor Bob should have borne some outlandish, tongue twisting name, for he was a native African, but time out of mind he had been known as Doctor Bob, a healer of the "kunjered," and the negroes far and near regarded him with a sentiment bordering on veneration. He was a slave on old Maj Wheaten's place over in the next county, but his master never hesitated to allow him to lay down the hoe whenever there came a summons from a victim of the "kunjer."

Indeed, Doctor Bob's fees were a liberal offset to the loss of his labor in the cotton row, for, between the major and the doctor, the charges amounted to $50, more or less, and whoever employed Doctor Bob had the trouble of hauling him and his paraphernalia back and forth. There was not very much of Doctor Bob, it is true, but there was a great deal of the paraphernalia.

Mawse Tom grumbled much at paying such a price for humbuggery and superstition, especially as both he and Doctor Heady had decided that Aunt Tempe's case was hopeless; but ole Mis' and Mis' Nannie said that they could not see Aunt Tempe die with any wish ungratified, and little Nan and Roy and Susy, and even baby Tom, began now to clamor for Doctor Bob; therefore, though Mawse Tom had often declared that Doctor Bob should never set foot on his plantation, he was sent for.

Had Doctor Bob refused to come, the negroes of Tom-in-Luck would have felt themselves doomed by wholesale to the powers of darkness; but Doctor Bob had never been known to refuse. It was, as the negroes say, "a half hour by sun," when the ox cart that had been sent for him was seen toiling up the hill beyond the peach orchard, and, by Mawse Tom's indulgence, the negroes stopped work, and assembled to receive the illustrious doctor—all except Unc' Primus. Primus was mauling rails in the woods, and he went on mauling rails.

But he was not missed from the company that crowded around the big gate, as the cart approached. Little Miss Nan and Roy and Susy were mounted on the topmost red bar, and Mom Rhody was there with baby Tom in her arms; a score of little pickaninnies swarmed over the fence rails, and lost their balance and tumbled into the sand, and picked themselves up again, afraid to cry. The older negroes formed a line on each side of the way, bowing obsequiously as the cart passed through.

The cart was full of something—no doubt of that, but at first Doctor Bob did not make much of a show. It was Christopher Columbus, seated on the buckboard and shouting to the ox, that chiefly struck the eye—"Christopher Columbus, swellin' wid his own insignificance, dat boy," Mom Rhody remarked severely; for Mom Rhody did not believe in forwardness in youth.

However, Christopher, though he sat exalted, did not command the eye for long; when the cart halted in front of the cabin assigned to Doctor Bob's exclusive use, there was seen in the midst of a motley array of squat and bulging jugs, a dwarfish figure, clad in dingy brown, and crouching with arms a-kimbo, so that he was hardly to be distinguished from the uncouth vessels that surrounded him, save for the bright and scintillating black eyes illuminating his ebon face, and darting fire at every glance.

When, at Mawse Tom's approach, he removed his dingy cap, and revealed a peaked head as white as snow, the effect was so startling that the awe stricken negroes fell back, and some of the pickaninnies stifled a yell in their mothers skirts.

"Sho' cuore, massa," said Doctor Bob, with a gleaming grin, as he scrambled out of the cart. When he stood upon his feet, his resemblance to his squatty jugs was more marked and more ludicrous than ever.

He was very short and very bow legged, with a pronounced paunch, which he supported with his two hands. He said he was a thousand years old, and the negroes believed it, but he had none of the feebleness, none of the apathy of age.

"Doctor Bob en he jug neber fail," he said to Mawse Tom, with another grin, as he proceeded to remove the numerous vessels of different sizes, and to set them within the cabin door.

Lastly, he took from the cart a long, stout, knotty stick, black and polished, and cut into three spikes at the top. At sight of this there was a more pronounced retreat on the part of the beholders, and some of the very young ones ran away howling.

Doctor Bob evidently enjoyed the commotion he excited; his eyes twinkled and glanced, taking in every movement of the crowd, while he raised his stick aloft, waved it around his head, muttering strange words; then, walking backward around the cabin, he cast handful after handful of a curious kind of hard, shriveled red berry or bean, which he took from his pockets, and of which his supply seemed to be inexhaustible.

This done, he paused in front of the door, waved his hands thrice, which the negroes seemed to accept as a dismissal, for with one accord they straggled away; a few of the older ones, whether through inherited tradition, whether through an instinctive sense of decorum characteristic of many of their race, advanced, one by one, did obeisance to Doctor Bob, and solemnly retired.

Doctor Bob entered his cabin, and and was seen no more until about noon the next day. This was the time fixed for the initiation of his ministrations to Aunt Tempe. He began by walking backward around her cabin, as he had walked around his own, throwing handful after handful of his shriveled scarlet beans. There were not so many witnesses on this occasion, for the negroes were at work, but Mis' Nannie was present, and Mom Rhody.

Aunt Tempe's cabin with its little garden was one of the tidiest on the plantation. Her little flower bed had been gay all summer with "four o'clocks" and "old maids," which toddling baby Tom would pull and lay on her pillow, saying: "Pitty fowers, make Mom Tempe well."

At first Aunt Tempe smiled at the child and feebly strove to stroke his curls, but she had not smiled now for many days. When, however, Doctor Bob looked at her and said: "Doctor Bob know; Doctor Bob cuore," Aunt Tempe smiled once more.

To Mis' Nannie's great alarm—for it was a chilly day in November and Aunt Tempe was almost a skeleton—Doctor Bob uncovered his patient's feet, and with great solemnity laid his staff across the soles of Aunt Tempe's feet, uttering some cabalistic words that Mom Rhody evidently understood, for she made a response in similar gibberish, at which Doctor Bob seemed greatly pleased.

He now took his position in the middle of the room, fixed his eyes on Aunt Tempe, and bending his crooked legs to an extraordinary angle, began swaying slowly back and forth, waving his arms and crooning a wild chant.

His voice never rose above this low, monotonous crooning, but his movement presently grew faster and faster, and at that instant Mom Rhody entered upon the same performance, which was maintained with great vigor until both fell to the floor exhausted. Doctor Bob was the first to recover. He removed his staff from Aunt Tempe's feet with one hand, and with the other he held up to view two small balls of hair.

"See um?" he said to Mis' Nannie. "Come outen foots, but trabeled de body froo."

"Do you expect me to believe such nonsense?" said Mis' Nannie, indignantly.

"Honey, honey," panted Mom Rhody, "doan balk de cuore?"

"Um gwan see," muttered Doctor Bob, in dudgeon, as he wrapped the balls of hair in a fabric, the like of which Mis' Nannie had never seen before. He then left the cabin, but presently returned with one of his smallest jugs full of a steaming liquid; this he placed at Aunt Tempe's feet, and covered all closely with a marvelous patchwork.

"Um no better, eh?" he said to Mis' Nannie, jerking his thumb toward the bed. Certainly Aunt Tempe was no worse.

So the "powwow," as Mawse Tom called it, went on day after day, with this difference: that it took place after dark when more of the negroes—special selections of Mom Rhody's—could be present "to assist" in the ministrations, and Mawse Tom came to look on, instead of Mis' Nannie.

Every night Doctor Bob drew bigger and bigger balls of hair from Aunt Tempe's feet, and put a bigger jug of some mysterious steaming compound in her bed, and Aunt Tempe began to recover the power of speech and the use of her hands.

At last, when for eight consecutive days he had exhibited those mysterious balls of hair, supposed to travel through Aunt Tempe's body and come out at her feet, and Aunt Tempe all the while visibly growing better, on the morning of the ninth day, that being Friday, Doctor Bob announced that she would be loosened from the "kunjer" at sundown, and that whoever had been instrumental in putting it upon her would "drap in de tracks," and only Doctor Bob's mercy could save that person from the effects of that same "kunjer."

At Doctor Bob's requisition all the negroes were summoned at sundown to march in procession around Aunt Tempe's cabin, ole Mis' and Mawse Tom and Mis' Nannie being there as lookers on with all the children, except baby Tom, who was asleep on a blanket in front of Aunt Tempe's fire.

Aunt Tempe lay on her bed opposite the door, which was wide open, that egress might be allowed the invisible "kunjer," and that she might be seen of each one in the procession. She was very feeble still, not having yet recovered the power to move herself freely. Doctor Bob stood outside, facing the door, at a sufficient distance to allow the procession to pass between him and the cabin.

Despite his diminutive size, despite his deformity, this hoary headed black dwarf wore an air of majesty, and humbuggery though he felt it all to be, Mawse Tom could not laugh; to these ignorant creatures it bore a significance so terrible.

Mis' Nannie, when Doctor Bob began his unearthly crooning, clung trembling to her husband, and was half sorry she had permitted the children to be present.

Most negroes incline to a rocking gait, and Mawse Tom's slaves, under the influence of Doctor Bob, swayed and swung heavily, and doubtless, had the marching and the crooning continued many minutes, they would all have passed into a convulsive dance, but the march presently came abruptly to an end.

In obedience to a fascination none could resist, each negro, in passing, looked in at the invalid on the bed, but when Primus looked in he uttered a yell and fell flat upon his face.

He had seen what nobody else stayed to see, for the negroes scattered far and wide, as if a bombshell had burst among them. Primus saw Aunt Tempe, who had not moved for so many weeks, spring out of bed and rush to the fireplace, for Aunt Tempe, too, had seen what nobody else saw: she had seen the log in the fireplace burn asunder and scatter in its fall the burning coals over baby Tom.

No one could understand at first the apparition of Aunt Tempe in the doorway, with the sleeping child in her arms, and the tears running down her wasted cheeks. Even to Mawse Tom and Mis' Nannie it seemed a sort of miracle, and I make no doubt that Doctor Bob himself was in a measure astonished, but he said, complacently:

"Um done loosed, feed um, warm um, um walk bombye."

Then he turned his attention to Primus, who upon recovering his senses, forswore Unc' December and all his arts.

As for Aunt Tempe, she did not recover her full strength immediately, but she improved rapidly, and never was ill again. She died in freedom at an extreme old age, cheered to the last by the affectionate devotion of baby Tom, whom she was accustomed to pet and scold long after his beard was grown.

Mawse Tom paid Doctor Bob's fee without questioning his skill, but it was not to be doubted by any reasonable mind that Aunt Tempe's faithful affection for baby Tom was a powerful factor in her cure, though Doctor Bob took to himself all the glory of it.

At a Large Depot.

Did you ever think what a place a depot in a city like Minneapolis is for the study of human nature, and what a world of interesting sights and scenes are to be had there? If one could become ubiquitous for an hour or two and stand a disinterested observer at all the railroad stations and become oblivious to everything else for the time being, what would be the impression? Why, if you look at the incoming trains as they stop, you would be tempted to think that everybody had run away from everywhere else and come to Minneapolis and brought his wife and daughter, or somebody else's wife or daughter, and all were hurrying with all their mights and mains to get away from the depot before they got arrested. And this impression would not be lessened by the rush and scuffle between them and the hackmen and cabmen and draymen and hotel and boarding house drummers, as the latter grab and nab, and rush and push and yell and scramble to get baggage and passengers into their various conveyances, and the former dodging and shoving and rushing and tugging and pulling at goods and grips and other luggage; dogs, canary birds and babies.

But then your attention is drawn from all these before they are out of sight by another such a crowd rushing and hurrying the other way, just as if everybody was running away from Minneapolis and going to other parts unknown, taking with them all the money, all the portable property, all the wives, daughters, dogs and—and babies of themselves and their neighbors, and were all doing their very best to get out of the city before they were arrested. At the gate the keeper seems to think so too, as he gives each of them a punch as they pass out. This hurry and scuffle, bustle and rustle and hustle, is being repeated every hour in the day and many hours in the night. This is too wearying, almost bewildering to the brain. No doubt a good many of these crowds, both ways, contain some runaway thieves, burglars, bank defaulters, elopers, etc., for the next thing that attracts the attention is the crowds of ever dreaded, ever welcome, never appreciated, never feared and never half respected ubiquitous newsboys, crying, in every imaginable key and tone of voice: "Here's your Jour—'naway! All about the lates' scandal!"—St. Paul Pioneer Press.

AND STILL THEY COME.

San Francisco, Jan., 29, '90.
Sierra Chemical Co.:
Gentlemen:—I have been a sufferer from Kidney complaints for several years and have used all kinds of medicine without any apparent results or relief until my friend advised me, and told me of the wonderful cures The Great Sierra Kidney and Liver Cure was accomplishing. I was induced to buy one bottle but without much faith, and to my surprise after using that bottle I noticed such a great improvement that I kept on until I have now used three bottles, and can safely say that I am entirely cured and never felt better in my life. I wish to recommend this remedy to all sufferers from Kidney and Liver disorders, for it will positively do the work.
Very truly yours,

INFERNAL INGENUITY

Could scarcely devise more excruciating tortures than those of which you see the evidences in the face of a rheumatic or neuralgic sufferer. The agonies are the consequence of not checking a rheumatic or neuralgic attack at the outset. Hostetter's Stomach Bitters has been found by skillful medical practitioners to possess not only remedial, but defensive efficacy, where those diseases exists, or a tendency to them is exhibited. Surely this puissant but safe botanic medicine, bearing, too, such high specific sanction, is better than the poisons often employed, but most unsafe, not only in continuance, but in isolated doses. The blood is depurated thoroughly from the rheumatic virus, and the nerves, slightly impinged upon, save from ultimate and direful throes by this benign, saving medicine, which likewise exhibits marked efficacy for malaria, kidney complaints, dyspepsia, constipation and liver complaint.

In verse I called her "my bonny maid,"
But alas! they printed it "bony."

ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND DOLLARS FOR TWENTY.

A. A. Marcus, a Jewish Rabbi, Secures a Fortune from The Louisiana State Lottery.

Golden Fruitage has fallen from The Louisiana State Lottery Company, plumb into the pocket of a well known citizen of Boston.

It is Alfred A. Marcus this time, and the plum struck him $100,0 0 worth.

Alfred Marcus is a familiar figure on our streets, having had extensive dealings in real estate, and he is generally conceded a very shrewd business man. In deeds of benevolence among his people he is hardly surpassed, and as one of the more fortunate of his class he has always been ready to relieve the wants of the distressed. In religious circles he figures as one of the strictly orthodox Jews. He not only has built two synagogues, but in one of them on Church St. he is the rabbi, and there is seen every Saturday conducting the service and reading the sermon. One day last week he paid off the mortgage on one of his churches, which, it has leaked out, was due to his good fortune in securing the plum from The Louisiana State Lottery pie. It seems that a few days previous to the drawing, on May 13, he bought a whole ticket, No. 39,825. He paid $20 for the ticket, and on May 13 drawing found his was the lucky number, (39,825) and had drawn the entire second capital prize of $100,000. The next morning, going to C. H. Allen of the Central National Bank, the money was sent for and received on Friday, May, 23.—Boston (Mass.) Record, June 9.

Weak and Weary

In early summer the warmer weather is especially weakening and enervating, and that tired feeling prevails everywhere. The great benefit which people at this season derive from Hood's Sarsaparilla proves that this medicine "makes the weak strong." It does not act like a stimulant, imparting fictitious strength, but Hood's Sarsaparilla builds up in a perfectly natural way all the weakened parts, and purifies the blood.

A HOUSEKEEPER'S HEAVEN.

The pleasant prediction is made that drudgery will be abolished from the household and the occupation of the domestic servant will be gone.

Valuable Advice for the Present Day.

Mrs. Helen E. Sterrett, in a recent number of the Forum, contributes an article entitled "Housekeeping in the Future." In it she tells how in a few years electricity will supply light for the home, the family cooking and washing will be done outside, and there will be so little work in the household that the occupation of the domestic servant will be gone.

But Mrs. Sterrett's article is simply a prediction, and has no more than a passing interest for the ladies who live in 1890. Their social and household cares are straining their delicate, nervous system, and the result is terrible. Headaches, backaches, and womanly ills are growing alarmingly common. Many of them find that memory is failing; they are unable to recall the names of friends or tell whether they have performed some of their usual household duties.

Their nerves are in such a condition that very slight causes, or perhaps no cause at all, may irritate them. Life grows to be a burden. There is no need for despair, but there is great need of caution. Their nerves should be built up, life fortified, and brain restored with that remarkable preparation, Paine's Celery Compound. Instead of the depressed and languid feelings, after the Compound has been used, they will feel active, vigorous, and happy. To those who are weak and failing, and desire health and happiness instead of illness and misery, we earnestly urge that they act upon this advice.

TO VINEYARDISTS!

Instead of seeling your Grapes to the large Wineries, at any price they dictate to you,

MAKE YOUR OWN WINE,

as the Grape Growers do in France, Germany, Spain and Italy. Your Vineyard will never get a reputation as long as you send your Grapes to a Central Winery. Put in a small plant just large enough to handle your crop of Grapes, and sell your Wine to REPUTABLE BOTTLERS TO SELL UNDER YOUR OWN BRAND; then you will reap the reward, by making your vineyard valuable, if you have taken care to have choice grapes.

To enable the Vineyardists of California to have the necessary WINE PRESSES, CRUSHERS and STALK STRIPPERS, we have imported from France a full line of WINE PRESSES, of different varieties and sizes, and we are now manufacturing this WINE MAKING MACHINERY at our works.

OLD FASHIONED ROSES.

They ain't no style about 'em
And they're sort o' pale and faded,
Yet the doorway here without 'em
Would be lonesomer, and shaded
With a good 'eal blacker shadder
Than the mornin' glories make,
And the sunshine would look sadder
For their good old fashion' sake.

I like 'em, 'cause they kind o'
Sort o' make a feller like 'em;
And I tell you, when I find a
Bunch out whar the sun kin strike 'em
It allus sets me thinkin'
O' the ones 'at used to grow
And peek in through the chinkin'
O' the cabin, don't you know.

And then I think o' mother,
And how she used to love 'em
When they wuzn't any other
'Less she fund 'em up above 'em,
And her eyes, afore she shut 'em,
Whispered with a smile and said,
We must pick a bunch and put 'em
In her hand when she is dead.

But, as I wuz a-sayin',
They ain't no style about 'em
Very gaudy or displayin',
But I wouldn't be without 'em,
'Cause I'm happier in these posies
And the hollyhawks and sich,
Than the hummin' bird 'at noses
In the roses of the rich.

—James Whitcomb Riley.

THE EXILE'S DAUGHTER.

"Indeed, my dear Toinette, Col. Graham's restrictions appear to me excessively unreasonable. I must compliment you on your forbearance. I could not have believed that a young lady of your seeming spirit would bear his dictation so tamely."

The rich roses in Toinette St. Etienne's cheek deepened in color.

"You mistake me," she said haughtily. "I have no intention of submitting. My hardship is, I think, at an end. I was 18 Thursday. I shall certainly join you in New York."

"Bravo! bravo!" laughed the other speaker, softly clapping her little jeweled hands. "So we are not in love with our guardian's footprints, as the malicious would have it supposed."

"Did any one say anything so preposterous?" cried Toinette, her brilliant dark eyes flashing angrily.

"Never mind, never mind," said Mrs. Etynge, lifting her innocent looking blue eyes, and parting her babyish lips in a smile. "Le beau monde is always saying something disagreeable, particularly of the young and fair."

"That scarcely applies to me," said Toinette, elevating her delicately penciled eyebrows, and glancing at the petite brunette reflection in the mirror opposite.

"She walks in beauty like the night
Of cloudless climes and starry skies;
And all that's best of dark and bright
Meets in her aspect and her eyes," quoted the dainty blonde widow, Mrs. Etynge.

"Pray, do not be so flattering. I never could receive a compliment gracefully," cried Tionette, looking vexed.

"Pardon me. I did not mean to offend. I am like Lieut. McCook; in your presence I am always tempted to express admiration."

At the mention of the lieutenant's name Toinette could not repress a lurking smile of triumph. "You both try to turn my head," she murmured.

The widow's only answer to this was an affectionate glance and smile.

"Why could you not go to the post with me now?" she asked after a pause. "To be sure the hotel is not equal to a villa on the Hudson, but the officers are to have a hop to-night, and, my dear, a young lady may not consider herself a rose in the garden of girls until she has attended a West Point hop. Besides, your going now would expedite matters for our New York trip to-morrow."

Toinette sprang to her feet with an exclamation of delight; then paused.

"Col. Graham is not here," she faltered. "He might think"——

"He might think you were getting out of the leading strings, eh?" questioned Mrs. Etynge, mockingly. "You cling to old habits, I perceive."

"You are again mistaken. I will be ready as soon as my maid can change my costume for something more suitable, and pack something for this evening—that is, if your carriage has room for a package as unwieldy as a party dress?"

"Room! My dear, there is oceans of room. Make haste."

West Point is the loveliest spot in the world; its music is perfection, its officers Adonises; but willful little Toinette did not consider the hop a success. In the morning she pleaded indisposition, and refused to make one of the gay little party going down to New York to hear Marie Roze, West Point's favorite cantatrice.

"Don't let me disturb your plans," she insisted. "I will go over to Highland Falls, and take the boat from there. I should enjoy a boat ride homeward more than a carriage ride today."

Mrs. Etynge expostulated and slyly taunted in vain.

"I am not afraid of my guardian," said Toinette. "My head aches."

"My love," protested Mrs. Etynge, "I am sure of both statements. Pray, do not look at me so defiantly. I perceive that you have declared your independence. I would not be surprised if you even took the management of your property into your own hands. Have you demanded a statement from Col. Graham yet?"

"Hardly," laughed Toinette. "I have always had whatever I desired, and asked no questions."

"It is well that wardships do not make men's fortunes, as they did in the middle ages," mused Mrs. Etynge. "You would have to hate Dick Graham speculating with your fortune, would you not?"

"Do you mean Col. Graham?"

"Yes. The old name escaped me unawares. I do not mind confiding to you," said the widow, affecting confusion, "that he and I were lovers before I discovered his true nature. He was always talking of the money he would like to have, and it disgusted me so that I broke with him."

Toinette felt a strange sinking about the heart, but replied, bravely:

"No doubt you were to be congratulated on your escape. Was this—this little affair while he was in the army?"

"O, yes; long before he got his wound and his discharge. He felt terribly when I explained my change of feeling, but no doubt he is all over it by this time."

"Let us hope so," said Toinette, sweetly, and kissed her good-by.

"Good-by, darling. Be sure to ask the colonel if he borrowed from you when he built the river villa and the city brown stone."

"Indeed, I will not."

Toinette was angry, but the ugly suspicion had taken root.

"A retired officer's half pay would not keep up such an establishment as this," she reflected. "He had no inheritance; I have heard him say so. He certainly has wealth, and spends it royally. Can it be mine? How do I know I have any? I know nothing of my affairs. The few times I have questioned him he evaded me. How dare I suspect him? Mrs. Etynge knows nothing. Why should she be so bitter against the man she rejected?"

The jar of the boat as it touched the shore interrupted her unpleasant train of thought.

"How detestable! No one expects me. I will have to walk home," was the exclamation that rose to her lips.

She was thoroughly weary when she reached her destination, and glad to escape to her room unnoticed. She did not see her guardian until dinner, and, absorbed in her own reflections, she did not observe that he was silent and distrait.

"Will you come with me into the library?" he asked, as they were leaving the dining room. "I have news of importance to communicate."

Secretly wondering, she followed him, and sank into a huge chair with the apparent intention of going to sleep. His first words awakened her thoroughly.

"I received today a letter from your father. He is in this country. He is on his way here. Republics, he says, are not less ungrateful than individuals. His warfare against Napoleon, his long exile, have counted as nothing. The French republic has ignored his claims as completely as the pretensions of Chambord. He has quitted France forever."

"O, my father! When will he reach here?" cried Toinette, excitedly.

"The letter was delayed. He may arrive to-morrow."

They were both silent for a few moments. Then Col. Graham rose and stood before her.

"Toinette," he began huskily, "he writes that he will make his home in New York; that he will take you from my home to his."

He paused abruptly, and waited, as if for answer. None came.

He continued: "It is twelve years since he gave you into my charge. He thought that he could return to France—where he fondly dreamed that freedom was at last triumphant—participate in the organization of the republic, and, in a few months, send for you. How he has been disappointed from day to day, and from year to year, I leave him to tell you. I must tell you that since you came into my home you have been its sunshine. I was a weary and disappointed man. I had, after the manner of impetuous youth, tested the quality of humanity, and concluded it was all bad. You, dear, innocent child, restored my faith. Toinette, I cannot let you go. Surely I have the first claim now. Your father is a stranger. His heart always belonged to France; mine is in your keeping."

Toinette was strangely moved. "You forget," she faltered; "consanguinity has rights"——

"I forget nothing," he said. "Make my right greater than his. Marry me, Toinette. All that I am, all that I have, is yours."

It was an unfortunate speech. Mrs. Etynge's innuendoes recurred to her with renewed significance. She rose and turned away from his pleading eyes, his outstretched arms.

"I thank you," she said softly, "for the honor you would confer, but it cannot be," and she passed out of his sight.

The next day her father came; a worn and weary and shabby old man, who responded absently to her caresses, and then seemed to forget her while he poured out his thanks to Col. Graham.

Toinette listened in amazement, which soon changed to humiliation and distress. This broken spirited old man in threadbare habiliments was the patriot hero of her dreams, who was to return in triumph and take her away to some grand chateau of beautiful France; and what was he saying?

"Graham, how can I ever thank you—God knows I can never hope to repay you—for what you have done for my child! All that I can promise is that she shall no longer be a tax on your generosity. I have obtained work as a translator; I will take her to New York, and there we will make a home—humble enough, but peaceful. O I am sick of conflict."

"She has not been a tax," said Col. Graham, earnestly. "I am in her debt for happiness conferred—and—and she is not accustomed to poverty. I thought I was preparing her to share a brilliant destiny with you. I—we—owe it to her not to let her suffer from this mistake and disappointment. St. Etienne, either leave her with me or let me settle part of my superabundance on her. I have no ties; it would only be anticipating. What I have will be hers at my death, anyway."

"What have you to say, my child?" asked the exile of Toinette.

"I think," said Toinette, unsteadily, "that I had better go with you, father; but do not think," she added, turning toward Col. Graham, with tear suffused eyes and quivering lips, "that I am ungrateful. In the last few moments I have seen the past as I never did before. I have realized that you are the best, the kindest, the noblest of men. May heaven bless and reward you for your generosity and patience with one so selfish and thoughtless as I have been."

In vain were Col. Graham's entreaties. Toinette and her father resolutely refused to be his guests but a few days longer; they refused his proffered aid; and she, though with an aching heart, now that she knew the value of what she was putting away from her, again refused to be Col. Graham's wife. It was only pity that prompted him, she told herself.

In New York she took up the burden of existence for the first time. She seldom saw Col. Graham, though he often spent the evenings with her father. She hid herself in her own poor little room. She was careful never to pass her old home, or go where she would be likely to meet her old associates. Two or three found her out and came to her with words of love and approbation, but the majority, like Mrs. Etynge, barely recognized her if brought face to face, and ignored her when possible. She cared less than she thought she would; she even confessed to herself that she would be happy with her simple efforts at housekeeping, her few music pupils and painstaking copies of her father's translations, if her heart had not ached with the knowledge that it had awakened to love too late, and after she had put away what might have been its treasure.

One day her sorrows seemed almost too heavy to bear. She was waiting in a certain patrician music room for her pupil when an older member of the family and a friend entered and continued their conversation without deigning to notice her.

"Have you heard that Mrs. Etynge is going to marry that handsome Col. Graham?" asked one of them.

"No. I knew that she had been angling for him ever since she was widowed, but I thought he would have more sense than to take her. I've heard that they were engaged once, but she threw him over for old Etynge. How she must have felt when the gallant colonel was found to have made a fortune from western lands he bought when he was sent out to fight the Indians!"

"Doubtless; but she's all right now. Some thought he would marry that little French girl. People used to joke about his raising a wife to his taste."

"S—s—h!" said her companion, warningly, with a meaning glance at Toinette's corner.

The pupil came in; she went through the lesson—she never knew how—then home, to weep over the unworthy suspicions she had cherished and the love that came too late.

For days she scarcely dared to look at a paper, fearing to see the announcement of Col. Graham's engagement or marriage. Even her father, who usually, when his tasks were done, sat like a man blind and deaf to all that was going on about him, noticed how pale and haggard she was growing.

"My child," he said, kindly, "you are wearing out, I fear. You are not fit for the life you are leading! Say but the word, and you can go back to all you gave up for my sake. The last time Col. Graham was here he renewed his offers, and said he would not come here again—that he could not, it so wrung his heart to see our poverty. Shall I send to him?"

"No, no, father," cried the unhappy girl. "I will not go. My place is at your side. We will not part."

"You are a good child," said the old man, stooping to kiss her. "A good child," he repeated, softly. "It would have been better had I given more of my time and thoughts to you that were wasted on my ungrateful country. You have done your duty to me better than I did mine to you. Remember that I acknowledged this, after I am gone."

"Are you going away again?" asked Toinette, anxiously.

"Only on that journey from which no traveler ever comes back. Who knows when the summons may come for any one of us? Do not look disquieted, dear; I am not ill; memory reminds me that I am an old man, that is all! Now go to your rest, and to-morrow we must devise some plan to bring back your roses."

When the morrow came, with its chill and sleet, the old exile had renewed his youth, and the roses he found were in Paradise. When Toinette went to call him he was sitting as she had left him, with a smile on his face such as she had never seen him wear. It was hard to believe that his spirit had gone on that journey of which he spoke. The realization did not come to her till, after the funeral, she went back to the awful desolation of the little home. Then she wondered dimly how heaven could be so cruel; she did not dream that another blow was in store for her.

Her guardian had again besought her to return, and again she had refused. His hurt, reproachful glance pierced her heart, but she was firm. How could she go! She could not live under the same roof with him and his bride.

Over and over she thought of it, and tried to be reconciled, but it always ended by her desperately wishing she were not so young and strong. It would be so sweet to slip out of life and its crown of thorns.

A knock at her door one afternoon disturbed these morbid reflections. When she admitted her visitor, it proved to be Col. Graham's footman.

"Miss Toinette," he said abruptly, "we've brought the carriage for you. The colonel is dying and wants to see you."

How long the time seemed until she was at his bedside!

"Little Toinette," he whispered, feebly, "how happy I am to have you here once more."

"How glad I am to be here!" said Toinette, looking up through her tears.

"Are you? Well, don't cry, my little love. Don't let me make you unhappy, even for a moment."

Sobs choked her; she could make no reply.

"Toinette," he continued, after a pause to gain strength, "if I die—and the doctor says the chances are evenly balanced—I want you to promise to come here to live. All that I have is to be yours, as I told your father long ago."

"And Mrs. Etynge?"

A flush for an instant dyed the pallor of the sick man's face. "What have I do with her?" he demanded excitedly. "I had a boyish fancy for her till I found of what common clay she was made, but I never really loved any woman but you, little Toinette. It was not your fault that you could not return my love. Do not weep so bitterly."

"But I did, I do!" cried Toinette. "I think I loved you always, but Mrs. Etynge poisoned my mind and aroused my pride against you; and then I thought I was not worthy, and that you only asked me to marry you out of pity."

"Out of pity!" cried Col. Graham, starting up and then sinking back exhausted. "My love! My"——

A nurse appeared from some mysterious depths of curtains, and ordered Toinette from the room, but she would not go. "This is my place," she said quietly. "I will not resign it."

Contrary to every one's expectation, the colonel did not die. In three months' time he was well, "saved by love," he averred, and Mrs. Graham did not contradict him.—True Flag.

The Big Policeman and the Blind Traveler.

The Brooklyn bridge policemen and guards on the bridge trains have been accused of almost every crime in the calendar, but they are not so heartless after all. Every morning, a few minutes after 8 o'clock, a medium sized man of about 35 years of age, with a cane in his hand, feels his way up to the bridge entrance in Brooklyn. He is hopelessly blind, and moves along with shifting gait, as most blind people do. Before he reaches the ticket office a big policeman takes him firmly by the arm, says a cheerful "good morning," and skillfully pilots him through the surging crowd to the ticket office. He purchases his ticket for him, leads him to the ticket chopper, where another man takes the poor fellow and passes him along. A half dozen men follow the example, all with a kind word for the unfortunate traveler.

When he reaches the bridge car platform the passengers stop crowding and pushing for a moment, and the guard takes him kindly and puts him in a favorite position on the platform. The poor fellow is profuse in his thanks, and well he might be, for no loving mother could more tenderly care for her babe. One day there were tears of gratitude in his sightless eyes as a policeman led him out of the crowd and said pathetically, "It's too bad you're blind!"

"Oh," replied the patient traveler, and his face lighted up, "it's a pretty world, after all. I can't see it, but then everybody is so kind to me, and that helps to make up!"—New York Mail and Express.

An Ex-Mayor's Opinion of Success.

"I did not suppose," said Mr. Hewitt sharply, in answer to the request for his opinion upon the value of an education for the business man, "that the value of an education was open to controversy. I most decidedly do not consider that the chief aim of man is money getting."

"Do you think, Mr. Hewitt, that a man who obtains a college education can reach success as readily and surely as a young man who plunges immediately into business?"

"What do you mean by success? Certainly I will not admit that mere wealth is success. In my own case I have tried all my life to do my duty. If in the course of that I made money, I rejoiced. If I lost, and I lost money as frequently as I made it, I bore that with equanimity. I have given my children the best possible educational advantages. I am not trying to leave them wealth, nor do I care whether their education has aided or injured their ability to make money. I am satisfied to leave them thoroughly educated. Others may regard money getting as success. I do not, nor will I discuss this matter upon that low plane.

"If you ask my opinion upon the value of an education, quote me as saying this: If I were offered a fortune without education, or an education without fortune, I should unhesitatingly accept the education."—New York Tribune.

Trouble from the Nose.

A Dutch physician has recently declared that a close connection exists between the exercise of our mental faculties and disorders of the nose. The opinion is expressed that if it were generally known how many cases of chronic headache, of inability to learn or perform mental work, were due to chronic diseases of the nose many of these would be easily cured, and the number of child victims of the so called overpressure in education would be notably reduced. According to the above mentioned authority, it would seem that breathing through the nose is absolutely indispensable in order to secure the full value of the mental capacity.—Exchange.

A Warning to Bismarck.

An amusing story is told of the wife of Count Schouvaloff, the Russian embassador at the court of Berlin. Once while under her roof, the story goes, Bismarck was in a very bad humor and snubbed the countess and every other lady in the room in the most brutal manner. As he withdrew from the apartment one of the large Russian mastiffs in the hallway had the temerity to growl at the chancellor, whereupon the Countess Schouvaloff ran to the door and called out saucily, "Prince Bismarck, don't you dare bite my dog!"

Afraid It Would Smother.

There was great excitement in the Omaha depot. A noise like the crying of a child was traced to a closed trunk, and when the bystanders put their ears closer they were sure that something was wrong. "My God!" cried one. "Give me a handspike or something. There is a child inside and it will smother." No handspike was at hand, and people began to pull keys out of their pockets and at last the lock clicked. The cover was raised and inside were discovered an old Maltese cat and five new born kittens.

A CHINESE MILLIONAIRE.

The Residence and Manner of Life of the Celestial Vanderbilt.

I visited this afternoon the Vanderbilt of China. He is a relative of the Chinese minister at Washington, and his grandfather died less than a generation ago leaving an estate worth 50,000,000 hard gold dollars. His name is How Qua; and he has acres of houses in the busiest part of Canton, his own residence occupies the site of a good sized farm, and he has diamonds and pearls by the cupful. One of his diamonds, a ring which cost $60,000, was sent to England to be sold not long ago, and it is probably now in the jewel casket of one of the monarchs of Europe. He has plantations of rice fields and many acres of the choicest tea gardens. His money is well invested and he would approach the wealth of Jay Gould were it not that the officials every now and then come down upon him for a gift of from $10,000 to $100,000 and he dare not refuse. This rich man is now 49 years old, though he does not look over 35. He is a typical Chinaman of the literary class, has a broad, high forehead, thin yellow cheeks and eyes that shine as brightly as his choicest diamonds. His hair is like jet and his cue reaches to his ankles. He was dressed in silks and furs when he received me, and he had a tight, round black silk skull cap on the top of his head. He shook his own hands before his breast in Chinese salutation when our American consul, Mr. Seymour, introduced me to him, and then he reached out his long nailed fingers and grasped my hand a la Americaine.

It was in his grand residence on the banks of the Pearl river in the heart of Canton. We walked through a wilderness of buildings devoted to the servants and relatives of the family before we came to the reception room. How Qua supports about 400 of his poorer relatives, and when a man makes a fortune in China his whole clan settles down upon him. In the various courts all kinds of work seemed to be going on. Here servants were cleaning the fish for the family. There rice was being ground into flour and dried in great baskets, and just next the reception room we heard the buzzing of Babel. It was How Qua's children being taught by their tutor, and like all Chinese children, they studied out loud, singing their lessons out at the tops of their voices. Now and then the sharp clatter of the ruler could be heard when one of the boys made a mistake, and the father told me that he intended to have his boys educated at the Hong Kong foreign college and to finish them off in America and England. He talked English himself and he is among the progressive of the Chinese.

As we sat and chatted the choicest of Formosa tea was brought in, the leaves of which were, I judge, worth about $20 a pound, and we seated ourselves in black ebony chairs, which in couples were ranged on the sides of small tables, and sipped the tea from covered China cups without saucers. There are no easy chairs in the Chinese gentleman's house, and this palace in China had uncarpeted floors of stone, and its walls between the rooms were of colored glass framed in ebony. Some of the curious shaped panels had pictures painted on them by Chinese artists, and the effect of the whole was the finish of a fancy store room yet unoccupied, rather than that of a comfortable home.

Some of the finest rooms looked out upon a little lake of lotus plants of perhaps an acre in extent, and there were glass covered corridors which ran around this. The chairs sat against the wall, and their unbending backs were straight up and down. There were no cozy nooks such as you find in our American homes and the soft tints of our family life were not found in the picture. Nearly every room contained an American clock, and some were hung with glass chandeliers. I went into his mother's bed room, the best in the house, I doubt not, and where How Qua pointed as he said, "There my mamma sleeps," was a platform between four posts, which was covered with straw matting and upon which was a piece of porcelain of about the shape and size of a five-cent loaf of bread, and this was the pillow of this rich Chinese lady.—Frank G. Carpenter.

The London Thirteen Club.

The London Thirteen club, which has just inaugurated itself after the example of a similar institution in New York, is, I believe, exclusively for the male sex, and I am sure they are wise, for I fancy very few ladies would join, even if invited. Women are naturally much more superstitious than men, and I would not systematically do all the unlucky things they do for worlds, and I expect I should not even be eligible, for I am a firm believer in charms and crooked sixpences. These luckless people undertake whenever practicable to sit down thirteen to dinner, to walk under ladders, to spill salt at dinner (untidy creatures!), initiate any now enterprise on Fridays, and generally to do all the things which other folks don't like to do. I suppose to give them a wish after their own heart I had better say, "May bad luck go with them."—London Figaro.

A Decoration Occurrence.

Henceforth we must no longer talk of "arranging" our furniture, for the great apostle of art, Mr. Oscar Wilde, has provided us with a new expression for the negligent way in which it is the fashion to scatter the numerous little chairs, cabinets and screens which so gladden the heart of the modern housewife. A lady, well known in society, having bought a number of Japanese screens, was found one afternoon by the great æsthete musing on suitable positions for her purchases. "Oh, Mr. Wilde," exclaimed she, "I'm sorry you should have been brought into such a confusion. But as you are here, do be kind and help me to arrange them." A pained expression passed over the poet's face. "Oh, pray," cried he, "don't arrange them. Let them occur."—Philadelphia Telegraph.

The Sacred White Elephants.

Siam is known as the land of the white elephant. The elephant is the imperial animal of the country, and you see his picture upon all of the flags. The old coins of the realm have an elephant on one side of them, and the white elephant is here sacred. He is supposed to be the embodied spirit of some king or hero, and the people formerly worshiped him, and they do so to some extent now. Before going to see the palace I had read a glowing description of the white elephant of Siam. I expected to see his tusks bound with gold, to find golden chains about his neck and a superb velvet coat of purple, fringed with scarlet and gold, over his snow white body. What I did find was four wild eyed, scraggy looking elephants with long tusks and with skins not much whiter than those you see in the American circus. The only white part about them was their long flapping ears, which seemed to be afflicted witn the leprosy. The remainder of their skins had the whiteness only of disease, and I was told, as a rule, the white elephants of Siam are mad elephants.

These beasts were in dirty stables and they were chained by the feet to great wooden posts. They had dirty keepers and there was no sign of royalty about them. Their keepers fed them some grass while we were present and they performed some ordinary circus tricks for us. The glory of the white elephant has in all probability departed, and the elephants of the interior of Siam are made to work quite as hard as their brothers all over the world. One of the punishments of Siam is making convicts cut the grass for these royal elephants. One of them killed his keeper the other day, and this same holy beast made a snap at me with his trunk when I entered his stable.—Frank G. Carpenter.

Carl Tausig, the Pianist.

If Carl Tausig had only possessed the creative gift in any proportion to genius for reproduction, he would have been a giant composer. As a pianist he has never had his equal. With Listz's fire and Bulow's intellectuality, he nevertheless transcended them both in the possession of a subtle something that defied analysis. We see it in his fugitive compositions, that revel on technical heights hitherto unscaled. Tausig had a force, a virility, combined with mental insight, that made him the peer of all pianists. It is acknowledged by all who heard him that his technic outshone all others; he had the whispering and crystalline pianissimo of Joseffy, the liquidity of Thalberg's touch, with the resistless power of a Rubinstein.

He literally killed himself playing the piano; his vivid nature felt so keenly in reproducing the beautiful and glorious thoughts of Bach, Beethoven, and Chopin, and, like a saber that was too keen for its own scabbard, he wore himself out from nervous exhaustion. Tausig was many sided, and the philosophical bent of his mind may be seen in the few fragments of original music he has vouchsafed us.

Tausig was a child of the Nineteenth century, full of its ideals, its aimless strivings, its restlessness, its unfaith and desperately skeptical tone. If he had only lived he would have left an imprint on our modern musical life as deep as Franz Listz, whose pupil he was. Richard Wagner was his god and he strove much for him and his mighty creations. The world has much to be grateful for to the genius of the lamented Carl Tausig.—Musical Courier.

The Laughing Plant of Arabia.

Palgrave, in his work on central and eastern Arabia, mentions a plant whose seeds produce effects analogous to those of laughing gas. The plant is a native of Arabia. A dwarf variety is found at Kasum, and another variety at Oman, which attains a height of from three to four feet, with woody stems, wide spreading branches and light green foliage. The flowers are produced in clusters and are yellow in color. The seed pods contain two or three black seeds of the size and shape of a French bean. Their flavor is a little like that of opium, the taste is sweet, and the odor from them produces a sickening sensation and is slightly offensive. These seeds when pulverized and taken in small doses, operate upon a person in a very peculiar manner. He begins to laugh loudly and boisterously, and then sings, dances and cuts up all kinds of fantastic capers. The effect continues about an hour, and the patient is extremely comical. When the excitement ceases, the exhausted individual falls into a deep sleep, which continues for an hour or more, and when he awakens he is utterly unconscious that any such demonstrations have been made by him.—Scientific American.

He Got the Eggs.

A certain Baron Munchausen is hunting in Florida, and his stories of the chase are finding their way into the letters of admiring correspondents of northern papers. The baron's name inevitably calls to mind the immortal Munchausen whose phenomenal lying has made his name famous for all time. This gifted mortal's success in the hunting of birds can never be surpassed by the modern Munchausen. On one occasion the liar of a century ago came across a circle of quail feeding around a grain stack. The latter was completely environed by the birds, and the mighty hunter decided to have them all. So he took careful aim, pulled the trigger, and at the same time bent the barrel of his shot gun so as to send the charge quite around the grain stack. Unfortunately, his aim was too low, and, instead of forty or fifty quails, Munchausen bagged eighty or a hundred quails' legs. Just how he did this his book does not explain. Probably, if the Florida Nimrod is a descendant of the Munchausen, the mystery of the circular shot can be explained. The name is an unfortunate one to be associated with hunting episodes in this skeptical age.—Pittsburg Bulletin.

June.

All May there has been whispering in the trees
Of changes that would make this old world new;
Sweet rumors—brought by birds who flutter through
The year ahead of summer—that the breeze
Would kiss the buds to odorous mysteries
Of mazy petals and undreamed of hue.
Lo! as June comes (the gossip birds spoke true!)
At every step great roses brush her knees.

June is a maid whose virgin eyes shine clear
With truth and innocence; who sees her knows
She is nor child nor woman, yet so near
To both that each might claim the grace she shows,
Most like her dearest flower she doth appear,
A half unfolded, thirty petaled rose.

Death in the Desert.

It has just come to light that a party of Chinese, who attempted to smuggle themselves into the United States from lower California, got lost on the desert and had a terrible experience, one of the party dying of thirst and exposure. They found the frontier so closely guarded that they stole a march toward the eastward and got into the desert. Here they got lost and wandered aimlessly around for several days, suffering unutterable agonies.

One of the Mongolians was a youth of some 14 years. He gave out under the terrible suffering and became crazy. In his ravings he imagined the blistering sands were limpid water and eagerly filled his parched mouth with the burning particles. This only added to his horrors, and pretty soon he lay down to die, his companions being in too pitiful a condition to render him any assistance. Here they heaped a pile of sand upon him and left him alone to sleep his last long slumber, while they, with swollen tongues, aching limbs and heavy hearts, continued their aimless wanderings—lost in a trackless desert. It is asserted that they at last reached the railroad and soon reached Los Angeles, minus everything they had attempted to bring into the country except the clothes upon their backs. They had thrown away the bundles containing the many things the Chinese hold dear, all of which mark their track upon the waste of sands.

As the almond eyed ones have a system of spreading information among themselves, it is quite likely this terrible experience will prevent any more of them attempting to invade the United States via the desert route.—San Diego Union.

A Valuable Collection of Coins.

Loring G. Parmalee, of Boston and a former resident of Wilmington, Vt., has sold his valuable and unique collection of American coins to New York persons, who are to sell them at public auction. The collection comprises about 3,000 pieces, many of which are uncirculated, and is thought the most valuable single collection of United States coinage in the world, and is valued at $75,000. Mr. Parmalee has been about twenty years acquiring this collection, which includes the rare 1804 dollar, for which he paid $750, though it has since nearly doubled in value, and a specimen of every gold coin from 1795 down to the present date, the best assortment known. Some of the rare pieces of colonial coinage in the cabinet are valued as high as $1,000 each. An unsuccessful effort was made to get these coins for the government, it being a more nearly complete collection than the one in the Philadelphia Mint.—Cor. Springfield Republican.

A Great Prairie Fire.

A tremendous prairie fire was raging for several days in the Willow creek district. It started about Eighteen Mile lake and burned north and south to the Old Man's river, and to the McLeod trail west and the Blackfoot trail east. The New Oxley ranch people were fighting the fire with desperation, but the wind was so strong they could do nothing. The fire caught the Oxley ranch outfit while they were crossing Willow creek with some 8,000 head of cattle to summer grazing, scattering the cattle all over the country. A district fifty to sixty miles north and south and twenty to thirty miles east and west has been burned over. Experienced cattlemen say it was as bad a prairie fire as they have ever seen.—Calgary Herald.

A Patriarch Who Chops Wood.

Charles Higgins, of Mapleton, Me., who is more than 87 years of age, has been in a woochoppers' camp all winter, where he held up his end in hard work with the other young fellows. Mr. Higgins' favorite breakfast is pie and pork, with a dozen or so "flapjacks" thrown in; and to that simple and austere fare he attributes most of his present vigor. Human nature is a strange puzzle. Had this doughty old patriarch become a health food crank in early life, the chances are that he would have died at 50.—New York Tribune.

A Valuable Electrical Lantern.

By an ingenious combination of lenses Professor Stricker, of Vienna, contrives to project the magnified images of objects on a white screen in their natural colors, so that, for instance, a small pimple on a patient can be shown in its real appearance to an audience of many hundred students. One of the experiments will be a demonstration of the palpitations of the heart of a small animal.—Exchange.

A White and Red Robin.

A white and red robin astonishes the fishermen of Quonochontaug, R. I. It has built its nest in a shaggy reach of pasture near the thundering ocean breakers. The bird's body is of a snowy white, even to the tip of its tail, excepting its breast, which is a rosy red. A red and white robin was never heard of before.—Boston Journal.

County Official Paper.

The earnings of the railroads in the United States for 1889 was greater by one-half than the total revenue of the Government. It was also very nearly equal to the public debt of the United States. The gross earnings per mile averaged $6,574 and the net earnings averaged $2,117 per mile. This beats profit on farming by a big margin. The total capital stock for railroads for 1889 is given at $7,852,533,179. With all of this enormous capital combined to influence Congress and the Courts and Legislatures the few men who own it can control every branch of the Government and laugh at the masses who imagine that all power lies with them. The best security the people have for reasonably good government is that this is necessary to promote the interests of capital. All the great officers of the Government, National and State, Executive, Judicial and Legislative are in reality chosen and elected by capital. It would be laughable to see men shouting themselves hoarse about party politics were it not for the humiliation it causes to see their fellow creatures blindly moving as puppets at the will of operators who sit behind the scenes.

California State Agricultural Society Rules to govern running races. National Trotting Association Rules to govern trotting races.

In all exhibits of animals for premiums, other things being equal, blooded stock will be preferred.

All articles included in the above list, except the first department, to be on exhibition at the Pavilion on second day and remain during the Fair.

Special premiums will be allowed for articles exhibited not included in above list

If you have entries to make, attend to it at once, and when your entries are made, see to it that they are on time and at place for examination by the committee.

Accept no rumors in regard to the business of the exhibition. If you do not know what to do, inquire of the officers whose duty it is to tell you. One half of the trouble and disappointment at the Fair is caused by relying on hearsay. Attend to your business yourself. If it is done wrong you know where the blame lies.

Read the rules, and, by example, at least, assist in enforcing them; but don't forget that mistakes will occur where many people are congregated. The Board endeavors to do justice to all.

If the Superintendents and Committeemen are not always ready at the appointed hour, keep your stock and articles where you can command them at any time. Remember that we have but little time to do much business; patience, with a little system, will overcome many obstacles.

The Board will give the same special attention to details that has contributed to success in the past. It remains for the exhibitors to achieve still better results for the Fair of 1890.

ADMISSION.

Life Membership	$30 00
Membership ticket, admitting member, wife and minor children	5 00

BORN.

STERLING—At Bishop, August 7th, to Mr. and Mrs. E. H. Sterling, a daughter.

Mr. J. J. Gunn left town on Tuesday morning to attend the Democratic Convention at San Jose.

Mr. C. Wannacott was in town some days this week. He is making a canvass of the lower end of the County.

Paul W. Bennett has been nominated for District Attorney by the Republicans of San Juaquin County.

A reward of two hundred dollars is offered by Mr. Frank Fitzgerald for the arrest and conviction of William G. Alcorn.

Around Lone Pine many cattle have died of the prevailing disease. John Lucas has lost fifteen head and John Dodge twelve head. Some horses have also died.

A deluge of rain fell on the Inyo mountains opposite Independence last Wednesday. A wood hauler says a torrent 10 feet deep rushed down Mazourka canyon.

Hon. P. Reddy came up from Darwin Wednesday. He went north by train next morning, intending to lay over one day at Bishop and one at Benton and then go on to San Francisco.

Lone Pine Creek swelled suddenly a few days ago and overflowed the streets of the town. No damage was done. A heavy rain up about the base of Mount Whitney made the flood.

Near Camp Independence last Friday lightning struck and killed a colt belonging to Peter McGann. This is an occurrence so rare in Inyo County as to be considered wonderful.

At Cerro Gordo the Dunphy—O'Keefe mine continues to produce good ore and the ledge is looking well. At the Union mine no new developements are reported; prospecting is continued.

Heavy rains caused some washouts along the C. & C. road the past week, but repairs were promptly attended to and trains arrived at all stations in Inyo County on time or with very trifling delay.

Complaint comes from Lone Pine that many carcasses of animals that have died recently are allowed to be scattered about everywhere. The stench from these rotting carcasses is awful and there can be little doubt that to leave them in such condition tends to spread the disease. The bodies should be burned or buried.

During the past week or so showers have been frequent in the valley. Most of the time the mountains have been covered by dense clouds; lightning has been flashing every day and thunder has been rumbling among the peaks. There could not have been much rain high up in the mountains as the streams have not risen very much, if any.

Frank Sorba struck a body of rich ore recently in a claim about a mile east from the Defiance mine near Darwin. The ore goes about 75 per cent lead and from 170 to 210 ounces silver per ton. He has already shipped two car loads of the ore and the vein is large and appears to be extensive. Sorba has enough in sight to realize him a handsome sum.

There is now a lake two miles long and half a mile wide in Panamint Valley. This was never before seen by white men at this season of the year. A great amount of rain had fallen on the surrounding mountains; many springs and streams that had gone dry are again running and water is plentiful all over the region. This will stimulate prospecting for mines.

Mr. James Hutchings is a candidate for the Democratic nomination for District Attorney. On his application for admission to the bar some time ago Mr. Hutchings passed an examination that drew praise from all who were present. He has the credit of being a diligent law student, and if elected would give all of his ability to the discharge of his duties.

Last Sunday several men who are employed on the Eastside canal went bathing in the river near the camp. The Chinese cook was among them. Soon after entering the river the Chinaman was caught in an eddy and sank. He came to the surface very soon but sank again and was seen no more. Deceased was a good swimmer but the eddies in Owens River are very dangerous. A reward of forty dollars is offered for the recovery of the body by Pat Flynn, a well known Chinaman of Independence.

Last Wednesday we received a communication from a party in Washington making a proposition to furnish us a letter every week for publication on condition that we publish an advertisement for a patent agency. It is quite a common thing to get such propositions and they always go one way, namely, into the waste basket. There are several concerns engaged in this business in Washington and copies of the letters are sent to many papers. The letters contain nothing but stale trash that no intelligent person would read. It is true the letters might be put to one use as they are always copied on nice soft paper.

Five years ago a drift was begun in the Defiance mine at Darwin and is now about completed. The work was not pushed without interruption but was continued from time to time as circumstances permitted. The purpose of this drift is to convey air to an extensive part of the mine where much good ore had been taken out but where work had to be suspended for want of good air supply. A ledge is now tapped at various places to a depth of six hundred feet from the surface and at the bottom this ledge shows up well in fine ore and the fair presumption is that it will bear as good in the middle. A large amount of pipe for the water works is already on the ground and teams are at work hauling the remainder. The completion of the water works will be of great benefit to the mining interests of Darwin.

ANTHRAX.

Mr. John Jenkins of Georges Creek says that the disease of which many horned cattle and horses are dying in Inyo County lately, is anthrax. It is very contagious and may be communicated to sheep and swine. Human beings may contract the disease and it is very fatal. Anthrax appears most frequently on swamp and overflowed lands where there are pools of stagnant water. The most fatal form of the disease is not accompanied by external swelling and is known as anthrax fever. Another kind is accompanied by various external symptoms and according to these is called by different names, as black leg, black tongue, bloody murrain, Siberian boil plague, etc. The form of the disease in Owens Valley is Siberian boil plague. It manifests itself by swelling of the sheath in horses and by swelling of the breast, shoulder, udder or dewlap in cattle. The affected parts are hard, yellowish and streaked with red. When the virus is communicated to human beings malignant postules are produced and death is nearly certain within from 12 to 24 hours. When external swelling is not visible the disease is in its worst form and is most fatal.. It usually appears among young, thriving cattle and is very sudden in its attack and short in duration, animals that appeared well at night being found dead in the morning. Lately a good many dead animals, horses and cattle, have come under my notice and these all died of that form of anthrax called Siberian boil plague. Some rumors have been current that the disease prevalent among our animals is Texas fever. The germs of that disease are killed by frost, but our animals have died high up in the mountains where it freezes every night. When the disease is altogether internal, treatment is of no avail, but in the other forms where the patient can bear it, bleed freely and then, to full grown cattle, give a pound of Epsom salts; to calves 3 or 4 ounces; to horses 2 ounces. Dissolve the salts in warm water and add 1 or 2 ounces of extract of ginger. Follow this with one dram of nitro-muriatic acid, three grains bi-chromate of potash, 2 drams chlorate of potash, mix in half pint of water and give at one dose, two or three times daily. Sponge with cold water. If there are sores, cauterize thoroughly using clear carbolic acid, sulphuric or nitric acid. The whole of the diseased tissue must be reached. Bathe swellings with dilute carbolic acid, one part acid to sixty of water. Also inject it under the skin in several places freely. Never allow the virus to reach broken skin upon your hands or person as it is very fatal. To prevent the disease drain pastures, separate infected animals from healthy ones, bury the dead carcasses at least six feet deep or burn them. Never let the hands come in contact with a dead animal if possible, but if a body must be touched wash the hands both before and afterward in a solution of carbolic acid, one part of acid to one hundred of water. Dogs should not be allowed to come in contact with carcasses.

The anthrax plague has got a strong hold in Owens Valley and if people do not put all their energy toward stopping it losses to a serious extent will be the result. Human lives may be sacrificed by carelessness in connection with this dread disease. Stock-raisers should join together, appoint some capable person to inspect all stock and see that all sick animals are separated from the healthy; also to see that all carcasses are properly buried or destroyed by fire. Great carelessness prevails among us in this matter and to my knowledge many of the carcasses are left in the pastures to rot and spread the disease. While such indolence prevails the disease will never be stopped.

W. J. JENKINS.
Georges Creek.

Forgery.

Last Monday William Alcorn offered a check to Mr. Barnes of the Lake View Hotel at Keeler in payment for a small bill. The check appeared to be made by Frank Fitzgerald and was for $93. Mr. Fitzgerald's checks are received as coin anywhere in the County. This one was readily accepted by Mr. Barnes who retained the amount due by Alcorn and paid him the balance in coin. A similar check for $72 was offered by Alcorn to Mike Anton and a third for $25 was offered to John Morton. Both of these were as readily accepted as the first and the coin was paid by these parties to Alcorn. Mr. J. E. Reynolds, agent for Mr. Fitzgerald, was in Lone Pine on Monday. On Tuesday afternoon he was in Keeler on his way back to Lookout. The checks were shown him and he at once pronounced them forgeries. Alcorn had left Keeler on the north bound train the same morning. Mr. Barnes telegraphed Sheriff Eldred at Independence but before it was possible to arrest Alcorn the train had crossed the State line and was in Nevada. The Sheriff and District Attorney Gill had the necessary papers prepared, Mr. Reynolds appeared before C. Mulholland, Justice of Peace, and made affidavit to the complaint, a warrant was issued for Alcorn's arrest and the whole were telegraphed to Sacramento with a request that a requisition be made upon the Governor of Nevada for the surrender of Alcorn. In the mean time Mr. Reynolds had telegraphed to Mr. Fitzgerald, who is at Los Angeles, and the latter replied to spare no expense to secure the arrest and conviction of the forger. It was ascertained by telegram that Alcorn had gone to Candelaria and Sheriff Eldred wired the Sheriff at Hawthorne, Nevada, to hold him. Sheriff Eldred will go to Hawthorne tomorrow and doubtless by the time he gets there he will have the necessary authority from the Governor of Nevada to bring back his man.

Joseph and Joseph's Papa.

The small boy was fond of music and there was an opera in town. It was Sunday night, but he stole out, having been refused permission by his mother, and got away down in front by the fiddles. He sat there listening delightedly, when he turned around and suddenly discovered his father all alone in the next occupied seat. He made no excuse. He looked up and nodded pleasantly.

"How do you do, sir?"

"What? Joseph?"

"Yes, sir."

"Does your mother know you are here?"

"No, sir. She wouldn't let me come."

"And aren't you—well—ahem"——

A sense of justice struck the old man, and the small boy knew he was quite safe. So they enjoyed the opera together, and then they started home. There was an awkward silence between them. The small boy waited for his father to speak.

"Ahem! Joseph—we will not—it would be better—that is—you needn't allude to this matter before your mother."

"No, sir."

There was another long pause. Again the old man spoke, hesitatingly:

"Ahem! Joseph, how—how—did you get out of the house this evening?"

"By the back door, sir."

"Well—ahem—Joseph, we'll go in by the back way quietly, and not disturb the household."

And they went in the back way.

Next morning at breakfast the two met without any sign. The mother spoke up:

"Mr. Smith, I am sure I do not know whatever is to come of that boy Joseph."

"What is the matter, my dear?"

"Do you know he actually came and asked me to let him go to the opera last night—Sunday!"

"You refused, of course?"

"Certainly; what a question."

Then the father sternly turned to the boy.

"Joseph, I am surprised. Are there not enough week days for you to go to the opera that you must go on Sundays?"

"Yes, sir. And I was going to ask you to give me some money to go to-night."

The old man looked at the small boy, who was ingeniously looking up in his face, and said nothing; but when they left the table he took him by the ear and said:

"You young rascal, I suppose you are going to bleed me for tickets every night?"

"Yes, sir," said the boy, candidly.

And he got them.—San Francisco Chronicle.

BANKRUPT PRINCES.

One Who Smoked $3 Cigars and Lost $450,000 in a Single Night.

Bankruptcy appears to be becoming fashionable among the great princes of Germany. Within two months Prince Albert, of the sovereign house of Waldeck; Prince Charles, of the reigning family of Liechtenstein, and Prince Trautmannsdorff have all three been declared insolvent debtors and placed "unter curatelle," and now Prince Frederick IV, of Salmi-Kyrburg, has been subjected to a similar ignominy. Forty-four years of age, and the possessor of numerous titles, including that of a Rhinegrave and of a Spanish Grandee of the first class, his debts amount to about $3,000,000.

During the course of the legal proceedings it was shown that until his father's death he had been forced to content himself with a paltry allowance of $1,200 per annum, which, although possibly sufficient for the wants of an ordinary mortal, was far from adequate for a high and mighty prince who refuses to smoke anything but Havana cigars at $3 apiece. Under the circumstances it is not surprising that it should have been a tobacco merchant who first instituted the steps that finally landed his highness in the bankruptcy court and resulted in his being placed "unter curatelle."

This "unter curatelle" condition is one that is exceedingly unpleasant. It is equivalent to a declaration of perpetual minority, and the person on whom it is imposed is not only declared incapable of managing his own affairs, but is practically outlawed and deprived of the electoral franchise and almost every other right of citizenship. No civil contract entered into by him is valid. His signature is of no account in point of law, and from the legal point of view he is nobody—as unsubstantial as the family ghost and as irresponsible as a babe unborn.

Prince Trautmannsdorff was the president of the Austrian Jockey club, where he lost in a single night $450,000 at cards. With a view of retrieving his fortunes he straightaway purchased for a rise a large number of options on wheat and other cereals, which, however, greatly to his dismay, took a downward instead of an upward course, rendering him thereby liable for differences to the tune of $8,000,000.

Another well known personage who is at present "unter curatelle," and whose name is well known in the United States, is Baron Victor Erlanger, once a magnate of European finance, but now an exile residing on the shores of Lake Geneva in Switzerland. A suit was brought against the trustees of his bankruptcy, in the course of which the whole circumstances of his ruin were again made public.—Cor. New York Tribune.

Never Forgave It.

"That man is evidently your enemy. How comes it?"

"He was formerly my warm friend."

"And you did some act which cost you his regard?"

"Yes, he was once about to engage in a piece of folly that would have resulted in his ruin, when I imprudently interfered and saved him."—Chicago Times.

Expose Your Cows.

An Indiana cow which gave two quarts of milk per day was struck by lightning while in the pasture and had a horn knocked off. Since that date her yield has been eight quarts, with not the slightest trace of brimstone. If you have an old cow stand her out.—Detroit Free Press.

Sir Boyle Roche.

Perhaps a few particulars about Sir Boyle Roche, the high priest of Irish "bulls," might be interesting to your readers. He was of the ancient family of the De La Russes, of Fermoy, was member for Tralee from 1775, and was created a baronet in 1782. He began one of his speeches in the Irish house of commons as follows: "Mr. Speaker, it is the duty of every true lover of his country to give his last guinea to save the remainder of his fortunes." And another began: "Sir, single misfortunes never come alone, and the greatest of all national calamities is generally followed by one much greater." A letter of his is still preserved, supposed to have been written during the rebellion of '98, though it is doubtful if he ever put so many "bulls" together on paper. It is as follows:

"DEAR SIR—Having now a little peace and quiet, I sit down to inform you of the bustle and confusion we are in from the bloodthirsty rebels, many of whom are now, thank God, killed and dispersed. We are in a pretty mess, can get nothing to eat, and no wine to drink except whisky. When we sit down to dinner we are obliged to keep both hands armed. While I write this I have my sword in one hand and my pistol in the other. I concluded from the beginning that this would be the end, and I am right, for it is not half over yet. At present there are such goings on that everything is at a standstill. I should have answered your letter a fortnight ago, but I only received it this morning. Indeed, hardly a mail arrives safe without being robbed. No longer ago than yesterday, the mail coach from Dublin was robbed near this town; the bags had been very judiciously left behind, and by great good luck there was nobody in the coach but two outside passengers who had nothing for the thieves to take. Last Thursday, an alarm was given that a gang of rebels in full retreat from Drogheda were advancing under the French standard; but they had no colors nor any drums except bagpipes. Immediately every man in the place, including women and children, ran out to meet them. We soon found our force a great deal too little, and were far too near to think of retreating. Death was in every face, and to it we went. By the time half our party was killed, we began to be all alive. Fortunately the rebels had no guns except pistols, cutlasses and pikes, and we had plenty of muskets and ammunition. We put them all to the sword, not a soul of them escaped, except some that were drowned in an adjoining bog. In fact, in a short time nothing was heard but silence. Their uniforms were all different, chiefly green. After the action was over we went to rummage their camp. All we found was a few pikes without heads, a parcel of empty bottles filled with water, and a bundle of blank French commissions, filled with Irish names. Troops are now stationed round, which exactly squares with my ideas of security. Adieu! I have only time to add that I am yours in great haste, B. R.

"P. S.—If you do not receive this, of course it must have been miscarried; therefore I beg you to write and let me know."—London Spectator.

He Lost His Job.

Klager, the famous actor, was engaged to play the part of Gessler in "William Tell" at the Leipsic theatre. Being a great favorite with the students, he sat boozing one afternoon with several rich undergrads from Courland. When the time for the performance drew near his boon companions tried to persuade him from going to the theatre, but as he remained proof against their entreaties, one of the gentlemen offered to stand three hampers of champagne if Klager was not back at the tavern by 8 o'clock. To the astonishment of the company Klager proferred to pay for the champage himself if he did not return by that time, says a foreign exchange.

As he could not possibly have been struck down by Tell's arrow at the hour stated, the jovial party wondered how he would get over the difficulty, and accompanied him to the theatre. Here the action of the play went on much as usual until the scene of the apple. But when Tell said: "Am I compelled to aim with my cross bow at the head of my child? Rather will I die!" Gessler went up to him, shook him by the hand and said: "I really cannot blame you, Tell, I wouldn't do it myself; let us be friends." Of course the curtain was dropped. Klager was back at the tavern by 8 o'clock and won his bet, but naturally lost his engagement at the Leipsic theatre.—New York Telegram.

Effect of Imagination.

That the imagination has much to do in governing our physical welfare cannot be denied. We see too many instances of it. The doctor who testified on the witness stand a few days ago that the profession frequently gave patients dough pills, or some other subterfuge, and thereby relieved their minds, told what was known by many as the truth. People who imagine they are sick must be made to imagine that they are going through the necessary course of treatment. But I know of one peculiar case where a man left home in perfect health, and was made to believe he was ill by being frequently told that he looked very bad. It was a put up job and was done to test the effect of the imagination. The man became quite ill before he returned home, and merely because he was made to believe he was so.—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

The Military Salute.

The military custom of saluting by bringing the hand into a horizontal position over the eyebrows is supposed to date back to the tournaments of the Middle Ages, when, after the Queen of Beauty was enthroned, the Knights who were to take part in the sports of the day marched past the dais on which she sat, and as they passed shielded their eyes from the rays of her beauty. The principal part of the officer's salute, kissing the hilt of the sword, dates also from the Middle Ages. When the Crusaders were on the march to the Holy City, the Knights were in the daily custom of planting their long two hand swords upright in the ground, thereby forming a cross, and before these they performed their morning devotions. On all military occasions they kissed the hilts of their swords in token of devotion to the Cross, for the prayers of the soldiers were formerly considered of such efficacy that they were made an essential part of their duty.—True Flag.

AN ECCENTRIC PUG DOG.

A Little Animal Who Chews Gum and Amuses His Acquaintances.

A most intelligent and interesting pug dog is owned by Miss Nellie Payfair, of the Forest house, in Scranton, Pa. His name is Don, and besides being intelligent and cunning, he is occasionally as mischievous as he can be. Miss Payfair has trained Don so well that, although he hates and dreads to be put into his bath tub, he now readily submits to the infliction and trots off to the bath room when ever he sees that preparations are being made to relieve him of the mud which has stuck to his hair while he has been romping with curs in the street. Don possesses an appetite that is remarkable from the fact that he always seems hungry. In addition to the ordinary articles of food that all dogs like, he is very fond of sugar, and if any of the hotel guests are kind enough to toss him a cube of white loaf sweetness, he will catch it on the fly, crunch it quickly, lick his chops for more and look wistfully at the hand from which the lump came. Don will sit on his haunches and stick out his tongue at the command of his owner, and he will take a whipping with the most serious face imaginable after he has returned from a runaway spell which he knew he did wrong to take. When Don has been properly dealt with for his willful disobedience of orders, he frisks and capers about for a time, but he soon forgets the gentle chastisement and probably lets some less favored dog lead him away from the door again before nightfall, coming back in the evening to have his jacket tanned once more for his forgetfulness.

But the most peculiar and remarkable characteristic about Don is his habit of chewing gum and the way he has of getting possession of a delicious morsel of that article when nobody is looking. Toss a quid of gum toward him and he will catch it in his mouth, scamper away to a corner of the room, settle down into a comfortable position and chew away on it with as much apparent satisfaction as a western girl. He doesn't try to swallow it, and after he has sat in the corner for awhile he takes a walk around, chewing meditatively as he goes, and looking as serious as a person 90 years old. Dr. J. S. Walden lives on Spruce street, a few doors from the Forest house, and Don frequently trots over to the doctor's office to play with the doctor's little son George. George has the habit of chewing gum, too, and he also had the habit until recently of plastering his quid on the under side of the table top whenever he desired to give his jaws a resting spell.

When little George went to look for his gum one day it wasn't where he had put it. So he bought a new stick and when he got tired of chewing it he stuck it in the old place. It was gone when he wanted it, and little George accused various members of the family of having stolen his quid. They denied the impeachment point blank, and little George began to wonder why his gum disappeared in a mysterious way. Half a dozen quids were lost on as many different days, and little George believed that the folks had been fibbing to him and that they had been stealing his gum in order to see if they couldn't break him of the habit of chewing. But one day he caught the thief. In an unguarded moment Miss Payfair's dog stood up on his hind feet and gobbled up George's quid from underneath the table, and little George then knew it was he who had been making away with the gum from day to day.

There is nothing vicious about Don and the guests at the hotel admire him for his intelligence, even temper and many cunning and interesting tricks. Don is of a very jealous nature, and he makes a great fuss whenever he sees anybody fondle or caress any other dog that may happen to be in the hotel. At such times he pushes the other dog out of the way if he can, looks pleadingly at the caresser, sits close to him and silently asks to be fondled and rubbed. While Don is actually not worth $100, Miss Payfair would probably be disinclined to part with him for twice that amount.—Chicago Journal.

Causes and Increase of Blindness.

Dr. Lucien Howe, of Buffalo, read a report from the committee appointed two years previously to make investigations in this line. They had found that the number of blind was rapidly increasing in proportion to population, and more so the further south one went, and especially in the states of Nebraska, Arizona, Nevada and Dakota. Most of the existing blindness was due to infectious diseases of the cornea and conjunctiva. Emigration was increasing the number of those going about with infectious conditions of the eye, such as trachoma, which was common among the lower Irish. They urged that the duty of cleaning the eyes of children after birth should be made more familiar to the public. In asylums and schools, children having such diseases should be quarantined. A similar regulation should be enforced in barracks and prisons.—Medical Record.

Novel Cure for Rheumatism.

Dr. Tere contributes to The Wiener Medicinische Presse a novel method of curing rheumatism. He observed that, when rheumatic persons were stung by bees, the swelling which usually follows such stings were very slow in appearing, and, if the persons were stung repeatedly, it did not appear at all; the result of such continued stinging being to cure the rheumatism, which showed no tendency to recur. He followed out this idea in the cases of 173 persons, 39,000 stings being required. Both acute and chronic cases were cured by this treatment.

"Evarts' Private Distillery."

It was Mr. Evarts who preserved the reputation of the Hayes regime, when Mrs. Hayes and the Ladies' Ebenezer Temperance association of Washington were doing all they could to destroy it. Mr. Evarts had a colored man named "Pete," who services were invaluable on the occasions of White House dinners. He had charge of what the boys used to call "Evarts' private distillery," and when members of the diplomatic corps and other patrons emerged from it on their way to join Mrs. Hayes and the ladies, Pete used to dispatch them with the warning: "De gemmen will please get froo wipen off dar moufs befo' settin' down to table." Eminent statesmen and diplomats who recall those halcyon days always smack their lips when they think of Pete and the "private distillery."—Brooklyn Eagle.

Manufactures of the Great Sierra Kidney and Liver Cure:

GENTLEMEN:—I have been a sufferer from kidney complaint for several years, and have used medicine upon medicine without any apparent relief until a friend of mine told me of the wonderful cures accomplished by your remedy. I was induced to buy a bottle but without much faith. After using the first bottle I noticed such an improvement I kept on until I had taken three bottles, and can safely say that I am entirely cured and never felt better in my life. I can gladly recommend The Great Sierra Kidney and Liver Cure to all people that are suffering in any way with kidney or urinary disorders.

Respectfully Yours,

A BOY'S GREAT LUCK.

He Saved His Pennies Until They Reached One Hundred and Then Drew $15,000.

The mother of little Johnnie Kilgallon of 2041 Firth street says her boy is a lucky child. He was born on July 11, 1879, and now has $15,000 in bank. His parents are poor and live in humble quarters. The father, a dyer by trade, was without a situation for several weeks, and in order to provide a living for his family of four children, obtained employment temporarily as a hod carrier.

Johnnie, the eldest child, earned five cents every day by carrying dinner for a neighbor to his work shop. The weekly savings were deposited in a small bank at home. Ten days ago the father, unused to hod-carrying, went home almost exhausted and remarked to his wife: "If I had a dollar now I would invest it in a Louisiana S'ate Lottery ticket." The son heard the remark and quickly said:

"Pop, I got a dollar in my bank. Buy a ticket for me."

After talking over the suggestion with his wife the husband agreed to invest the dollar and a one-twentieth of ticket No. 45,550 in The Louisiana State Lottery was purchased in the name of the boy. Luck smiled on the investment and on Thursday last a telegram was recieved announcing that the ticket had drawn the first capital prize of $5,000. The good news was a great surprise to Kilgallon, who recieved the telegram, and he quit work to find out if the news was really true.

He soon learned that the money was on the way to this city in the custody of the Adams Express Company and by giving proof that he was the boy's father received the $15,000, that being one-twentieth of the capital prize. He deposited $14,000 in a Chestnut street Savings fund and the remainder in a Kensington bank.

"Johnnie has always brought luck to us," said his mother this morning. "One day a colored fortune teller came to our house and he said that July 11, 1879, was a lucky day. I believe it, for Johnnie never caused us any trouble or uneasiness, and you know children as a rule, are always doing something to worry their parents. He is a lucky boy and I think he can strike the capital prize again next month. We are going to buy a house for him and take the deed in his name. The remainder of the money will be invested in good securities."—Philadelphia (Pa.) Herald May 26.

INFERNAL INGENUITY

Could scarcely devise more excruciating tortures than those of which you see the evidences in the face of a rheumatic or neuralgic sufferer. The agonies are the consequence of not checking a rheumatic or neuralgic attack at the outset. Hostetter's Stomach Bitters has been found by skillful medical practitioners to possess not only remedial, but defensive efficacy, where those diseases exists, or a tendency to them is exhibited. Surely this puissant but safe botanic medicine, bearing, too, such high specific sanction, is better than the poisons often employed, but most unsafe, not only in continuance, but in isolated doses. The blood is depurated thoroughly from the rheumatic virus, and the nerves, slightly impurged upon, save from ultimate and direful throes by this benign, saving medicine, which likewise exhibits marked efficacy for malaria, kidney complaints, dyspepsia, constipation and liver complaint.

In the Eyes

"Our little girl nineteen months old was troubled with scrofulous sores. Her eyes were in a terrible condition, and her nose all covered with scab. Physicians said they could not cure her. We commenced giving her Hood's Sarsaparilla, and now, after using two bottles in the past three months, her face and eyes are clear of the sores, and her appetite has returned. We feel very thankful for finding so valuable a medicine as Hood's Sarsaparilla to save our child." J. A. GREY, 453 Minor Avenue, Stockton, Cal.

On the Face

"Last December I was afflicted with scrofulous sores on the left side of my face and around my right ear, and was obliged to leave work. Hood's Sarsaparilla was recommended, and after taking less than two bottles all the sores disappeared. JOSEPH V. A. FRATES, 226 Hollis St., Oakland, Cal.

A VALUABLE REMEDY.

Hon. Edmund L. Pitts, the late President of the New York State Senate, writes:

"STATE OF NEW YORK, SENATE CHAMBER, ALBANY, March 11, 1886.

I have used ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTERS in my family for the past five years, and can truthfully say they are a valuable remedy and effect great cures. I would not be without them. I have in several instances given some to friends suffering with weak and lame backs, and they have invariably afforded certain and speedy relief. They cannot be too highly commended."

LOCAL ABSORPTION

THE LA SALLE REMEDIES.

For all forms of nervous waste, decay, exhaustion and debility, whether due to disease of certain organs or not.

Also the new and direct method of arresting abnormal urinary discharges and restoring to the impotent their departed vigor.

Successful Where All Else has Failed. The La Salle Method and its Advantages.

Our preparations are called "The La Salle Remedies," from the fact that we procured the original formula of the celebrated Dr. La Salle of Paris, under guarantee that should we think proper to introduce at any time his remedies to the American public we would do so under that title.

Some years ago Dr. La Salle conceived the idea of treating nervous and seminal diseases by rectal medication, believing he would gain the following advantages:

(1.) Application of the drugs directly to the seat of the diseases.

(2.) Avoidance of digestion and neutralization of the active medicalagents, there being no stomach drugging.

(3.) The patient can cure himself at very little expense without any physician.

(4.) Their use requires no change of diet or of the ordinary pursuits of life.

(5.) They are absolutely harmless.

(6.) Close approach to the lower apertures of emergence of the spinal nerves from the vertebral column, and hence ease of penetrating to the nervous fluid and matter of the brain and spinal cord.

Feeble men, whose strength is impaired will find a sure and permanent cure in Dr. La Salle's remedies.

THE LA SALLE BOLUS.

The word Bolus is a Latin name, and means a large pill.

In the preparation of the La Salle Bolus, we use the best cocoa butter for holding and preserving the various drugs, thus making their introduction a very easy matter.

They pass into the rectum with the most perfect ease, by means of a little pressure from the finger.

This metaod of treatment leaves behind no traces to excite the curiosity of any one.

Diseases of the Kidneys, Bladder, Prostate Gland.—Their Treatment and Cure Without Stomach Medication.

SYMPTOMS.—Frequent urination, rising at night to urinate; pain or scalding in passing water; dribbling of urine after completing the act; enlargement of the prostate gland; Bright's Disease of the Kidneys. The most decided benefit is derived by placing these remedies right at the spot where they will do the most good. When the Bolus is introduced into the rectum, it rests directly at the neck of the bladder.

MR. JOHN W. FURBUSH
An Army Veteran,
OF WAKEFIELD,

who has probably suffered more than any man or woman in America to-day. Taken sick while in the Army, he has endured untold agonies since. Describing his first symptoms he said: "My head ached and my appetite was poor. I felt a faintness at the pit of the stomach, and a bad taste in my mouth, while my skin was sometimes hot and sometimes cold. I next felt pains in my back and around the lower portion of my body, and noticed a peculiar odor and color in the water I passed, which was scanty at one time and free at others. Sometimes it pained me to void it, and again it was almost impossible to do so at all. Finally I began to pass clear blood accompanied with the greatest strain and agony."

No less than 20 eminent physicians attended Mr. Furbush at various times, but not one of them could help him. He was near death's door. And yet he says: "I am alive and well to-day, wholly through the wonderful power of Hunt's Remedy which took me from the verge of the grave."

This Great Remedy absolutely cures all Kidney, Liver and Urinary Diseases.

EVERYONE SPEAKS WELL OF IT.

Rochester, N. Y., March 18, '86.

For many years I have been troubled with severe pains in the back of my head and neck, the pain being so sevese at times that I was nearly insane, and my friends feared that I would be. Lumps as large as a hickory-nut, would swell up on my forehead and neck. I tried many different kinds of medicines and physicians, but none seemed to reach my case, until I commenced the use of Dr. Pardee's Rheumatic Remedy, and before I had used it four days, the pain left my neck and shoulders and went to my hips and limbs. I continued taking the remedy, and the disease seemed to work downward, but there was but little pain. I am still using the remedy, and I feel confident it will entirely cure me; for I am so much better and stronger than I have been for years. I cheerfully recommend it to all.

Very respectfully yours,
MRS.

HE WILL FALL IN LOVE, SURE!

O the woman of the future! I can see her through a haze;
She is coming minus bustle, she is coming minus stays;
I can see her through the shadows of the present's misty light,
She is coming, she is coming, like an angel of delight.

The woman of the future! O how beautiful she seems,
As in fancy I behold her, in the brightest of my dreams;
In fancy I behold her, and I long to hear her voice
Ringing down the pleasant valleys, "I am coming, O rejoice!"

The woman of the future will not trifle with our hearts,
She will find more time to study into sciences and arts;
She will not be too disdainful, irreverent and proud,
But with all the highest virtues and attainments be endowed.

The woman of the future will be modest in her looks,
She will sing the sweetest ballads and peruse the choicest books;
Her sympathies will widen and her goodness will extend,
Until the poor shall bless her and the weak shall call her friend.

The woman of the future will not throw herself away
For the ballroom's giddy pleasures, bringing wrinkles and decay;
Nor drink the honeyed nectar of enchantment long and deep,
Sowing seeds of dissipation that in anguish she must reap.

The woman of the future will come to us as pure
As the fragrant Easter lilies, and her fame will rest secure;
When she comes to dwell among us, in her eyes that light will be
That we have never seen on land, nor not yet upon the sea.

O the woman of the future will be generous and brave,
And her honor she will cherish without blemish to the grave.
In joy I wait her coming, she will blossom like a rose,
And her heart will find a lover who is worthy to propose!

—Moses Gage Shirley, in Boston Globe.

How Women Can Dress Well.

There is no reason in the world why anybody should have an unbecoming costume this season. In fabrics and in colors all sorts and conditions of women are catered to, and all tones, from the faintest to the deepest, are deftly wrought out so that the particular shade that the wise woman finds becoming to her can be gotten without any trouble. There are plain colors for a woman who likes stuffs that are not conspicuous. There are spots big and little, plaids bias and straight and stripes of all widths and kinds. Be a little careful in choosing your colors, and remember that because somebody tells you how well you look in a costume of navy blue you must not conclude that every blue shade is suited to you, for that extremely trying but very beautiful one known as army makes the average woman's complexion look as yellow as a lemon.

Because scarlet makes your hair look warmer and gives a deeper color to your eyes, it does not follow that magenta is suited to you. General rules do not apply to women who are nothing if not individual. Somebody says that small bonnets are universally becoming, and you, whose face is rather broad, whose nose is a bit retrousse, put one on and believe you look well. A bonnet, more than anything else, needs to be tried on, and although one may generalize and say bonnets are ladylike it can no more be asserted that bonnets are always becoming than it could be that all women are good figures. So just think out things before you choose them.—Mrs. Mallon in Ladies' Home Journal.

An Almost Forgotten Minstrel.

I meet Billy Birch, the old time minstrel, on Broadway nearly every afternoon. Billy's face has been seen "on the end" by nearly every theatre goer in the country. He hangs around the Bijou theatre now most of these sunny days, enjoying the society of a newer generation. Billy is portly, white haired and lame. He says one of his confounded legs seems to be older than the other. It is the one he used to bang the tambourine on while Charley Backus held up the other wing of the circle. Birch is chuck full of stories of the stage and the road—stories that he tells with great gusto. What a story of life such a man could tell if he could use a pen as well as he can use his tongue. Birch and Backus were the two most popular end men who ever traveled. Poor Backus was shot down on Broadway years ago, while Birch lingers, a poor man, too old to work and too jolly and vigorous to die. —Cor. Pittsburg Dispatch.

Germans Leaving Russia.

According to our Odessa correspondent upwards of ten thousand German families of the colonial agriculturist class have, during the last two years, emigrated from southern Russia to America. The facility with which these emigrants obtain foreign passports from the provincial authorities appears in itself to manifest a desire on the part of the government to be rid of the German colonists. The comparatively few Germans who of late years have sought Russian naturalization have been refused legitimation. The power and influence of the landed nobility, which have revived under the Tolstoi reforms, promise anything but an encouraging future for the German agricultural colonies of southern Russia. A more general emigration of the German colonists is at present only retarded by the utterly ruinous prices just now obtainable for their holdings.—London News.

A graphic history of the new library building at Washington is being prepared. At regular intervals, from the top of the building, occupied by the superintending architect and his force of draftsmen, a camera is turned upon the work, which at present consists only of a great hole dug out in the square east of the Capitol grounds.

The resulting picture shows every detail of the condition of the work, the height of the foundation wall, the piles of material on hand, etc. It is proposed to file these photographs away, properly labeled in such form that they can be produced if any question arises as to what was done or was not done at any stage of the work.—Carpentry and Building.

The Lantern Slide.

In proportion to the skill and labor involved in its preparation, the lantern slide confers greater pleasure upon the amateur photographer than is embodied in any product of the camera and dark room. It and its counterpart, the transparency, are sources of an enjoyment in which profit to the artistic sense forms a very large percentage. The manipulation of the lantern slide calls for simpler processes than is the case with the negative destined for the making of prints, and these processes can be carried on successfully with less care as to the light employed. The slide is pre-eminently calculated to give satisfaction to the amateur whose home appliances for developing are not of the best. Once made and ready for the lantern, the slide is an epitome of prints. The flood of light poured through its translucent glass and the image thereon becomes, upon the screen, a life size picture, possessed of a fidelity and clearness of detail that a Meissonier could hardly hope to equal. In this form the slide appeals to the eye with a potency no print can possess, and stands next to nature's self in reproducing the beauties of a landscape, the charm and majesty of the ocean, the subtle power of architecture and of sculpture, or the portraits of men and women loved and esteemed by their fellows, or of childish beauty caught unerringly by the instantaneous process.

There is no end to the variety of charm possessed by this form of photographic art, and the rapid increase of interest among amateurs, in this direction, must make the lantern slide a dominant feature in the art. The establishment of the International exchange for the encouragement of lantern slide exhibitions, vastly widens the scope of this adjunct to amateur photography. The portability of the slide renders it available in this direction. A hundred slides can be sent half way around the globe, to show forth, at the distant point, the scenes familiar to the eyes of the senders, yet so novel and interesting to the recipients. The dweller in Calcutta can look upon a life size portrayal of the most interesting establishments of Pittsburg, and episodes of social life in the East End can be laid before the members of an amateur society in Paris, or Berlin, or Vienna.—Pittsburg Bulletin.

Author Murray.

A gentleman who has just returned from a six months' residence in London, where he spent much of his time among the literary men, has some interesting gossip to tell concerning one or two of the novelists which will bear repeating. Speaking of David Christie Murray, the author of "Val Strange," "Joseph's Coat," and numberless other stories, he said: "Murray is one of the most interesting men in London. He has had the hardest of work to attain his present position. From boyhood he has made his way unaided and like many other writers of fiction he came up from newspaper work, and his early journalistic training has been of inestimable value to him. After working for a long time on The Birmingham News, he resolved to see London, and arrived in the city with but little to keep body and soul together. While casting about for some road to fortune he wrote an article on "Impecunious London," which was printed in one of the weeklies and served to open a new field of work to him. The paper, it need hardly be said, was founded upon his own experiences, and its success encouraged him later to set out on an extended tour as an amateur tramp. To put it out of his power to enjoy creature comforts he mailed a bank note to the care of a post office nearly 100 miles away and started to walk to it. He had not a penny to buy lodging or food, he stopped at many of the poor house hotels which lay on his path, worked a bit when nothing else would secure food in true tramp style, and, arriving at the longed for postoffice, secured his money and reveled in luxurious comforts. He is a member of the Savage club, London, and one of its shining lights."—Philadelphia Times.

Too Much for the Mosquitoes.

W. A. Sanders thus expresses himself in defense of a tree upon which there has of late been a disposition to open warfare: "I have more of these trees (eucalyptus) growing than can be found anywhere else in the San Joaquin valley—great monsters 120 feet tall, containing over a cord of wood each, grown from seed in the past ten years. You can see my eucalyptus groves from the cars of the Southern Pacific railroad from Goshen to Fowler, a distance of over twenty miles. I wish to add a fact to your recommendation of this tree—a fact too important to be overlooked. The eucalyptus globulus, when grown in large quantities, gives entire exemption from mosquitoes. Here at my home we have acres of dense shade, a big, sluggish ditch that is always full of water, and in all of our prolonged summer and autumn heat never a mosquito, while among the willows of King's river, two miles away, they swarm at times in clouds and literally devour their unprotected victims."—Tulare (Cal.) Register.

An Ample Excuse.

In an uptown church last Sunday evening, when the pastor had got well into his sermon, he noticed an unusual commotion among the choir, at his right. He tried to ignore it, but the trouble became so lively that he felt it his duty to rebuke the singers in a loud voice. The disturbance finally quieted down and the services proceeded with due dignity. A member of the choir managed to communicate to the much put out pastor the cause of the uneasiness before the services were concluded. It was a mouse—only a little mouse. But with the perversity of its kind, this little mouse had managed to get under the skirts of one of the ladies. The good pastor forthwith explained to the congregation that the trouble had been unavoidable—that no blame attached to the choir.—Buffalo Courier.

The Professor Was Too Slow.

Assistant District Attorney Harry Macdona tells a story about a fight for copy between a newspaper editor and a scientist. The occasion was the last solar eclipse and the office in which it occurred was under the management of Maurice Minton. Telegrapic communication was established at various points, but returns came in slowly. A noted professor of astronomy had charge. The time for going to press was approaching, and from the sanctum in which the astronomer was installed no copy was forthcoming. Finally Mr. Minton came in and contemplated the professor, seated amid tomes of scientific data, hard at work on some abstruse calculation,

"Any copy yet, professor?—it's getting late."

"My dear sir, I have not been able to justify this calculation"——

"But," interrupted Minton, "we go to press pretty soon and must have some copy."

No answer. The professor was deep in his calculation.

In fifteen minutes the editor bounced in again. There was no copy. Several unopened telegrams lay by the hand of the professor, who had not yet "justified" his calculation. Gradually the paper was filled up save the space for the eclipse stuff. There was no more time to wait.

"Have you any copy, professor?" fairly yelled Minton.

"My dear sir, really, I"— Minton could stand no more. With a bound he seized the telegrams and as fast as the envelopes dropped to the floor a reporter grabbed the contents and put them into shape. Just as the professor awoke from his scientific reverie he heard Minton yell, "send out that stud head for the eclipse."

Before the scientist had justified that astounding order there was a steady roar downstairs and the paper had gone to press. Some time after the paper was on the street the spectacled professor laid a pile of scientific data upon Minton's desk. The editor bowed but the copy didn't move. The professor's opportunity was lost.—New York Graphic.

That Was Different.

Sometimes amusing mistakes are made by actors in regard to their letters. Horace Weston, the champion banjo player of the United States, is fond of telling an anecdote in point. Mr. Weston is a colored gentleman of distinguished manners and appearance.

"When I was in England with Jarret and Palmer," Mr. Weston says, "I was constantly in receipt of letters from women praising my performance and requesting interviews. I always took these to Mr. Jarrett, who would advise me to pay no attention to them and would throw them into the waste basket.

"One day a strange looking letter reached me, which I glanced at hastily, saw that it was a request from a lady and laid down again. Some days later I handed it over with a lot of others to Mr. Jarrett.

"Soon I was startled by an exclamation from that gentleman. I looked up. His eyes seemed to be bulging from his head.

"'Where—where did you get this?' he gasped, holding out the strange letter.

"Oh, it's only one of those blame fool mash letters,' I answered.

"'One of those blame fool mash letters?' cried Mr. Jarrett, in great excitement. 'For heaven's sake, man! it's an invitation to appear before the queen!'

"And so in fact it was. H. R. H. Victoria Regina, through her secretary, requested my presence at Windsor castle at a certain date.

"Luckily the date was not then passed, and we succeeded in patching up the matter without any international complications."—New York Herald.

How Kentucky Mutton Is Raised.

A few years ago a party of British noblemen escaped from their cages and blew over here. It was, if the recollection is correct, when the Duke of Sutherland was in America for the first time with Mrs. Blair. Anyway, when they got to Washington some kind heart steered them up against Col. Dick Wintersmith, who did his very best to entertain them, and brought out some of his oldest and rarest stories.

The Englishmen warmed and did their best, and, as all Englishmen do, came down to Southdown mutton. How they praised that mutton, and said there was nothing like it in the world, told how its peculiar and exquisite flavor was due not alone to the rich grasses of the Downs, but to the snails which abounded there, and which the sheep ate with avidity.

"Snails," said Col. Dick, hoarsely, as he laid a restraining hand upon the speaker's arm. "Don't say another word. Come with me."

He led the way to Chamberlain's and had a brief confab with John. Half an hour later the party were eating some of that Kentucky mutton which has fame on three continents. The Englishmen were forced to acknowledge its superiority in fineness and flavor.

"Gentlemen," said Col. Wintersmith, gravely, "for two months before our Kentucky mutton is slaughtered it is fed exclusively on chopped blue grass and pate de foie gras."—Washington Post.

Names of Places in Maine.

A Hiram correspondent of The Oxford Democrat thows some light on the origin of names of places in that vicinity. Bill Merrill mountain got its name from one William Merrill, a hunter, who got caught on the mountain in a severe snow storm and couldn't make any one hear his calls for assistance. It is said he always calls for help now just before a storm. Another hill near Hiram is named Old Mare's hill from a poor old horse that some one turned out to starve to death, and a steep precipice near a road has been known as Horse H-ll ever since a horse fell down there and was kicked over the bank by its owner.—Lewiston Journal.

THE SOCIETY WOMAN OF TODAY.

Those That Are Sought After Are Not the Girls, but Women of 30 or Over.

"The buds," says Rustan, "are a nine days' wonder, and are much talked of for that space of time, but it is the women past 30 who are the most interesting in America. They seem to have the gift of eternal youth, and at 50 are more agreeable looking than the women of any other country."

Rustan's observation will surprise people whose sole knowledge of fashionable society is derived from the chroniclers of a quarter or half century back; but to the onlooker, as well as to the foreign traveler, it is patent that there is a great physical change in the American society woman as exemplified in New York. They hold their age in an astonishing and unprecedented manner and seem not to attain the zenith of their beauty till a point beyond which they are hopelessly passe. Men say that the women of today are at 35 no older than they formerly were at 25, and that there is a corresponding difference all along the line; that consequently they dress younger without incongruity, and that beyond and above all this they have learned to grow old with grace, which means that they have at least recognized that it is futile to sham youth and have set themselves to develop wit, style and other attributes which are permanent and may grow instead of lessen with time.

In the time of our mothers and grandmothers, if the society chroniclers are a guide, a woman was considered old after 25. If she did not marry in her first season she was called a "relic" and made to feel in the way. And there was some reason for the raillery.

Between then and now two things have happened. Health has become the fashion and is sought for passionately and successfully. Clear skins, natural color, firm muscles, bright eyes and elastic steps are now the order of the day, and a woman who was once as transient as snow has become as permanent as her husband. That pretension to youthfulness is not now the common weakness is evidenced by the fact that the humorous papers, which once found this the most fruitful subject for jests, have turned their attention to other foibles. With this change men's taste regarding women seems to have altered somewhat.

Where once he admired the beauty of youth alone and was satisfied with dumb response to emotion, he now demands a great deal more. The woman of today must make herself agreeable, not passively, but actively; she must be brilliant and witty, possessed of tact and able to entertain; must have the art of dressing, the knowledge of men, the art of flattering, must be, in short, a woman of the world with the liberal education which that implies. The day of the doll has passed away; the debutante is in no flurry to get married, and the yearling pasture is not the wife market it was.

It might be supposed that women who keep up a continuous round of dinners, operas and balls would look dragged out and weary and old before their time, but in reality they are in the most splendid physical condition. They are up, it is true, till the small hours of the morning, drinking champagne, dancing, conversing and flirting, but this is their sole occupation, and it does not begin before 4 o'clock in the afternoon. The remainder of their time is spent in the pursuit of health. After a noon breakfast they drive, twice a week, to the Turkish baths, and are steamed, pounded, plunged and showered, shampooed and manicured, and turned out as if new made from the hand of God. No other creature, unless it be thoroughbred racers, have such care given to their bodies as these women whose business is society.

Whatever science and art have discovered and invented, or nature allotted, to give health and beauty, is commanded by them, until it is now beginning to be said, curiously, that the women are outlasting the men.

The society woman depends greatly on luxurious bathing to renew her strength. The Turkish bath must be taken outside the home, but the bathrooms in some of the wealthy houses give evidence by their costliness and beauty of the part they play in the daily economy.—New York Mail and Express.

Be Prompt in Appointments.

The Manufacturer's Gazette thinks there is nothing more damaging to a business than to be found wanting in the matter of promptness in filling orders. A great many firms will promise to have an order at a certain time, when they are confident in their own minds that it will be almost an utter impossibility to do so. This is done to secure the orders, but cannot fail of a damaging effect in the future. It is just as important that an order be filled at the time agreed as that any other engagement or appointment be kept. The man who arranges for a meeting with another at a certain time is expected to be on time. In these days of great enterprise and push, every business man has his time fully taken and promptness in keeping an appointment is an important matter to him. Just so it is in filling orders. Promptness is as much to the credit of a concern as is the quality of the work or the material used.

The Prescription.

There was, some time ago, a doctor whose morning levees were crowded beyond description. It was his pride and boast that he could feel his patient's pulse, look at his tongue, probe at him with his stethoscope, write his prescription, pocket his fee, in a space of time varying from two to five minutes. One day an army man was shown into the consulting room, and underwent what may be called the instantaneous process. When it was completed the patient shook hands heartily with the doctor and said: "I am especially glad to meet you, as I have often heard my father, Col. Forester, speak of his old friend, Dr. L." "What!" exclaimed the doctor, "are you Dick Forester's son?" "Most certainly I am." "My dear fellow, fling that infernal prescription into the fire and sit down quietly and tell me what's the matter with you."—Murray's Magazine.

Stanley's Machine Gun.

The prints of the English speaking world have been full of stories about the machine gun which Henry M. Stanley carried with him in his last desperate venture in Africa. And yet it is an old story. It occurs to this paper to properly tell it: The weapon so much talked about is a Maxim gun. It was invented by a citizen of these United States. He was poor and sought encouragement from our government. He got none. He went to England, where they saw its merits at once and made him rich. So his gun is under control of the British government. At the time when he commenced his investigations the three great machine guns of the world were the Gatling, the Hotchkiss and the Nordenhoff—the first two American, the last English. There was little difference in their merits, save that the Hotchkiss was lighter and made for ready transportation. Maxim, an American boy, said to himself, there are faults about these machine guns: 1. The turning of the crank prevents anything like an aim. 2. Often the cartridges hang fire a little, but the crank turns on, and they explode at the wrong time. 3. Most of all, the rapid firing heats the gun so that it is useless and even dangerous in a few seconds. The Maxim gun overcame all these defects. It is automatic. It needs no crank. Pull the trigger once and it continues to load and fire itself so long as the supply of cartridges lasts. The power of "the recoil" does all the work, even to shooting a jet of water along the barrel to keep it cool. It fires 700 shots in a minute, and all that the operator has to do is to aim it. This is the Stanley gun. You cannot see it in the United States now, for it is owned by the government of Great Britain.—Cincinnati Enquirer.

A Soldier's Life Saved by a Dream.

A man of the name of Joe Williams had told a dream to his fellow soldiers, some of whom related it to me months previous to the occurrence which I relate. He dreamed that he crossed a river, marched over a mountain and camped near a church located in a wood, near which a terrible battle ensued, and in a charge just as he crossed a ravine he was shot in the heart. On the ever memorable 7th of December, 1861 (battle of Prairie Grove, northern Arkansas), as we moved a double quick to take our place in the line of battle, then already hotly engaged, we passed a church, a small frame building. I was riding in the flank of the command, opposite to Williams, as we came in view of the house. "That is the church I saw in my dream," said he. I made no reply, and never thought of the matter until evening.

We had broken the enemy's lines and were in full pursuit, when we came to a dry ravine in the wood, and Williams said: "Just on the other side of this ravine I was shot in my dream, and I'll stick my hat under my shirt." Suiting the action to the word he doubled up his hat as he ran along and crammed it into his bosom. Scarcely had he adjusted it when a minie ball knocked him out of line; jumping up quickly he pulled out his hat, waved it over his head shouting: "I'm all right." The ball raised a black spot about the size of a man's hand just over the heart and dropped into his shoe. —Hall's Journal of Health.

Foot Note Literature.

A little book of essays which has just been published would be very pleasant reading but for the foot notes, which are very numerous, occurring on nearly every page, and greatly irritating, we venture to say, to the large majority of the readers. Few people, we believe, like to be pulled up every few moments by an asterisk or some similar sign, calling upon them to turn their attention from the text to some amplifying or cognate matter at the foot of the page. This sort of thing, nevertheless, is on the increase, and it is very characteristic of the time, with its mania (on the part of book writing persons) for the elaborate and the precise. All dryasdust authors have been given to this foible, which is nearly allied to vanity. A display of foot notes is taken as implying learning and research. The author's information—the world is asked to observe—is so extremely full that it cannot be contained in the body of the work; it flows over into the notes.

As if nine persons out of ten did not find all annotation a bore! Better, they are inclined to say, the vague and even the inexact. It is not the historian or the essayist with the foot notes who attracts. Rather is attraction found in the writer who goes straight on, telling his story or weaving his ideas with a directness which calls for no corroborative or expanding notes. The painstaking writer is "not in it" with him who is content simply to be picturesque, and does not seek to bolster up his work with extraneous stuff. There is printed matter—such as legal lore—which of necessity claims the aid of foot notes to illustrate its obscurity or suggest qualifications. But this may well be left to the small number who appreciate it. The unsophisticated, unregenerate man has a fondness, rather, for the unimpeded narrative and the unfettered flow of thought—the entire absence of all foot notes whatsoever.—London Globe.

Modjeska Apologized.

I think Mme. Modjeska is the most genuinely religious woman I ever met. She is the truest kind of a Christian. A woman of singularly gentle disposition, she never has a word of harsh comment or criticism for anybody. I was in her rooms one Sunday evening and we were waiting for Mr. Henley. Mr. Henley was late.

"That is just like him," Mme. Modjeska said; "he promised to be here at a quarter to 6 o'clock, and now it is 6 o'clock."

Then she paused a moment, and added:

"There, I have been abusing him, and I've just come from listening to a sermon on charity, too. I must apologize to him when he comes."

And she did.—San Francisco Call.

A FINE TALKER.

John Bright in Social Intercourse—His Excellent Language.

He always talked well, but I think he never talked better than after his practical withdrawal from public life. It seemed as though his powers as a speaker, no longer used for the instruction of the world at large, were employed all the more unresevedly for the benefit of his personal friends. It was upon books and literary subjects generally that he chiefly liked to talk. His knowledge of English literature was in certain directions wonderfully wide and deep. I imagine that there are very few men who could have beaten him in a competitive examination in our English poets from the days of Milton to those of Wordsworth. His literary tastes were as simple as his personal habits, and no doubt he would have fallen under the contempt of the superior critics of certain cliques if they had been aware of his opinions on many subjects. But even they, if they had enjoyed the privilege of his friendship, would have been charmed by hearing him recite, as he was very fond of doing, favorite passages from the poets he loved so well. One evening in the spring of last year, shortly before his illness began, I was sitting beside him in the smoking room at the Reform club, when he began to talk about English hymn and hymn writers.

By and by, carried away by his theme, he repeated to me many of his favorite hymns. As he recited them in measured tones the charm of that beautiful voice which had so often thrilled the house of commons, and subdued a hostile majority, made itself felt even in a club smoking room, and from all parts of the room men drew quietly near to the spot where we were sitting, and listened with bated breath as the old man eloquent repeated verses of a kind which, I fear, are not often to be heard within the walls of a club. There was one noticeable characteristic of his voice. Though the tone was low, it was so clear, and so skillfully was it modulated, that when speaking in his ordinary tones he would be heard with distinctness at the further end of a large room, even although several groups of talkers occupied the apartment. And then, how admirably chosen was the language in which he spoke, even in ordinary conversation! I have said that some superfine critics might, perhaps, have sneered at his taste in literature. There is not an English writer now living, however, who would not be the happier if he could write as well as Mr. Bright habitually spoke. For his words, even in the most commonplace conversation, were chosen so well that, as he talked, you seemed to be listening to some masterpiece of our literature.—London News.

Field and George.

A gentleman who was present on the occasion told me today that several years ago David Dudley Field and Henry George met for the first time at the office of The North American Review. Mr. George had just returned from abroad, where he had made a great reputation, but in New York personally he was little known, although his abilities were generally conceded everywhere. The gentlemen met to interchange views on the subject elaborately set forth in Mr George's book, "Progress and Poverty." During the course of the interview Mr. Field criticised alleged statements in that work on political economy. His remarks indicated ignorance of the text to such degree as to surprise Mr. George into saying evidently the gentleman had not read the book he had come to criticise. Strangely enough, this Mr. Field admitted, which caused embarrassment to both and cut short the interview. Subsequently, at another meeting, a more thorough understanding of each other was had, and the opinion of each as to the other's abilities was decidedly complimentary. During these interviews Mr. Field, with the keen penetration and artful skill of a lawyer, would try to entrap Mr. George into an admission of some proposition, with a view to prove its fallacy. The quick intelligence of the latter grasped at once the question in all its bearings and his adroit and ready answers showed a genius for debate.

"The duel between these two masters was," said my informant, "a thing to be long remembered and showed the great controversial talent of the one no less than the exhaustless resource of the other—both superb."—New York Graphic.

Died with Fish in His Throat.

A curious cause of death was recently recorded in India. A native who was fishing in a stream caught a flat, eel like fish, about fifteen to sixteen inches in length. Being desirous of killing it, he put it into his mouth in order to bite off its head. The fish, however, scarcely appreciating this attempt at decapitation, vigorously essayed to make other arrangements, in which it was successful. Gifted with a slimness, which made it very difficult to hold, it slipped through the man's fingers into his mouth, and conveyed itself partly down his gullet. The situation now was bad for the fish, but still worse for the man, but owing to the sharp fins on the back of the fish it was not possible to withdraw it. The man died in great agony within an hour.—Detroit Free Press.

A Soldier of the Revolution.

The town of York claims the honor of furnishing nearly the first and also the last surviving soldier of the revolution. This last named was William Hutchins, who was born in York, Oct. 6, 1764, and died in Penobscot, May 2, 1866. At the close of the war he returned to Penobscot, which has been his home since he was 4 years old, and in 1865 he joined in a Fourth of July celebration at Bangor, a revenue cutter having been detached for his conveyance to and from that city, and as he passed by the Penobscot river the guns of Fort Knox fired a salute of welcome, an honor said never before to have been given to any person in the state.—Lewiston (Me.) Journal.

THE HABITS OF "BOB WHITE."

A Sportsman Writes About His Experience with the Quail.

In studying the quail one cannot fail to notice the almost complete change of habits in this bird which attends the transition from one season of the year to another. In the spring and summer the once shy and bevy keeping Bob White becomes individualized and tame—we say individualized because, although mated, man and wife are always one flesh just as truly among birds as among human beings. No longer in flocks, Bob White turns up everywhere under your feet in the fields, especially if you haunt the vicinity of his nest and brooding mate. You will frequently see him running along by the fence, or even venturing out into the road, while his cheery, sweet song—for it is a song, albeit but of two notes—rings out again and again on the sunny air.

So tame and regardless of her own safety does the female grow in the nesting season that not unfrequently she will allow herself to be almost trodden upon before leaving the nest, and I have known late brooding birds in grass meadows to sit fearlessly upon their nests until cut to pieces by the relentless knives of the mowing machine.

Young quail are perfect little necromancers. Almost as soon as they are out of the shell they seem to have the power of making themselves invisible at the wave of a wand. Wherever they go to nobody can tell. The ground may be as bare as a floor, but somehow they manage to vanish utterly from the eye. And this is a trick which they do not entirely forget as they grow older. It takes a sharp eyed sportsman to see a bevy of quail before they rise, even if the dog is pointing right at them and the grass is as short as it is on a lawn.

By August Bob White begins to take on a different character altogether from that he has displayed during the spring and summer months. He ceases to perch himself in conspicuous places and sing for the delight of himself and his friends, both feathered and unfeathered. He no longer makes excursions into exposed and dangerous localities, nor does he trust to the friendliness of every human being who comes his way. Gradually he begins to assemble his family and nearest relatives into a little community conducted on the simplest communistic principles, and animated by one all pervading desire—to get through the terrible open season without being brought to griddle.

That Bob White has developed remarkable powers for realizing this desire every sportsman will readily acknowledge. No bird can place so many yards between itself and the gun in two or three seconds as the lively little quail. It takes a remarkably quick shot to get in both barrels effectively at a bevy of quail, even when the birds rise in the open and the sportsman has an unobstructed field of view. The almost irresistible tendency is to "fire at the thick of 'em," but besides being unsportsmanlike this method is generally ineffective also, for, while it may now and then cripple a bird, it oftener lets the whole bevy get away unscathed, or else sends two or three slightly wounded birds into the cover to die a cruel and lingering death.

The philosophy of this result is easy enough to explain, for, quickly as a covey of quail may seem to the excited sportsman to fly together when they are flushed, a little calm observation will show that the intervals between the several birds are almost always nearly as great as the spread of a charge of shot at thirty yards. Thus it will be seen that, if the center of the charge falls in one of the intervals or spaces, as it is just so much more likely to do as the space is larger than a quail's body, the only possible chance is that a bird may be crippled by the outer pellets, and even this chance is small compared with the alternative which has been previously stated.

Therefore, my advice to the true sportsman in quail shooting is to select one bird for each barrel; make a clean kill or none at all. And if you are not skillful and quick enough at first to select a bird for each barrel, make sure of your first shot only, for a time, until you get so that you can drop your bird quickly and neatly; then begin to attempt your double on the principle which has been laid down. I make a practice of concentrating my attention every time on what I call the "laggard"—that is, the bird nearest me when the gun is raised; or, if the bevy crosses me instead of going straight away, it is the last bird in the line that I fire at. This rule applies to the use of both barrels. Select the laggard each time.—Paul Pastnor in Shooting and Fishing.

A Wealthy Woman.

Mrs. Robert Goelet is not yet thirty years of age. She has a cottage in Newport worth $250,000 and an income of $182,500 a year, or $500 a day. Her father is George Henry Warren, the wealthy financier, from whom she learned how to keep her account book balanced. Mrs. Goelet is exceedingly pretty. She has bright yellow hair, a fair complexion, violet eyes, and her manners are those of a patrician lady. Her little son and daughter are beautiful as dolls and her constant companions through the day. She thinks nothing of asking a caller to excuse her when a doll's dress or a paper kite is in process of construction.—New York World.

Face and Figure.

"See this check, Jones?"

"Yes; for a thousand, eh?"

"Exactly; only I refer to the fine lithograph work on it."

County Official Paper.

The death of Nicholas Luning last week is not without some interest to Inyo County. He was a stockholder in the Carson and Colorado railroad and it has been alledged that he was the obstacle that prevented the extension of the road to Mojave. What effect, if any, his death may have upon the future history of the road may not be known for some time.

The Republican candidate for Governor, Hon. H. H. Markham, is in the prime of life and is a very fine looking man about six feet in height. He made one of the best congressmen we ever had; he is very courteous and kind in manner, entirely free from arrogance and self importance. He is a man of fine business capacity and strictly honorable in every particular. As Governor he would maintain the dignity due to the position and the State, and yet at all times be easy of access and attentive to the humblest citizen. He would make such a Governor as California would be proud of. That he will be elected is almost a certainty.

A telegram received from San Francisco yesterday states that Mayor Pond of San Francisco has been nominated for Governor. The nomination of Mr. Pond is a strong move in favor of clean politics and whether Markham or Pond be elected California will have no cause to blush for her Governor. The vote for Governor may be fairly taken as a test of the feeling of the people on State division. Mr. Markham is the nominee of Southern California and of the people who favor State division. Mr Pond is the nominee of the State one and indivisible. To neither man can the charge of boodle be attributed. They were both nominated on their merits. Mr. Markham possesses the confidence and esteem of Southern California and Mr. Pond's record as Mayor is unimpeachable on the score of honesty and integrity.

LATEST.—R. F. Del Valle nominated for Lieutenant Governor. Hatch and Stanley nominated.

RULES.

In all the above races 3 or more to enter, 2 or more to start. Entrance fee, 10 per cent. of purse.

All entries to be made with the Secretary on or before 12 o'clock m. of the day preceding the race.

California State Agricultural Society Rules to govern running races. National Trotting Association Rules to govern trotting races.

In all exhibits of animals for premiums, other things being equal, blooded stock will be preferred.

All articles included in the above list, except the first department, to be on exhibition at the Pavilion on second day and remain during the Fair.

Special premiums will be allowed for articles exhibited not included in above list.

If you have entries to make, attend to it at once, and when your entries are made, see to it that they are on time and at place for examination by the committee.

Accept no rumors in regard to the business of the exhibition. If you do not know what to do, inquire of the officers whose duty it is to tell you. One half of the trouble and disappointment at the Fair is caused by relying on hearsay. Attend to your business yourself. If it is done wrong you know where the blame lies.

Read the rules and, by example, at least, assist in enforcing them; but don't forget that mistakes will occur where many people are congregated. The Board endeavors to do justice to all.

If the superintendents and Committeemen are not always ready at the appointed hour, keep your stock and articles where you can command them at any time. Remember that we have but little time to do much business; patience, with a little system, will overcome many obstacles.

The Board will give the same special attention to details that has contributed to success in the past. It remains for the exhibitors to achieve still better results for the Fair of 1890.

ADMISSION.

Life Membership	$30 00
Membership ticket, admitting member, wife and minor children	5 00

The champion watermelon of the season came down from Sam McMurrys place last Monday.

The Ingleside Hotel and the Pogsen Block at Bakersfield were burned down last Tuesday.

J. J. Stewart of Lone Pine has been commissioned a Notary Public and has duly qualified.

George Hyde, the second Alcalde of San Francisco, a pioneer of 1846, died last week aged 76 years.

J. W. Murphy, Mr. and Mrs. A. Church and Miss Maud Cook went up into the hills on a camping trip Thursday.

The Democratic primaries will be held a week from tomorrow, the 30th, and the Republican on September 6th.

Henry Malone came down from Big Pine last Tuesday and is making a trip through the lower end of the County.

A brother of Charley Begole's arrived in Lone Pine last Friday. He is interested in the settlement of the estate.

Fred Holbert is reported to have lost two horses in Monache one with a broken leg and the other from a rattlesnake bite.

Mr. James Jenkins offers his ranch near Lone Pine for sale. It is a fine property and should find a ready purchaser.

Miss Bulpit and Mr. Dehy, both of Bishop, are being examined before the Board of Education for diplomas.

Rev. A Clark was down from Bishop last Monday on business connected with the Baptist Church property in that place.

J. H. Bulpit will soon begin the erection of a fire proof store building at Bishop. Part of the material is now on the ground.

Last Wednesday Mrs. Eliza Smith was divorced from Jas. J. Smith on the grounds of extreme cruelty and failure to provide.

El Rose came down from Long Valley last Monday. He says that Sagebrush is not dead and that Giles has only lost one colt.

R. C. Spear came up from Lone Pine yesterday and is still in town. Mr. Spear is making a canvass for the nomination for Assessor.

The political pot begins to assume the proportions of the whirlpool of Schiller. "It bubbles and seethes, it hisses and roars."

Mr. Vagt is putting the race track at the Fort in splendid condition for the fall races. Excellent accomodations will be offered to visitors.

A letter from James R. Moffit states that Fred Holbert has started for Visalia with his cattle, driving through the mountains from Monache.

James Hutchings came down from Bishop on Wednesday's train. He is a candidate for District Attorney and is making a canvass down this way.

A perpetual motion crank has struck Virginia City. He has a combination of wheels, balls and balls which, like Tennyson's stream, will "go on forever."

An invitation has been received from Captain Bronson to attend a social at the Marble Works this evening. The party will be an enjoyable affair.

Inyo County stock will be allowed to compete for premiums at the Ormsby County Fair, Nevada, which begins September 29th and continues till October 4th inclusive.

Scott Broder will ask for the Democratic nomination for Supervisor of the Third District. Mr. Broder is a pioneer resident of this County, knows its requirements and would make an efficient member.

Bishop Creek Academy.

INYO INDEPENDENT: The opening of the school year of Inyo Academy will be Sept. 3rd. The prospects for a successful year are very flattering having received applications of double the number of students of any previous year.

An addition has been made to the teaching force and many books and apparatus will be added to the library and laboratory.

Every one should examine the catalogue carefully and note how much lower board and tuition are than any similar institution of the West and endeavor to take advantage of the present low rates. Also observe that the course of study is almost as comprehensive as colleges that give degrees of Bachelor of Arts and Sciences.

A new piano has been secured and especial pains will be taken to establish a conservatory of music second to none in the West.

For particulars address the principal.

For Sale.

The ranch known as the "Rutgers place" near Lone Pine is offered for sale together with the the farming implements and stock. The ranch contains 320 acres of excellent land. The stock consists of thirty head of cattle and twelve brood mares. There is now six tons of hay on the place and feed enough to winter 200 head of stock. The winter pasture is rented for five years at $300 a year. The soil is a rich loam and excellently adapted to vegetable raising. There is plenty of outside range, making it a good stock ranch. For further particulars address

JAMES JENKINS.

Lone Pine, Inyo county, Cal.

Return of The Fishing Party.

The Kern river fishing party returned home last evening. They were gone three weeks and report having a glorious good time. One slight drawback was the rain which caused no serious inconvenience, however. They caught no end of fish, in fact much more than could be used. They report the best fishing ground to be Ramshaw meadow. The fish bite better, are more uniform in size, and there are fewer mosquitoes and no rattlesnakes nor yellow-jackets.

A suspected Keeler visitor as he appeared Wednesday morning by our local artist.

Walter James Sr. has been very ill during the week. It is thought that he has contracted the disease now prevalent among stock by coming in contact with a sick horse.

Word was brought to town on Wednesday that the body of the Chinaman drowned about two weeks ago in Owens river has been found at the place where he sank. A reward of forty dollars has been offered for the recovery of the remains.

The San Francisco Mint is paying $1.14 per ounce for silver. The New York quotation is $1.17. This week, lead at $4 60 sought to make mining a profitable enterprise. One that a year ago was worth $60 a ton is now worth $70.

It is related of Judge Beatty that when a resident of the State of Nevada tried for murder as the unlawful and premeditated killing of any human being except an editor. Editors are not human beings, Judge. They are "esteemed contemporaries."—Times;

August Cordes of Mono County is a candidate for the Democratic nomination for the Assembly. The nomination is only a compliment as the District is too overwhelmingly Republican for a Democrat to be elected. But compliment or not, Inyo County claims the right to the nomination and will place a man on the ticket. Four years ago Inyo waived the right to Mono County. Two years ago Miner was again nominated, thus leaving Mono County the right to name the man for the last six years.

TECHNICAL SCHOOLS.

The Benefits to Be Derived by Their Establishment in America.

In Europe, at Lyons, Crefeld and Como, Zurich, Muhlheim, Paris, Berlin, Manchester, Bradford and other cities, there are schools in which the principles of the textile industry are taught. The Silk association of New York has long advocated the school and expended much money to secure it. One of its members said:

"The benefit which textile interests would derive from a trade school of their own in this country could hardly be estimated. The effect of its success could not, of course, be immediately felt, but the final result could hardly be doubted and can be foretold in one sentence: Absolute independence of all outside influences for these industries in their creative, industrial and commercial departments.

"While the United States is second to no other country as far as the common school and classical courses of study are concerned, in the matter of technical education we are sadly deficient even beside the smallest and most insignificant of European countries. A special school catering to the needs of the district in which it is situated is indeed an establishment which any town in Europe is proud to possess. In textile industries, particularly, the number of technical schools has been largely increased in Europe, with the result that the improvement in the process of manufacture has been steady, and there is now hardly any kind of textile manufacturing in Europe that does not possess an educational establishment in which the principles of the industries of the district are taught to the young men who have not yet entered practical life, as well as to their older brothers, who have already had the experience of the factory, but who wish to perfect themselves and are anxious to learn the scientific reasons why certain kinds of work should be done in a certain way.

"In considering the foundation of technical schools in America the experience of other nations can be used to advantage, and much experimenting will thus be dispensed with. In order to profit by such experience, and to save the first steps in the dark, it is necessary that the various systems of technical education adopted in the different European countries be made the subject of careful study and comparative observation, the best points being taken from each and adapted to the condition required by the industries of the country.

"It would be useless at this stage to attempt to foreshadow the details regarding the actual establishment of the first American technical school. If it were intended to establish a whole national system of technical education the general plan might be to have a number of lower schools in all cities of any importance, in which the principles of all the sciences could be taught; these schools to act as feeders or nuseries for a central technical university. Private effort could hardly accomplish this. The establishment of such a complete educational system would tend to elevate the moral and and material standing of the country, and especially of the various industries; but the scope is so vast as to be hardly attainable without the aid of the national government.

"If we consider textile industries by themselves, we find that in regard to tuition that can be given which would be of value to the students in their future calling, there are three chief departments to be considered—the mechanical, the chemical and the artistic. Although these departments differ widely from each other, they are, nevertheless, so closely connected as to be indispensable to each other. A student who makes a specialty of one must, at the same time, know something of the other two, and it is therefore necessary that all three directions should be under the same roof if any completeness is to be the result.

"Thus a single school may be made to do for textiles all that circumstances now so urgently demand. We of the textile industries may not hope to build to completeness the grand fabric of technical education, but by co-operation we can rear and occupy one tower of this great stronghold of industrial freedom and progress."—New York Star.

An Old Time Auctioneer.

John H. Draper is, by the way, one of the very few successors we have to the witty auctioneers of the generation gone before us. When he perches himself in his armchair, florid and handsome, and with his fine flexible voice commences to do business, you may be sure that the fun will soon begin. He has a word for every one, and a repartee for every occasion. A man who had eaten too much dinner groaned when a beautiful little Corot was knocked down for $125. "There," said the auctioneer solemnly, "you hear Corot's ghost, don't you?" A drunken man, who had wandered in and fallen asleep in a remote chair, fell over on the floor just as a strong Michel went at $95. "The price made him faint," was the auctioneer's comment. When a brilliant Vibert, a cardinal, all in red under a red umbrella, walking in a sunlit garden, was put up, and one of the audience went up to examine it on the easel, the auctioneer said: "You've often painted it that way yourself." A Monticelli he described as a good "all the week picture." You could call it what you wanted, and turn it a new way every day out of the seven, and give it a new title. Any one who knows Monticelli's absinthesque fantasies of color will appreciate the description. When a tentative bidder offered a raise of $1 on a Corot, and a good one, the auctioneer made it $2.50. The bidder protested that he had only made the figure $1. "All right," said the auctioneer, "I'm lending you a dollar and a half to preserve your self respect." When the sale ended the auctioneer gravely thanked his audience, forgave them for their coldness on the ground that he did not blame them for being shy of picture sales nowadays, and sent them off with the valedictory, "God help the old masters!"—To-Day.

A STRANGE COMMUNITY.

Economic and Social Features of a Flourishing Colony in Iowa.

Probably the most prosperous communistic society in this country is in Iowa, nearly 100 miles west from Davenport, on the line of the Milwaukee and St. Paul road. There are no saloons in the colony and every man, woman and child is a worker. There are no idlers, no caucuses, no politics.

Marriage is looked upon as one of the necessary evils, but it is not regarded by any means as a meretorious act. Children must be had and any looseness of morals is sternly frowned upon, yet the lot of the newly married couple is not in any sense a happy one. The religious standing of young married people is very low until, by patiently bearing the yoke of matrimony, they demonstrate their fitness to enter into the circle of the elect.

Despite their costumes there are many remarkably pretty girls in Amana. In form they are straight and slender. Many of them have clear cut features, and their complexions are beautiful beyond description.

The costumes of the women are severely plain, and at the same time are picturesque. A print kerchief, manufactured in the village, is folded across the bosom so that the waist of the loosely fitting dress is hidden. The villagers manufacture all the flannels and calicoes worn, and each has a wide reputation. A black cap of some thin material is worn rather far back on the head, being gathered into a little bag at the back, narrow black ribbons tying it under the chin. Knit stockings and broad slippers or coarse shoes are worn, wooden shoes being reserved for field work. Neither age nor condition in life brings any change in these garments.

No social intercourse is allowed between the young men and the maidens, and they see each other at intervals, and even then at a distance. The association of the sexes is forbidden. On Sunday afternoon the boys and girls are permitted to walk in the fields, in opposite directions, though sometimes they come together.

When a young man signifies his desire to marry a maiden he is put on probation for a year or more. Once a week he is allowed to see the object of his affection, and no encouragement is given his suit by any one. He is never allowed to see her alone, however. When the marriage finally takes place it is made the gloomiest of festal occasions.

There are no wedding clothes and no wedding guests. Two or three elders meet at the home of the bride's parents and read hymns and lead in prayers. The chapter in Paul's epistle to the Ephesians, wherein the apostle, with unflinching severity, describes the duties of husband and wife, is read, with somber comments. After the lecture there is a dead cold supper, and every one is made to feel as miserable as possible. When once married, however, there is no hope for the couple, as divorce is unknown.

These communists are rich, yet they go without amusement of any sort; all musical instruments save the flute are tabooed and there are no brass band contests to disturb the serenity of their even existence.

A small colony came to the United States from Germany in 1842, headed by Christian Metz, an inspired "instrument," and settled near Buffalo, N. Y., the name of Ebenezer being given to the colony. As the colony prospered beyond all expectation it was necessary to secure more land, and the present peaceful valley was selected. The old name was left behind and Amana was chosen as the title by which the colony should be hereafter known. Seven villages sprang up and are known as Amana, East, West, South, Middle and High Amana and Homestead. Anything more peaceful than these little villages cannot be imagined.

The inhabitants are pietists, or, rather, inspirationists, but they do not look happy. They are puritanical to the last degree and the children are as sedate and staid as their elders.

Christian Metz, their leader, died twenty-two years ago, and Barbara Heyneman, who was also an "instrument," led the people for fifteen years after, when she, too, died. Since then there has been no one prominent or holy enough to succeed them and there is in consequence no leader. Good, pure and virtuous as Barbara was, however, she came under the ban once, though she finally regained her standing as an "instrument."

She fell in love with a comely youth named George Landmann, and marry him she would and did, though she suffered expulsion for it. As she was a power in the community, she succeeded in getting back, but she was never really and heartily forgiven for having taken to herself a husband.

There is a community of everything. No cooking is done by families, the meals being prepared and served in kitchens maintained for that purpose. There is an abundance of everything and no one ever goes hungry. In Amana, for instance, where there are perhaps five hundred inhabitants, fifteen kitchens are maintained. The proportion is the same in the other six villages.—Philadelphia Times.

Facts About the Teeth.

The teeth must be kept in good order. Western nations seem to have a general lack of good teeth, in great contrast to eastern nations. Thus the Hindoos have good teeth till quite aged. They take great care to keep them clean. After meals they chew a bit of wood to a pulp, and so rub all debris away. A missionary movement was once actually started among cultivated Hindoo gentlemen to convert the English classes to better habits of bodily religion. The neglect of proper observances in the matter of health in England seemed to them monstrous and deserving charitable instruction. Cold water is said to crack the dentine. I cannot vouch for this myself. Dentists tell us chewing of hard substances is needed, the pressure causing growth of the circulating vessels and good nutrition and repair in the tooth substance.—Dr. M. L. Holbrook's Lecture.

California's Fruit Pest.

California has a fruit pest in the gray linnet far worse and more damaging to fruit raisers than the English sparrow. If some means are not systematically and methodically adopted to exterminate this bird there will be very little profit in fruit raising in those sections where deciduous fruits are exclusively produced. Some have an aversion to destroying this or any other bird, but then it takes millions of dollars to sustain and support the luxury. This bird is very fastidious; it takes the best fruit; hence its support comes from the otherwise profit of the orchardist.—New York Telegram.

THE USEFUL PENNY.

The Wonderful Choice of Things Which the Possessor Has Before Him.

In the old country with your penny you can get your morning's ride on the tramcar; a boat ride from London bridge to Greenwich; a mile and a half 'bus ride almost anywhere; a mile and a half railway ride on the Metropolitan. If you are a smart clerk, before you go into your office, with a penny you can buy a bunch of violets; or a cigarette; or a daily paper; or have your boots blacked; or buy a tin of wax vestas; or a rustic wood pipe; or a metal closeup pipe cleaner from a pavement vender. If you are a workman, and you haven't got a careful wife, for a penny you can get a breakfast of a thick slice of bread and butter and a cup of coffee; you can buy a saveloy for an extra relish; you can get a screw of tobacco; you can buy a glass of milk; you can get a shave and make yourself smart.

If you are in the city at lunch time, with a penny you can buy a biscuit or a scone, or an oatmeal digestive biscuit; you can buy the first edition of the evening paper at 1 p. m., or postage stamp to send a letter home to say that you are going to be late; if you have lost a shirt stud from bending over your desk, for a penny you can buy half a dozen from the shirt stud vender; if you happen to be near the law courts and want to know if a friend's case is in court, for a penny you can buy a causelist. If you are a nice little boy, who has had a penny given to you, with that wonderful coin you can get in the street a set of three toy white jugs; or a tin lizard; or a jumping frog; or a doll's house; or a jumping dog; or a jack-in-the-box; or a trick surprise match box; or a green moth on a spiral string.

If you are going home from business in the street, too, you can buy for a penny—a pair of mohair laces; a set of pencils with guard and pen; "the smallest book ever printed;" a piece of sponge; a penknife; a set of fairy money; a lead or composition comb; a "puzzle match box;" a bag of anti influenza lozenges; a set of wire pipe cleaners; a dose of sarsaparilla from the highly decorated cart; an electric shock; a gaivanic shock; a bottle of infallible mucilage; a box of silver plating powder; a box or bottle of gilding preparation, and a box of clothes reviver. For a penny, too, you can have your fortune told by the Italian lady with the wonderful canaries. You can buy a gilt edged mirror, or a packet of hokey pokey, or an albert guard, or a toy watch with a chain and key, or a set of dice, or an artificial flower pot with a flower in it, or a slice of pineapple, or a bag of butter nuts.

Then, again, think of the automatic machines when you arrive at the railway station. For a penny—a penny in a slot—out comes a small cigar or cigarette, or a chunk of butter scotch, or a packet of caramels, or a piece of chocolate, or some scent for your handkerchief, or try your weight, or a "shock," or try your height, a glass of water with a paper cup, or try your strength. Last, not least, for a penny you can have a "book of all the popular songs with moosic;" Bunyan's "Pilgrim's Progress;" an umbrella ring; a pair of revolving gilt collar studs; a "tightlet" to fasten your scarf or collar; a block of fuel; a memorandum book; a zinc pail; a funnel; a toasting fork; an iron hanger; an egg boiler; copper wire flower pot hanger; the "hardest puzzle out;" a packet of hat reviver; tooth stopping; tin or razor paste; sometimes a pocket knife (this last will clean me out); and hundreds of other things for the life of us we can never recollect—Exchange.

The Cotillon in France.

Why is the cotillon the most popular dance in France? And why is it so little danced in England, and then in a maimed and abbreviated form? The answer seems to be, that its gay frolics suit the French character, and that they do not suit nearly so well the more staid, possibly the more ponderous, humor of the English. The most sublime of all the arts is to look foolish gracefully. Few Englishmen can learn to do that; but to the French man it is easy enough. He is less self conscious than the man of perfidious Albion, and thoroughly enjoys an exhibition which would make a good many Englishmen decidedly uncomfortable. To be pulled through a paper screen (like a circus rider) by your partner, to have a paper bag put over your head, to waltz with a doll or to be compelled to jump over a chalk line before you can get a partner; these are gambols to which an Englishman does not take very kindly. Yet it is undeniable that the cotillon is very amusing, and that it provides even more precious opportunities for flirtation than more formal and stately figures. And it is understood that young ladies highly appreciate the presents, sometimes very rich and rare, which fall to their share when a wealthy hostess gets up a cotillon. Yet, for the divers causes and considerations which have been enumerated the cotillon will probably never be very popular in England.—St. James' Gazette.

Telltale Polly.

A lady living in the far west has a parrot whose powers of mimicry are really wonderful. It will frequently repeat whole sentences in the exact tone of the speakers, although it can rarely be induced to utter the same sentence twice.

One day when the parrot's mistress was very busy, and did not care to see callers, she happened to look out of the window, and saw an acquaintance approaching the house.

"There comes Mrs. B——! Dear, dear!" she said, in a tone of impatience.

A moment later Mrs. B—— was ushered in, and on the instant Polly exclaimed, with a remarkable imitation of her mistress' tone and emphasis, "There comes Mrs. B——! Dear, dear!"

Blushing with confusion, the embarrassed hostess innocently made matters worse by saying hastily:

"Oh, please excuse Polly, Mrs. B——. You know what a way she has of repeating everything I say!"—Youth's Companion.

Manufacturers of the Great Sierra Kidney and Liver Cure:

GENTLEMEN:—I send to you this testimonial and consider it no more than my duty. I have given your Great Sierra Kidney and Liver Cure a fair trial. My kidneys were in a very bad condition, verging on to Bright's Disease and strong symptoms of Diabetes. I had severe pains in my back, my water was very much discolored, with heavy sediment. Since using your truly wonderful remedy all these troubles have ceased and I consider myself saved from a very dangerous as well as troublesome disease. Your valuable remedy I can recommend to all that suffer from kidney, bladder or liver troubles. Faithfully yours,

Crows as City Street Cleaners.

The city of Omaha has in its service a force of thousands of scavengers who draw no pay, report to no official, but are protected by law from molestation. They are the crows who flock into town as regularly as cold weather comes, stay during the winter and vanish in the spring. Each evening as the shadows fall legions of crows wing their way in a seemingly endless flight to the willow copses and clumps of small cottonwood trees on the banks of the Missouri, where they roost for the night. A favorite haunt is at the bend of the river, between Cut-off and Florence lakes, where the banks shelter them from the northwest wind. The air is thick with sable wings and resonant with hoarse caws there, after sunset each night, as the scavengers settle down among the branches to dream of back area lunches and carrion spreads. With the break of day the sable flock bestirs itself. Each member hops about to warm its chilled legs, stretches its shiny wings and heads back towards the city. The vast flock breaks into small groups and they alight here and there on the tree tops and survey the back yards and alleys until they can pick out foraging places. Then they descend and in short order the remains of the breakfasts, the scraps of meat from markets and the rats killed by household dogs and cats are gobbled up. Some crows do scavenger work about the residences. Others alight cautiously in the alleys, and others are attracted to the stockyards and packing houses at South Omaha. They light shy of the business blocks.—Omaha World.

Rats in a New Light.

I have seen and handled a pair of tame rats belonging to some young friends, and prettier, more playful and more intelligent pets could not be imagined. They were accustomed to run about the table at meal times. They never stole food; but when anything was offered them they sat up on their hind legs, held the morsels between the fore paws, and ate daintily. They were fond of a game which I saw them play. The rats were put into the boy's cap, which was hung on the hatstand in the hall. The boy and his sister then went to the top of house and whistled. At the sound of the whistle the rats jumped out of the cap, scrambled to the floor, and then ran upstairs and perched on their owners' shoulders.

The general idea of the rat is that it is an ill savored animal, dirty in its person and revolting in its diet, whereas it is delicately clean in person and equally dainty in its food. It is ever washing itself and never eats without washing itself afterwards.—Pall Mall Gazette.

He Gave the Alarm.

Capt. William Jameson, of Friendship, Me., is called the Paul Revere of the Meducook. He received the name in the following way: It was during the war of 1812, and the British, with muffled oars and under cover of darkness, were trying to reach and burn the little fleet of fishing schooners at the head of the Meducook river, hoping also to gather in some chickens, eggs, etc., from the settlers along the route. Jameson, then a boy of 14, mounted his horse and rode through the town, giving the alarm at every house. He then returned home, jumped from his horse, and catching up his little flint lock rifle, with twenty-four rounds of cartridges, started off on the run across lots to join his neighbors at Bradford's Point. The British soon found that they were discovered, and hastened back to their ship.—Brooklyn Eagle.

A HAPPY MAN.

What a Dollar Investment Did for a Resident of this City.

Andrew Andersen is a Swede residing at 26 Elm street, in this city, and a happier man it would be difficult to find. He is employed by G. W. Kent, grain merchant, and is known as a steady and reliable man. For the past two or three months Mr. Andersen has each month purchased a ticket in The Louisiana State Lottery. He didn't expect to win anything, but after buying one ticket he thought he might as well continue the practice in the hope that at some time he might win a small prize.

Last month Mr. Andersen purchased a one-twentieth ticket as usual, and the day following the drawing he saw in the papers that ticket 35,287 had drawn a prize of $50,000. The number seemed familiar to him, and hunting up the ticket he had purchased he compared it with the winning numbers. Then he almost fell over in astonishment, for his dollar ticket had drawn one-twentieth of $50,000 and Mr. Andersen's investment had netted him $2,500. Naturally he was greatly overjoyed at his good fortune, but received the congratulations of his neighbors in a modest manner.

Mr. Andersen at once went to the gentleman in this city from whom he purchased the ticket, and a few minutes later he held a check for $2,500 in his hand. Being a sensible man he has not allowed his good fortune to turn his head and is now at his work laboring as industriously as before his great streak of luck. He has deposited his $2,500 and when a favorable opportunity for investment affords itself he will withdraw it. The news of Mr. Andersen's fortune has made him a noted man in this vicinity.—Pawtucket (R. I.) Times, June 14.

HE WON WEALTH.

The Fortunate Winner of Fifteen Thousand Dollars.

Yesterday the El Paso National Bank paid to Wells Fargo Express Company $15,00) cash for the lucky holder at Gonzales, Texas, of a quarter of ticket No. 17,303 which won the capital prize in the Juarez lottery drawing last Wednesday. The ticket was sent for collection through the express company and the money was paid over by Cashier W. H. Austin, who gives a card to that effect in these columns this morning. The Texarkana paper gives these two items:

"Sam Falk is the happiest man in town. He ordered the ticket that drew the $15,00) and if he had just held on to it his bowl of happiness would now be running over."

"Mr. J. Fain, state agent for the El Paso del Norte Lottery Company came down from Dallas this morning to pay off the prize captured on ticket 17,303. The holder has not been found to this date."

Texarkana captured another quarter of the winning ticket. El Paso's time will come next. An official of the lottery company said yesterday to a TIMES' reporter:

"We are glad Texas has made a winning. But of course it is to our interest that the winning tickets are sold in large cities as a larger number of tickets could be sold in the large cities. Still we have no control over that, and believe that it will do us just as much good, no matter where drawn, if promptly paid; and we always have money in the El Paso National Bank to pay all winnings by parties in the United States."—El Paso Times.

A CARD.

I, W. H. Austin, Cashier of El Paso National Bank of El Paso, Texas, do hereby certify that quarter ticket No. 17,303 of the Grand Lottery Juarez was presented by the Wells-Fargo Express Co., and the sum of $15,000 was paid for same to G. N. Dilworth, Banker of Gonzales, Texas. This ticket winning one-fourth of the Grand Prize of $60,00) drawn in drawing of June 25, 1890 of Grand Lottery Juarez, at the Ciudad Juarez, Mexico.

W. H. AUSTIN,
Cashier El Paso National Bank.

INFERNAL INGENUITY

Could scarcely devise more excruciating tortures than those of which you see the evidences in the face of a rheumatic or neuralgic sufferer. The agonies are the consequence of not checking a rheumatic or neuralgic attack at the outset. Hostetter's Stomach Bitters has been found by skillful medical practitioners to possess not only remedial, but defensive efficacy, where those diseases exists, or a tendency to them is exhibited. Surely this puissant but safe botanic medicine, bearing, too, such high specific sanction, is better than the poisons often employed, but most unsafe, not only in continuance, but in isolated doses. The blood is depurated thoroughly from the rheumatic virus, and the nerves, slightly impurged upon, save from ultimate and direful throes by this benign, saving medicine, which likewise exhibits marked efficacy for malaria, kidney complaints, dyspepsia, constipation and liver complaint.

The difference between a liar and a hipocrite is that the liar is not always incurable.

CHINAMEN'S COUSINS.

A CLAIM THAT AMERICAN INDIANS ARE OF MONGOL DESCENT.

Reasons for Thinking They Are—The Striking Resemblance in Language and Appearance—Curious Custom of Depressing the Skull Artificially.

Having in youth visited the upper Missouri, and obtained considerable knowledge of the tribes who dwelt on that river, I have always felt a deep interest in the investigations as to the origin of the American Indians. From the settlement of this country down to our own time all sorts of theories have been advanced, some of them of the wildest character, and others plausible and reasonable. Catlin tells the story of Prince Modoc and his Welshmen, and speaks of blue eyed and light haired Indians of the Mandan tribe in support of the legend. Neither Catlin nor any of his critics seem to have thought of the simple fact that the pure blooded Welshman is neither blue eyed nor light haired. And this is but a sample of the way in which the subject has been dealt with even by careful and inquiring writers.

SIMILAR WORDS.

My own opinion—if it is of any value—is that the North American Indians, or the greater part of them, are descended from Asiatic immigrants and closely akin to the Mongolian race. In the Sioux language, with which I have some acquaintance, the word for a chief, or head man, is "eetoncha." Among certain tribes of Alaska the chief is called "eeton" and "tyone." This certainly brings us very near the Japanese word "tycoon." I have mentioned this word in particular because it is one of the terms likely to be perpetuated under any change of circumstances, just as the Saxon word "king," in England, survived alike Norman conquest and Celtic admixture. The Sioux word for a tent, or home, is "teepee," and this is very similar to the Tartar word, while there is also a marked similarity in the appearance of the tents alike of the Tartars and the American Indians. The photographs brought by travelers from Siberia of the tribes there subject to Russian authority might well be mistaken for pictures of American Indians in unusual attire.

It is true that the Indians are, as a rule, superior in physique to the average Mongolian, at least to the specimens of the Mongolian race that we meet in America, but the difference is no greater than between the average Celtic immigrant of fifty years ago and his grandson of today; whereas the Indian immigration probably took place many hundreds of years ago. The writer has not been the only traveler impressed by the resemblance of Indians to the Mongols. Both in Central and South America tribes have been found whose likeness, in language, physique and manner, to the Mongolian race has lately been the subject of considerable observation and remark. One of these tribes—the Guararis—has its seat on the far confines of Paraguay; yet, in the opinion of a gentleman acquainted with the Tartar tongue, their speech is distinctly Mongolian.

It does not follow that all the aboriginal inhabitants of America are of Mongolian descent, even if they all came from Asia. The writer has seen the descendants of the Aztecs in Mexico, and it is difficult to imagine any relationship between them and the Mongolian. Yet Aztec tradition points to the north as their original seat, and among a people who had no method of transmitting history by writing tradition is likely to have been fairly accurate. Europe was not all settled by one blood. The fair and the dark haired, the Celt and the Goth, swept over the continent, the current eddying here and there, where a wandering horde was tempted or compelled to rest. So that other races besides Mongols may have emigrated from Asia to America.

AZTEC TRADITION.

The Aztec tradition of northern migration is supported by various circumstances, and one to the bearing of which, I think, attention has never before been called. It is well known that the Aztecs have a slanting forehead—or, in other words, they have no forehead at all—the skull being depressed in front almost on an angle with the nose. A tribe in British Columbia has for ages practiced the custom of depressing by artificial means the foreheads of children so as to make the head look very like that of an Aztec. This is not done to the heads of children of the lowest class in the tribe—the depressed forehead being a sign of at least respectable rank. It is not unreasonable to suppose that the origin of this singular habit may have had some connection with Aztec supremacy in that region at a far remote period, when it became to the interest of a subject clan to have as near a physical resemblance as possible to the conquering race.

The American Indians are passing away. Cities have grown where I have shot the prairie chicken, chased the buffalo and kept midnight watch for the prowling Sioux a few years ago. Another ten years and it will be difficult to find an Indian of the sort that followed Sitting Bull, and harassed the infant settlements of Dakota. They will have become half civilized specimens of humanity, living on the charity of the government, without the virtues of independence, and with numerous vices of which in freedom they were happily ignorant. These Indians have traditions that are worthy of being handed down; their languages, soon to perish, are worth preserving.—Letter in New York Star.

Shall our towels be huck-a-back or damask? That, too, is a matter of taste, but it is also a matter of complexion. The skin needs vigorous rubbing with a somewhat rough surface to keep the pores open, and whatever false notions some girls and older persons may have, cleanliness and open pores are the first requisites of a good complexion. Huck-a-back seems best for general use, then; but a few damask towels are a nice possession.

JUSTICE WITHOUT LAW.

A Judge in Tucson Who Sent All Offenders to the Rock Pile.

Capt. Bourke, of the army, is an interesting story teller, and possesses a rich fund of reminiscence and anecdote.

"Twenty years ago," said the captain, "I was in Tucson. No place was ever worse governed. Outlaws abounded and they did about as they pleased. Finally the good citizens of the place—merchants and men of property—determined to bring about a reform, and the way they decided to do it was to elect a judge who would deal honestly with the scalawags who were running the town and corrupting the courts. So they chose a man named 'Charlie' Meyers to be judge. 'Charlie' was a druggist, who knew nothing about law, but he was perfectly honest, and that was the only qualification the citizens desired. Accordingly, 'Charlie' set up a law dispensary in the same building with his drug shop, and dealt out justice and patent medicines with equal grace. In his court he established a library of calf bound books, consisting chiefly of the Materia Medica and Somebody on Fractured Bones. He engaged as an officer of the court a man who was afraid of nothing or nobody—old 'Jimmy' Douglas, who carried in his leg a bullet that he had picked up at Gettysburg, and who walked with some difficulty and with a peculiar though not graceful limp. The first thing that 'Charlie' did was to establish a chain gang and sentence to various terms in its service every offender that was brought before him. The shyster lawyers who had 'run' the town before 'Charlie's' incumbency protested against this as a violation of the constitution of the United States, but they protested in silence. In fact, the protest was useless. The process of the judge was rather summary, but the result was very gratifying to the good citizens of Tucson. The wild, rough characters who had ruled the town were now engaged in cleaning the streets, and Tucson was seeing an era of prosperity that it had not known since its foundation. But if the business men were pleased, the lawyers were proportionately disgusted. The court refused to recognize them and their business was gone. One day, however, one of them plucked up spirit enough to go before the court in behalf of his client and demanded a trial by jury. The court was about to sentence the prisoner to a term in the chain gang, when the lawyer interposed a demurrer. 'My client,' he said, 'objects to being tried by this court, on the ground of prejudice, and demands to be tried by jury.'

"'By shury,' said Charlie. 'What is dot shury?'

"'He demands,' said the lawyer, to be tried by his peers.'

"'Oh, he does, does he?' said Charlie. 'Vell I sendence him to two veeks in the shain gang and I sendence you to one veek. Now how you like dot trial by shury?' and into the chain gang the lawyer went and there he stayed until his term was up.

"One day a man named Wolf was brought before the court for cheating some Indians out of $3. He was an unscrupulous man but a shrewd one and he knew all the tricks of the law. 'Charlie' felt that in his case the Materia Medica was not sufficient authority and so he adjourned the court to get an opportunity to consult some books on the law or to obtain advice from somebody with a knowledge of it. As he declared the case postponed and the court adjourned, however, he turned to the prisoner and said: 'Volf, it is de unanimous opinion of dis community dot you are a —— tief and this court coincides fully in dot opinion.'

"Wolf lost color and raising his fist he said: 'Judge, I don't let any one speak to me in that way.'

"'Dis court fines you $10 for raising your fist against it,' said Charlie, 'and you stands committed to de shain gang until it is paid.'

"Wolf knew that there was no recourse and he reluctantly paid the $10. The judge gravely took it and after dividing $5 between himself and 'Jimmy' Douglas, he gave $5 to the Indians. And to this day, in the annals of that Indian tribe, 'Charlie' Meyers is the most righteous judge that ever held court, for did they not sue for $3 before him and recover $5?"—Washington Telegram.

One of Grant's Secretaries.

Ex-Secretary of War Belknap is one of the best known men in the city of Washington. He grows rounder and jollier and more red in the face as the years go by, and the circle of his friends appears to be continually widening. He is a gastronome, a wit and a story teller. He makes ten or fifteen thousand dollars a year as a claim agent and spends it all. He has a lovely family and a luxurious home.—Cor. Augusta Chronicle.

In England in 1868-69 there was one known thief to every 1,000 persons; in 1887-88 the percentage had fallen by nearly one-half, and there was only one known thief to every 1,945 persons. The decrease in the receivers of stolen goods is still greater. In 1868-69 there was one to every 8,430 people; in 1887-88 there was one to every 25,599.

LIFE IN THE SEVERED HEAD.

The Survival of Consciousness After Decapitation Proven.

A volume has just been published at Paris in which Dr. Paul Loye, under the title of "La Mort par la Decapitation," studies the question as to whether, after decapitation, consciousness survives for a short time in the severed head and physical suffering is felt in both parts of the executed body.

Every time a head falls under the sword or under the executioner's ax, says Dr. Loye, the imagination of the spectators has, in the physiognomy of the victim, looked for proofs of the survival of will and consciousness. The eyes turned, which was a sign of pain; the lips moved, which showed that they wanted to speak; the mouth opened, in order to bite, in a kind of fury. There is not a movement of the face which has not been interpreted as a mark of the continuation of feeling. And ever since the guillotine mowed down the heads of multitudes during the reign of terror, scientists have stood around the scaffold, bidding all their humane faculties vanish, and concentrating their whole intellect on the one question, "Does consciousness remain after the victim's head is severed from the body?"

In connection with this belief Dr. Loye quotes a terrible story told by M. Petitgand about an Anamite who was beheaded by the sword in 1875 at Saigon:

"The place of execution was the Plain of Tombs, a vast sandy tract, serving as cemetery to the Anamites and the Chinese. Four Anamite pirates, taken with their arms in their hands, were to be beheaded. The chief of the band, a man in the prime of life, energetic, muscular, brave without boasting, and firm to the very last, had attracted my special attention, and I decided to make my observations on him only. Without losing sight of him for a single moment I exchanged a few words in a loud voice with the officer in charge, and noticed that the patient was also looking at me with the liveliest attention. The preparations having been completed, I took my stand at the distance of about two yards from him. He knelt down, but before bending his head he exchanged a rapid look with me.

"His head fell down at the distance of about a yard and a quarter from where I stood. It did not roll in the usual way, but stood with the surface of the wound resting on the sand, a position by which the hemorrage was accidentally reduced to a minimum. At this moment I was terror stricken at seeing the eyes of the doomed man fixed frankly on my eyes. Not daring to believe in a conscious manifestation, I went quickly to one side of the head lying at my feet, and I found that the eyes followed me. Then I returned to my first position; still the eyes went with me for a short distance and then quitted me quite suddenly. The face expressed at that moment a conscious agony, the agony of a person in a state of acute asphyxia. The mouth opened violently as if to take in a breath of air, and the head thrown off its equilibrium by the motion rolled over. This contraction of the maxillary muscles was the last sign of life. Since the moment of decapitation from fifteen to twenty seconds had passed."—New York Press.

Contented.

"Our content is our best having," says Shakespeare; but it is only the few who really know what the word means. There is an old lady, however, living in a quiet New England town, who is actually a contented woman. One day she was sitting in the porch, placidly knitting, when a book agent appeared. After finishing the business part of his interview, and inducing her to subscribe for "Scenes from Joppa," in twelve numbers, he remarked;

"Nice farm you've got here."

"Yes, we think so," said the old lady, taking up her knitting again.

"Must be lonesome in winter, though."

"Oh, no, not too lonesome; I don't like to have it so lively you can't hear yourself think."

"I guess the wind whistles some through these trees, about the time of the equinoctial."

"Maybe it does, I won't say it don't; but it only makes me thankful we've got enough fire wood."

"How is it about books? I don't suppose you have a library in town?"

"Well, no, not to call a library," said she, cautiously, not wishing to hear her native place disparaged; "but there's books in circulation. Mis' Miles has got 'Pilgrim's Progress,' and I've got 'Uncle Tom's Cabin.' So once a year we swap."

"Have any lectures or concerts?"

"Husband says there's good speakin' in caucus, some of it real violent; and if you want to hear singin', sir, you just come into our Sunday school. Sometimes it fairly makes the tears come into my eyes, to hear them little creatur's tune up."

"Well, well," said the book agent, "I've seen a good many folks that call themselves contented, but I don't think one of 'em could come up to you. Shut up in this lonesome place, and making the best of it, too! Why, I don't suppose you ever travel!"

"Oh yes," said the old lady, primly, not too well pleased at hearing herself praised at the expense of her beloved town, "we travel as much as most folks. Last summer we went six miles to camp meeting, and two years ago we went to Boston—and that's forty-five miles, sir!"—Youth's Companion.

Among the many good works of the queen of Saxony is her education of women of all ranks to be nurses. In 1867 she summoned the women of Dresden to meet her in council, and at the end of a year there were 1,200 nurses ready for service. They were called Albertinerinnen, from the name of the crown prince. Any one ill in Dresden sent a request to any hospital managed by Albertinerinnen. Under their charge is the Queen's hospital and a convalescent home on the banks of the Elbe, which the queen purchased from her private means.

Able Bodied Chicago Liars.

Said Col. Phil Heyne yesterday: "The hottest day in the history of Chicago was July 4, 1837. At noon that day the thermometer registered 123 in the shade. The lake stewed and steamed like a tea kettle and fish floated ashore already boiled and cream gravy on them."

"June 28, 1842, was the hottest day I ever knew of," said Long John Wentworth. "I was living on a farm then—the Cooley farm, near where Kinsley's restaurant stands now. It was so hot that we had to hang the thermometer in the well and keep fanning it to prevent it from bursting."

"On Aug. 6, 1846," said Amos Tucker, "we caught a blazer. Along about sunset I went out to the barnyard to see how the stock was getting along. We had twelve fine hogs just ready for the market. Well, when I got to the barnyard all I could find of them hogs was twelve buckets of leaf lard."

"The hottest day I ever knew of was July 15, 1853," said Jonathan Young Scammon. "I remember the exact date, because on the morning of that day our hens all laid hard boiled eggs."—Chicago News.

Society Notes.

The engagement of Miss Erminie Botts, daughter of the wealthy livery stable proprietor, to Lord Ernest Algernon Sykes-Nyms of Cove-upon-Avon is announced. This wedding will take place next September at the bride's palatial home at Bottsden-on-Goose Island.

A gloom has been precipitated upon the community by the rumor that Miss Birdie McPhee's vaccination did not take.

Mr. Swinburne J. Terhune is still confined to his bed owing to his having eaten a slice of fruit cake at a fashionable german last Thursday evening.

Too Much Enthusiasm.

"Teaching, to me," said an enthusiastic young school ma'am, "is a holy calling. To sow in the young mind the seeds of future knowledge and watch them as they grow and develop is a pleasure greater than I can tell. I never weary of my work. I think only of"——

"I am very sorry," interrupted the young man to whom she was talking, "that you are so devoted to your profession, Miss Clara. I had hoped that some day I might ask you—in fact I called to-night to—but I hardly dare go on, in the light of what you"——

"You may go on, Mr. Smith," said the young lady, softly. "I'm a little too enthusiastic at times, perhaps."—New York Sun.

A Universal Sentiment.

"Are you an admirer of the national game, Miss Breezy?" inquired young Mr. Wabash, of Chicago.

"Not an ardent admirer by any means, Mr. Wabash," the young lady replied brightly. "I do not deem the influences surrounding baseball particularly elevating or refining, although I occasionally witness a game. But I must say," she continued, with rather more emphasis than the circumstances seemed to warrant, "that in trying to win the pennant without Mike Kelly, the Baby has bit off more than he can chaw."—New York Sun.

HORACE GREELEY'S GRIEF.

How the Great Editor Sorrowed Over the Death of His Only Boy.

Perhaps the most pathetic chapter in Mr. Greeley's life was the death of his idolized boy "Pick." His grief was almost beyond control. Margaret Fuller, writing from Rome soon after the failure of the revolution of '49 to her mother, says:

"Receiving, a few days since, a packet of letters from America, I opened them with more feeling of hope and good cheer than for a long time past. The first words that met my eye were these, in the hand of Mr. Greeley: 'Ah, Margaret! The world grows dark with us! You grieve, for Rome is fallen; I mourn, for Pickie is dead.'

"I have shed rivers of tears over the inexpressibly affecting letter thus begun. One would think I might have become familiar enough with images of death and destruction; yet, somehow, the image of Pick's little dancing figure lying stiff and stark, between his parents, has made me weep more than all else. There was little hope that he could do justice to himself, or lead a happy life, in so perplexed a world; but never was a character of richer capacity—never a more charming child. To me he was most dear, and would always have been so. Had he become stained with earthly faults, I could never have forgotten what he was to me when my soul pined for sympathy, pure and unalloyed. The three children I have seen who were fairest in my eyes, and gave most promise of the future, were Waldo (Emerson), Pickie, Hermann Clark—all nipped in the bud. Endless thought has this given me, and a resolve to seek the realization of all hopes and plans elsewhere; which resolve will weigh with me as much as it can weigh before the silver cord is finally loosed. Till then, earth, our mother, always finds strange unexpected ways to draw us back to her bosom—to make us seek anew a nutriment which has never failed to cause us frequent sickness."

Mr. Greeley himself, in his Recollections, says:

"I looked in vain through Italian galleries, two years after he was taken from us, for any parallel to his dazzling beauty—a beauty not physical merely, but visibly radiating from the soul. His hair was of the finest and richest gold; "the sunshine of picture" never glorified its equal; and the delicacy of his complexion at once fixed the attention of observers like the late N. P. Willis, who had traversed both hemispheres without having his gaze arrested by any child who could bear a comparison with this one. * * * When at length the struggle ended with his last breath, and even his mother was convinced that his eyes would never again open on the scenes of this world, I knew that the summer of my life was over, that the chill breath of its autumn was at hand, and that my future course must be along the downhill of life."

The following letter, which is undated, was evidently written in reply to one of condolence:

"Your letter, dear R., was written in your noblest spirit. I thank you warmly for your sympathy. What he was to me, even you can hardly dream; you that have two sons, in which the natural thirst of the heart was earlier satisfied, can hardly know what my one ewe lamb was to me. That he might live, that I might grow daily better for his sake, that I might not spoil him by overweening love, were ever recurring thoughts. God be merciful to me a sinner."—New York Tribune.

Umbandine, the Swazie King.

A beautiful young wife of the king's had in some innocent way displeased him. The order was given to smell her out, and the witch doctors did their horrible work. Executioners were told off, and they were sent out to the young wife to tell her of her sentence. She dressed herself in her best ornaments, and determined to appear before the king to say "Good-by." She had been the ruler's playmate and favorite sweetheart as a child, and she ventured to send a message to him asking permission to say "Good-by" to him. The king refused the request. Calmly preparing for death, the young woman disregarded the denial, and walked to where his "majesty" was sitting, drinking champagne. She said to him: "King, I have come to say 'good-by;' tell me why you are killing me."

The king vouchsafed no answer, and turned his face away. The poor woman proceeded to bid adieu to the other wives and girls of the monarch. They stood in a row, and as she walked down in front of them she said: "I am the first, but there will be more of you to come after me." Without another word she quietly followed her executioners. They led her about three miles from the kraal, across the Tillan river, and there hanged her on a low thorn tree. The reim by which she was suspended being too long, her feet nearly touched the ground, and strangulation was completed by beating the reim with sticks, the person of royalty being sacred to the common touch.—South Africa.

Mr. Bright's Speeches.

Above twenty years ago I was talking with Mr. Bright in the smoking room of the house of commons. He was going to speak later on in the evening, and he had a large roll of notes which he was looking through. "I never learned a speech but once," he said, "and then I did not remember it. But I consider that no one ought to address the house on an important issue without thoroughly getting the subject into his head, and knowing how he intends to treat it." "You write down some passages," I said, pointing to the notes. "Yes," he replied, "I do, otherwise I might say more than I intended." And then he went on to explain that his greatest difficulty in mastering the art of which he had become such a master had been to acquire the habit of speaking slowly. "You should not make pauses between words and sentences," he went on to say, "but pronounce distinctly every syllable."—London Truth.

Inconsistent Prudes.

Speaking of pictures, why is it that people are so much more prudish about them than about the books they take home? Everybody who stops to think about it will know that the distinction is made, and nobody will find it easy to explain the inconsistency. It is safe to say that a nude figure cannot be found among the paintings in any private house in Memphis. It would be considered the height of impropriety to have such a thing about the place for young people to look at, although it would probably be admitted that the work could not be accused of impure suggestion, since it represented only the human figure in repose. It would be no more immodest than the cuts in the physiologies that the young folks study in school. On the other hand, books are read by the family that are not only full of vile innuendo and calculated to give an unhealthful stimulus to the imagination of the reader, but which have the purpose of undermining the very foundations of the home.

Indeed, there seems to be a genuine craze for books of this kind. The most valuable advertisement that can be given a new novel, for instance, is to denounce it as immoral. The public does not want to know if it is nice, but if it is nasty. If the latter, it is read with avidity, and the book sellers can scarcely supply the demand. Memphis is scarcely so eager for literary filth as some other cities are represented to be, but too many books of the "Hermia Suydam" kind are sold here. They are the outcroppings of depraved minds which feed upon the vices and meannesses of our nature, and seek to spew them out upon society as true exemplars of humanity. The brave, honorable men and pure women, who are found on every side of us, are left out of the collection of these naturalists of the Zola school. No traits or impulses are wanted before their camera which do not bring with them the scent of the sower.—Memphis Appeal.

The Condessa D'Edla.

A little over five years ago a Springfield man in Paris found a former Springfield girl in affluence as the morganatic wife of Ferdinand II, the ex-king of Portugal. She received him kindly and inquired particularly after several of her former mates in this city. The story of her life was familiar to Tilly Hayes and his sister, now traveling in Europe, and while in Lisbon recently their cards were presented to the Condessa d'Edla, as she is now known. The countess appointed an hour for a visit, and received her American friends very cordially, as a letter states. To quote by permission: "We enjoyed our visit very much. The exterior of the house or building where she lives is not at all prepossessing; we would call it shabby; but they all seemed to be the same.

"The drawing room where she received us was handsomely furnished in modern style. She expressed herself as being rather desirous of returning to the States to live, and should doubtless do so after her business matters are settled here. She says society is dull, and after the death of her husband she has gone out but little." This is Elise Hensler, who thirty-five years ago was the little daughter of Conrad Hensler, a tailor, whose shop and house were in a humble location on Stockbridge street. She and her sister, Louise, used to attend the Sunday school at the South church, then on Bliss street, and sing in children's entertainments in old Hampden Hall, along with other little folks who have grown up and settled down here as the heads of families. The Hensler family moved to Boston for the musical education of the girls, and Elise went abroad, where she had a career as an opera singer till her marriage. Louise is living in Boston (Chestnut Hill), and is the wife of Dr. Slade.—Springfield Republican.

Luck and Superstition.

Unquestionably the doctrine of portents and luck does still influence conduct. There are ladies, not overconscientious in the discharge of religious observances, who would sooner disconcert a hostess and throw a roomful of guests into confusion than sit down with twelve others at the dinner table. The lover will not give his sweetheart an opal ring, however pretty the stone may be; the guest at the table shudders when he spills the salt and furtively tries to propitiate fate by throwing a few grains over her shoulder. Penknives and scissors are tabooed as presents. Many a man would choose any day in the week but Friday for starting on a journey, or beginning some great enterprise. Many a woman dislikes (apart from sympathetic sentiment) to meet a funeral, or encounter a black cat.

One can say that the objection to passing under a ladder is no more whimsical than is the conviction that to walk across Regent circus at noon, with closed eyes, involves risk. Yet a superstitious motive is assigned for giving a wider berth to the falling bricks, while the duty of keeping one's eyes open in a London thoroughfare is allowed to rest on the prosaic basis of experience.—London Standard.

The Old Man Had an Offset.

The other day we learned the facts in the experience of an Americus young man who wooed and lost—five dollars. He had courted the fair one all along the winter months, burning both wood and kerosene freely, and had had a splendid time. He sold the father of the young lady a cow, and received all the pay except five dollars. In course of time there came upon the scene another young lady, whom the young man liked better. He courted her, proposed, and hardly was the marriage feast over before he was in need of the five dollars. He called upon the father of his old sweetheart and asked for the money. His request was refused with the reply: "You burned my wood and my kerosene, and now I'm going to keep this five dollars as pay." Sadly the young man took his departure, and he gets a little mad now when you ask him about that five dollars.—Americus (Ga.) Republican.

WALL STREET TIPSTERS.

A CLASS OF MEN WHO MANAGE TO EXIST BY USE OF THEIR WITS.

They Will Give You Trustworthy Information if You Promise an Interest in Your Purchase—They Form a Queer Element in the Exciting Life.

The evolution of the Wall street tip has been curious and interesting. Starting years ago, in a little speck known as "private information," it has developed into a system. The system is headed by boss tipsters and footed by journeymen tipsters. There are tipsters who have made immense fortunes. They don't call themselves tipsters. Neither does anybody else but the irreverent ones. But they are tipsters, or they have been. And there are tipsters who are worse off now financially—and morally, too—than when they began.

It is a queer business. To be a successful tipster requires many accomplishments. The one who travels tranquilly along the road to fortune is he who is well educated, talks well, dresses well, and, above all, knows well the man to whom he presents his tips. The business of the tipster is to give information as to the probable course of the price of stocks and to secure an interest in any purchase or sale made by the moneyed individual to whom he imparts the information. If the tipster is right oftener than he is wrong, then he makes money and is respected. If his tips are bad oftener than they are good, why, he is despised and even hated, and, instead of truffles, he lives on coffee and cakes, and is a prophet without honor in any country.

HIS STOCK IN TRADE.

The tipster requires no financial capital. Cheek is what he needs—a hard cheek and plenty of it. Whether the cheek is natural or whether it is acquired makes no difference. Many a timid, shrinking young man has gone into Wall street, from some cause or another, and in a few years has cultivated a facial development which would crack a paving stone if it came in collision with one. He has gone into Wall street—and he has staid there. No genuine, simon pure tipster ever retired from the street, and though they grow old they never die. Their cheek is a barrier between them and the old man with the scythe. Behind the cheek there must always be discretion. The cheek that carries with it the undesirable attachment known as "freshness" is of no value.

It must be a well regulated cheek, a cheek always under control and always in readiness to respond to the call of duty when opportunity comes. Professionally, this quality is not known as cheek. It is called "a good business presence." But it is cheek, just as much as stock speculation to the great majority is gambling. And the crack tipster must also have a well developed faculty for explaining defeat. He must never admit that he was wrong. That would be fatal. He must say that somebody else was wrong, and he must valiantly offer to prove it. If his cheek is properly regulated and serves him well, the disappointed principal will listen to him and accept more tips from him.

It is not a profession that can be mastered by books. Experience only brings mastery. There is a certain zest about it, a sort of fascinating uncertainty. The young man gets what he thinks is some private information regarding the future of, say, Hohokus third preferred. He remembers that a certain man once told him that if he ever happened to hear of anything good to let him know. Perhaps nobody ever told him that, and perhaps he makes up his mind to go to a stranger. Before he goes he probably sits down and figures on the possible profits. The pleasures of hope are his for a few moments. Then, a little bit rattled and uneasy, he starts for the lair of the capitalist.

HOW HE PROCEEDS.

His reception is not enthusiastic; it is not encouraging. The bloated bondholder merely nods at him and grunts.

"I think, sir," says the young man, "that I have some very good information regarding Hohokus thirds."

"You have, hey?" growls the man with rocks. "Well, what is it and where did you get it?"

"Hohokus is good for an eight point rise," answers the callow tipster, with much confidence.

"Oh, it is, is it? Where did you find that out?"

The tipster asks of the capitalist a promise of secrecy and the capitalist snorts haughtily. Then he tells how a friend of his is a clerk in the office of the president of the Hohokus railroad, and this friend has happened to mention to him that "the old man and his friends have been buying Hohokus thirds on every little slump, and he has overheard the old man advising its purchase."

The capitalist grunts and says h'm a good many times. He observes that he doesn't take much stock in that kind of information. The tipster who is being described now is a student of human nature, and has discovered as time has passed that this capitalist isn't such a pre-eminent individual after all, and he has become so absolutely certain that Hohokus is going up that he begins to feel independent.

"All right," he says; "I only wish I had money enough to buy it myself. But I guess I can get Billy Blobbs to buy me some."

The capitalist hates Blobbs, and as the tipster is about to leave he calls him back.

"Well," he says, "if you are so sure I'll buy a few hundred on joint account."

He does buy it, and Hohokus does advance. Thereafter the tipster is a welcome guest, and he continues as such so long as his tips are right.

The unsuccessful tipster is a man who would excite sympathy if it were not for his unvarying confidence that he is going to obtain a point some time that will put him on his feet.—New York Times.

FRIDAY AUGUST 29 1890

County Official Paper.

It will be freely admitted by Democrats themselves, that for Chief Justice the first choice of a large majority of the party is Judge Wallace. He is admitted to be a great lawyer, an experienced and incorruptible Judge, and has the full confidence of the people of the State, without regard to party. It was taken for granted by the great body of Democrats that Judge Wallace would be nominated on the first ballot in the Convention. He was easily defeated, and the name of the man who was nominated was almost entirely unknown outside of San Francisco. While on the Bench Judge Wallace gave many judgments adverse to great corporations; he looked only to law and justice and decided accordingly. Corporations sent their agents into the Convention and defeated him. This is too open and notorious a fact to be denied. Corporate influence in Conventions can, and does, nominate candidates, but on election day the people have their turn, and every creature of a corporation should then be sternly rebuked by an overwhelming defeat. It is a true scripture "when the wicked rule the people mourn" and no where can the tool of corporations cause more mourning than when seated on the bench to prevent justice.

Everybody is well acquainted with the shameful fact that in our State a seat in the United States Senate was put up to sale and sold to the highest bidder. It is quite as notorious that the buyer of the seat is so utterly unqualified for the place he occupies that Californians blush for shame everytime he appears in the Senate. There is very slight ground for hope that any better results will be attained so long as the people are not allowed a direct voice in the choice of Senators. Stephen M. White in the late Democratic Convention tried to secure for the people the right to declare their choice for a Senator; the corporations and the bosses were too strong for him; honest, capable and brave as he is, he was crushed by the power of the bosses and compelled to let them have their way. There were many honest men in the Convention, but there were enough of the other kind, willing tools of schemers, to destroy their influence and nominate such men as were acceptable to corporations and bosses. The great aim of all corporations and corrupt political managers is to elect Senators, Congressmen and Judges who will do their bidding; with these secured against them the people are helpless.

In all exhibits of animals for premiums, other things being equal, blooded stock will be preferred.

All articles included in the above list, except the first department, to be on exhibition at the Pavilion on second day and remain during the Fair.

Special premiums will be allowed for articles exhibited not included in above list

If you have entries to make, attend to it at once, and when your entries are made, see to it that they are on time and at place for examination by the committee.

Accept no rumors in regard to the business of the exhibition. If you do not know what to do, inquire of the officers whose duty it is to tell you. One half of the trouble and disappointment at the Fair is caused by relying on hearsay. Attend to your business yourself. If it is done wrong you know where the blame lies.

Read the rules, and, by example, at least, assist in enforcing them; but don't forget that mistakes will occur where many people are congregated. The Board endeavors to do justice to all.

If the Superintendents and Committeemen are not always ready at the appointed hour, keep your stock and articles where you can command them at any time. Remember that we have but little time to do much business; patience, with a little system, will overcome many obstacles.

The Board will give the same special attention to details that has contributed to success in the past. It remains for the exhibitors to achieve still better results for the Fair of 1890.

ADMISSION.

Life Membership	$30 00
Membership ticket, admitting member, wife and minor children	5 00

SUMMERS—SMITH—At Bishop, August 20th by Rev. A. Clark, Mr. B. B. Summers and Miss Mattie Smith.

The Independence school will open on Monday.

D. B. Curtis will be a candidate for Supervisor on the Democratic ticket.

Mr. and Mrs. A. W. Eibeshutz intend starting for San Francisco on Tuesday.

The Democratic primary election for delegates to the county convention will be held to-morrow.

Mr. Thomas Williams and Mr. W. Horton of Round Valley were at the Land office on business yesterday.

Ben. T. Williams passed through town early in the week on his return home from the lower end of the county.

Frank Fitzgerald was telegraphed for and is expected to be present at the examination of William Alcorn on Tuesday.

Mr. W. H. Russell came down from Benton last Monday and was in town some days. He has gone to Lone Pine.

Al. Staudinger is preparing for a display of marble at the coming Fair at Independence. He has several very beautiful specimens already completed.

The Chronicle-Union says that the Republican Central Committee of Mono county will offer the name of Wilson Butler as a candidate for the Assembly.

Dan Donovan, a former Sheriff of Storey county, Nevada, was found dead in his room last Saturday night. He had consumption and died from hemorrhage of the lungs.

John Barnes and John Morton came up from Keeler last Tuesday to give evidence at the examination of William Alcorn for forgery. Their trip was fruitless and their time lost.

Mr. S. G. Gregg offers himself as a candidate for the office of Sheriff. There is scarcely a voter in Inyo county but knows Steve Gregg, and no other introduction is needed beyond the mention of his name.

F. McIver is a candidate for Supervisor. Every voter in the Third District is well acquainted with Mr. McIver; he is deeply interested in the county and if chosen to the office will faithfully do his whole duty.

Mr. and Mrs. J. A. McKenzie went north last Tuesday morning on their way to San Francisco. Mr. Seaman, brother to Mrs. McKenzie, accompanied them. The party expect to be gone about a month.

Mr. Al Staudinger was placed in charge at the Marble quarry as successor to Captain Bronson. Mr. Staudinger has been engaged at the quarry about five years and is thoroughly familiar with all the marble veins.

There is good reason to believe that the displays in all departments of the Fair at Independence this year will show a marked improvement over former years. Everybody should make all possible endeavor to show something, and the best of everything they have got.

The tunnel that has been so long in progress at the San Carlos mine was expected to strike the ledge several weeks ago. It has been found that some distance above the tunnel the ledge is bent to the northwest, and this is why it was not reached sooner. The face of the tunnel at last report showed that the ledge was very near and ore might be struck at any time.

George Thorpe came in from Sylvania yesterday. He reports that the engine for the hoisting works is nearly ready for work. The furnace will not be ready for up much sooner than October 1st. The principal mine shaft is being timbered into two divisions. A large boarding house and another building for a store will be completed as soon as possible. About seventy-five men, all told, are employed at the Camp.

J. J. Crosby, of the firm of Crosby & McMillan, Virginia City, has been in the Valley all the week. The firm does a large business in produce and general merchandise. The object of Mr. Crosby in coming here is to find in what quantities he could buy apples, butter, eggs, poultry and other farm produce. There would be a fine market for produce at Virginia City but we will have to largely increase the amount raised before it would be worth the time of buyers to look after it.

Miners complain that during temporary absences from their camps thieves go and steal their tools and every kind of supplies they can lay their hands on. Doors have been broken open and all sorts of provisions carried off. This is a felony punishable by confinement in State prison for a long term of years. But if any such thief should be caught in the act he will be very likely to become a fixture right there. Better heed the warning.

Last Friday evening a large party met at the marble quarry, the occasion being a farewell reception to Captain Bronson. The visitors were very kindly received and hospitably entertained. Music was provided and dancing was kept up till daylight. After bidding farewell to many friends the Captain got on the train Saturday morning and left for the new mill near Verdi on the Truckee river where he was to take charge on his arrival. Captain Bronson made many friends while he was in charge at the quarry.

The Marble Quarry.

Without visiting the marble quarry it is not possible to clearly understand what a vast mass of marble is there, nor how varied it is. A great branch that makes out from the main chain of the Inyo Mountains appears to be almost entirely of marble. There is every variety, from snow white to black. There are blocks now ready for shipment that weigh ten tons, and these are of the most beautiful moss-agate colors. There are other blocks that appear as if inlaid with gold all over, the interspaces being snow white, with very delicate figures in shades of brown that look like miniature ferns and flowers. When polished this variety of marble is very beautiful, and would make interior decorations of the greatest elegance. About three hundred feet above the level of the valley white marble is now taken out. Great blocks that weigh fifteen tons or more are loosened and let go down the mountain; they come down with a noise like thunder and rest convenient to the railroad track, where they are further prepared for shipment and are then lifted on board the cars by a derrick. There is a rapidly growing demand for the marble, and as there is nothing like it known elsewhere it is certain to be shipped all over the country. The fancy marbles especially will be wanted for decoration and furniture. Just now there is much demand for a variety of light gold color that takes a lovely polish.

Practical Politics.

I am going to be a delegate,
And in convention stand
Before our honored chairman,
With six proxies in my hand.

The candidates must rustle,
There will be no pledges taken,
But the man who gets the solid six
Is sure to not get shaken.

But recollect; my honest friend,
That I think it is no sin
When I give the nomination
To expect a little tin.

So the man who holds too tight
A grip upon his sack,
May just as well throw up the sponge
And take a seat way back,

My forty years experience
It need not here be told,
But, working for your candidate,
It takes some little gold.

So tell me not that talk is cheap,
Honor may do for some,
But when working for your friend
It takes money to buy rum.

PAP.

OLANCHA, August 27th.

Examination of Alcorn.

William Alcorn, the man accused of forging the name of Frank Fitzgerald to three checks, was brought from Candelaria by Sheriff Eldred last Friday. On Tuesday he was brought before Justice of Peace Baxter for examination. J. W. P. Laird appeared as attorney for Alcorn. District Attorney Gill represented the people. The case was examined on the check given by Alcorn to John Barnes. After hearing testimony and argument Justice Baxter decided that there was not sufficient evidence to hold Alcorn and ordered him discharged. Another complaint was lodged against Alcorn for passing a forged check to John Morton and he was at once rearrested and lodged in jail.

Fatal Accident.

Last Monday George list was killed at Bishop by falling from a wagon loaded with hay. The lines were fastened to a pole that projected up in front of the load. List rested his hand against the pole when reaching for the lines to start up the team; the pole broke and he fell against the horses; the animals at once started to run and pulled the wagon over the unfortunate man. He lived five hours after being hurt. His age is said to be about fifty years. He was commonly known by the name of "Big George."

DOWN AROUND THE RIVER.

Noon time and June time, down around the river!
Have to furse with 'Lizey Ann—but lawzy! I fer give her!
Drives me off the place, and says 'at all 'at she's a-wishin',
Land o' gracious! time'll come I'll git enough o' fishin'!
Little Dave a-choppin' wood, never 'pears to notice;
Don't know where she's hid his hat, er keerin where his coat is—
Specalatin', more'n like, he haint a-goin' to mind me,
And guessin' where say twelve o'clock, a feller'd likely find me.

Noon time and June time, down around the river!
Clean out o' sight o' home, and skulkin' under kivver
Of the sycamores, jack oaks and swamp ash, and ellum—
Idees all so jumt led up, you kin hardly tell 'em!—
Tired, you know, but lovin' it, and smilin' just to think 'at Any sweeter tiredness you'd fairly want to drink it.
Tired o' fishin'—tired o' fun—line out slack and slacker—
All you want in all the world's a little more to backer!

Hungry, but a-hidin' it, er jes' a-not a-keerin'—
Kingfisher gittin' up and skooting out o' hearin';
Snipes on the t'other side, where the County Ditch is,
Wadin' up and down the aidge like they'd rolled their britches!
Old turkle on the root kindo sorto drappin'
Intoo th' water like he don't know how it happen'
Worter, shades, and all so mixed, don't know which you'd orter
Say, th' worter in the shadder—shadder in the worter!

Somebody hollerin'—'way around the bend in Upper Fork—where yer eye kin jes' ketch the endin'
Of the shiney wedge o' wake some muss rat's a-makin'
With that pesky nose o' his! Then a sniff o' bacon,
Corn bread and 'dock greens—and little Dave a-shinnin',
'Crast the rocks and mussel shells, a-limping and a-grinning,
With yer dinner fer ye, and a blessin' from the giver,
Noon time and June time, down around the river! —James Whitcomb Riley

OLD MR. BINNEY.

All their friends had said, when Mrs. Binney died: "Now what a good thing it would be if old Mr. Binney would marry Miss Bright!"

Miss Bright had not been without her troubles, and very hard ones they had been, too, but she bore them with a brave heart, and carried a smiling face, and had a thankful spirit within her, striving always to remember her blessings, and how much they outnumbered any evils she was called upon to bear.

Indeed, to listen to Miss Bright's showing, you would have counted her as one of the luckiest persons ever born. She had had the kindest of friends, the most comfortable of situations, and the girls she had taught were endowed with an amiability of disposition which made it a positive pleasure to be with them. The only accusation she could bring against them was that they were all in such a terrible hurry to grow up and get married, and then Miss Bright's occupation was gone, and she had to step out into the world and find a fresh field for her labors.

As years rolled on, each one adding to the score of Miss Bright's age, these hunting grounds of instruction became more and more narrowed. Children of 8 began now where girls of 18 used to leave off, and history and geography, to say nothing of the parts of speech and grammar, were all so altered, that poor little Miss Bright had to acknowledge that at times she really did feel quite confused. "Very soon I shan't be left with anything to teach," she used to say, pathetically; and then Mr. Binney's nephew, Joe, or some other good fellow who heard her, would declare she should set up a school for wives, for there never were such wives as the girls whom Miss Bright had brought up. She had taught Joe's wife, Sally, and her sister, and though since then she had had other situations, at holiday time, or whenever she was seeking employment, she always returned to the house of Dr. Brendon, their father.

When Mr. Binney dropped in, as he frequently did, to inquire after his old friends, the Brendons, he from time to time found Miss Bright there; and happening in on the occasion of one of her visits there, to bring the news that Mrs. Binney was ill, with no one whose business it seemed to be to look after her, nothing was more natural than that Miss Bright should volunteer; and a great comfort they found her.

So sprightly yet unobtrusive was the cheery little woman that Mrs. Binney herself was influenced in her favor, until, with an eye to their mutual comfort, Mr. Binney proposed that Miss Bright should stay with them altogether.

"Why not?" he said. "We could well afford to pay her a salary."

But this word salary, acting like magic on Mrs. Binney, seemed to bring her to her senses immediately. She would be very glad to have Miss Bright as a visitor as long as she liked to stay, but as to living with them altogether—no, she would not give her consent to that; she had always objected to having in her house a third party. It was then that Miss Bright's friends pulled very long faces indeed. What would she do? they asked her.

"Oh, something is sure to turn up," she would say hopefully. "Whenever I have come to my last ebb an opening has always been made for me; and I am not going to despair now."

And she said this all the more emphatically, because, in spite of her confidence, she could not help feeling that a voice, which she could not still, kept repeating, "What will you do when you grow older? Teaching will get harder than ever." That was true enough, but what else was there for her to do?

When Mrs. Binney died, which happened quite suddenly about a year before, there had been some talk as to Miss Bright going to Mr. Binney's as housekeeper; but this proposition had been made without the knowledge or consent of the principal person concerned, who, as soon as the hint was given, negatived it.

Mr Binney thoroughly appreciated Miss Bright, but he had lost his taste for matrimony. He remembered that he had spent forty excellent years with a wife, and, notwithstanding that he was now a widower, he could not conscientiously say that he felt his state to be so unhappy.

Susan, the cook, respectable and staid, would, he felt sure, manage his household properly, and if it proved that she should give way to extravagance, as people seemed to say she would, Mr. Binney fancied that he could better put up with that evil than with the much of the economy from which he had suffered already.

So all the hopes that, on the death of Mrs. Binney, Joe and Sally and the Brendons had cherished for Miss Bright, were ruthlessly dashed to the ground. Evidently Aunt Binney was not to have a successor.

"If we could but have got her there as housekeeper," said two of those arch conspirators, "the rest would have been easy."

But though they returned to the attack several times, no good came of it. Mr. Binney shared in their regret at the loss of Miss Bright's pupils, wondered, as they did, what would become of her, and, his visitors gone, to make his sympathy apparent, he sat down and wrote a kind little note, with a check for $50 folded within it.

"He's an old stupid!" said Sally; "and now she is going away altogether, ever so far"—for Miss Bright had had another piece of news to tell. An old pupil of early days had been recently left a widow; her health was as delicate as her heart was kind, and when she made the proposition that Miss Bright should come and spend the rest of her days with her, it was not entirely of her own comfort that she had been thinking. Miss Bright had readily accepted her offer, and she had written to tell Sally that the next week she should come up and see them. She could only stay a few hours with them when she came. The farewell visit was to be paid later.

"But I think," she said, as she was going, "that I will call on my way home, and say good-by to Mr. Binney, in case I might not have another opportunity."

"Do," said Sally; and away she went.

Mr. Binney was at home. He had not been quite well lately; nothing more than a cold, but it had kept him a prisoner. Today he might have gone out, but he had not felt inclined to, and he gallantly said he was glad to be in, as he should have been sorry indeed to have missed seeing Miss Bright.

"And so you are really going to leave us?" he said, and almost regretfully, too. "Well, you will be very much missed. I don't know what the Brendons will do."

"They will not miss me more than I shall them," and the brave little woman made an effort that her voice should not sound shaky; "but you know, Mr. Binney, I am not growing younger, am I?"

"No," he said, "that is true. I was saying the very same to myself of myself only to day."

"Yes, only with men it does not seem to matter, but with women the thought always comes with a little shudder than when we get old and want a little quiet and rest, and a comfortable arm chair by the fire, there is a doubt whether we shall be able to get them."

Mr. Binney did not answer, and fearing she was saying too much about her own feelings, she altered her tone, which had been a little sad, and went on in her usual cheerful way:

"But then I ought to feel so thankful that this opening has been made for me. I told them that I knew something would come; it has always done so; I have always been so lucky."

"It's your happy disposition makes you say so, my dear Miss Bright; a cheerful spirit shortens the longest day. I wish I could follow your example. I often feel condemned at my want of contentment—of gratitude, I ought to say."

But that Miss Bright would not allow. She reminded Mr. Binney of the many kind actions he had done, and in her own quiet way thanked him for the thoughtful present he had sent to her.

"No, no, no; now you must not speak of that," Mr. Binney hastily interrupted her; and to give a turn to the conversation, he said she "must have some tea," and, ringing to order it, he hoped she could stay.

Well, yes, she thought she could spare time for that—indeed, to be plain, she was not in such a very great hurry. The fact had been that Joe had had an unexpected holiday, and she saw that, only for her being there, he had come home to go out somewhere with Sally.

"So I hope that little fib I told you will be forgiven me, for when I said that I was wanted at home, although it was quite true, perhaps I need not but for that have left quite so early. But it was so nice of Joe to come home. I do love to see husbands and wives companions to each other.

"Ah, indeed, yes; that is the object of matrimony too often, I fear, lost sight of in our day by the young and the old, too."

But Miss Bridget did not agree. "No, she knew so many united couples. There were the Brendons now"— But at this moment the tea was brought in, and Miss Bright asked should she pour it out. Her offer was accepted. "Only," said Mr. Binney, "you must take off your cloak, or you won't feel the good of it when you go; and your bonnet, too—wouldn't you be more comfortable without that?"

Miss Bright said "No," she would not take her bonnet off.

"Haven't a cap with you, I suppose?" said the old gentleman, slyly.

"Yes, indeed I have—a present from Sally—and a very becoming one, too."

"Put it on, then, and let me pass my opinion."

Miss Bright hastened to obey, and when she came for his inspection the smile on her face and the soft pink in her cheek made her look ten years younger.

"Well," she said, "now what do you think of it?"

"I think if you take my advice you will never wear any other."

"Really," and she laughed softly; "but it is for high days and holidays, you know!" and she tiptoed to look in the chimney glass, saying that it certainly was a very pretty cap, and then she sat down to pour out the tea. "The best tea things!" she said, admiringly; "I am so fond of pretty china!" And then, searching in the sugar basin, she added: "I have not forgotten that you like two lumps of sugar, you see."

Mr. Binney smiled complacently; a feeling of well being and comfort took possession of him. Of a certainty it was very pleasant to have a congenial somebody to bear one company—one who could talk well, listen well, and hold her tongue well, if necessary. Experience had assured him of that. Miss Bright possessed each of these good qualities. When she had stayed there, when Mrs. Binney was first ill, their evenings had passed very pleasantly, and recalling the things they had done, he asked:

"Do you often play chess now?"

"No, never."

"Cribbage, backgammon?"

"I've no one to play with. That is one thing in my going away," and she swallowed a sigh—"my evenings will be less lonely."

"Ah, yes; I find the time very long after dinner. I don't like to go to bed before half past 10, although I often feel inclined to."

"And the days draw in so quickly now there is no afternoon—it is all evening, which reminds me that it is getting time for me to go, for it takes me quite an hour to get to the station."

"Not in a carriage?"

"No, but I'm going to walk; it is quite fine and dry, and if I feel tired at the Conway road I shall wait at the corner for the omnibus passing."

Miss Bright began to put on her bonnet. Mr. Binney walked to the window; for a minute he looked out, then he rang the bell.

"I shall go with you as far as the Conway road."

"O, Mr. Binney! No, pray don't think of such a thing; it might give you a cold, and there isn't the slightest occasion—I am so accustomed to go about alone."

But Mr. Binney remained firm; his hat and coat were brought to him; and away the two set off together. They chatted pleasantly as they walked along. "I shall hope to come and see them all sometimes," Miss Bright said. "I know as long as the Brendons have a home they will take me in."

"And remember that so long as I have a house there will be room for you in it."

"That is very kind of you, Mr. Binney," she said, softly. "I am sure I do not know why people are so good to me."

Mr. Binney apparently was no better able to inform her, and they walked on silently until the Conway road was reached.

"Now, then," said Miss Bright, "here we say farewell," and she held out her hand, but Mr. Binney did not take it; he was engaged in hailing a carriage he saw; then he drew out his purse, and Miss Bright knew that he intended settling with the man for the fare. She shook her head at him reprovingly.

Mr. Binney gave the directions to the driver, and then he held out his hand, hesitated, opened the door, and said, "I don't see why I should not go with you as far as the station."

At the railway station they had but a very short time of waiting. Miss Bright stood near the carriage which she had chosen; nothing remained but to say good-by and enter.

"And you will let us hear how you get on?" for she had not said she was coming up again.

"O I shall often write to the Brendons and Sally. You will hear of me through them."

"And I hope very much that you will be comfortable and happy."

Miss Bright tried to smile, but her eyes filled rapidly, and to hide the tears she half turned away.

"I wish you were not obliged to go away. Couldn't anything be managed for you?"

She shook her head sadly. "No," she said; "I tried everything I could"—and here a sob would come—"but nobody seemed to want me."

"I—I want you!" Mr. Binney was stammering out his words excitedly. "Miss Bright, can you—will you stay for me? Could you consent to become Mrs. Binney?"

"Mrs. Binney! — I" — everything seemed to swim around her—"but, Mr. Binney, such an idea never once occurred to me."

"I am very sure of that, my dear," he said, earnestly, "and it has taken some time to come to me, or I should have made the offer long ago; however, better late than never—that is, if you will accept me."

"O, but I think it is so good of you—and you feel sure that I can make you happy? What will the Brendons and Sally say?"

"Say that I am more lucky than I deserve to be for not asking you before. Now I understand why I wouldn't consent to your being my housekeeper; I was wanting you for my wife, you know."

Miss Bright held up her hands in dismay.

"O my!" she cried, "there's the train off—gone, I declare!"

"What of that, if it is? Another will soon follow, and while we are waiting for it we can arrange our plans and fix the day."

And if any one wishes to know how it all ended I can satisfy their curiosity by telling them that a more happy, cheery couple never were seen than the present Mr. and Mrs. Binney.—Boston True Flag.

Heavy Sentence of a Spy.

The Nice police a few weeks ago caught another spy, this time said to be in the military service of Italy. He was brought up for trial before the tribunal, when he gave his name as Peter Contin, and said that he was born at Agram, in Austria. The police alleged, however, that his real name was Contini, and that he was an officer in the Italian reserves. About twenty witnesses were called to prove that he had passed himself off sometimes as an Englishman, at others as a Swiss, and as an Austrian; that he had followed the autumn maneuvers of the French troops, and had been seen making drawings of the fortifications of Nice, Toulon and Marseilles. Some of these plans, together with technical descriptions, were found in his boxes, and Gen. Garnier des Garets, commander of the Nice garrison, said they would be of the greatest value to an enemy. The tribunal considered the charge of espionage proved, and sentenced Contini to the maximum penalty of 5,000 francs and five years' penal servitude.—Cor. London News.

Tramp—Madam, can you help a poor man with a wife and eleven children at home?"

Woman—Are you very needy?

Tramp—Needy is no word for it, ma'am; I couldn't see the childers suffer, so I left them to ask assistance of the charitable.

Woman—Did you leave home to-day.

Tramp—No, ma'am; it will be seven years to-morrow. Can't you help a man who wants to surprise his little ones?—Judge.

The Doctor's Hail Stone.

St. Paul, Minn., had a remarkable hailstone a few days ago, and a correspondent says, to illustrate more forcibly the size of the stones and the competition to secure the mammoth, the feat of a wag, who in the height of the shower rushed to his ice chest and hacked out a two pound chunk from a cake therein, hastily clipping off the sharp corners with a hatchet, which he pitched from a window into the yard of an excited neighbor, is apropos. As the huge specimen fell upon the turf, the doctor wildly rushed out from his piazza, and at the imminent risk of perforation of his bald caput captured the monster, and hurrying to his study made a plaster cast of his prize, not for a moment doubting its genuineness.—Philadelphia Call.

—Failures and mistakes often spring from discouragement. Does not every human being need a believing second self whose support and approbation shall reinforce his failing courage? To sensitive and excitable people, who expend nervous energy freely, must come many low tides of depressed hours. In such cases we need another self to restore an equilibrium.—Mrs. Stowe.

FIFTEEN THOUSAND DOLLARS.

This is the Sum that a Piano-Varnisher Won in The Louisiana State Lottery.

New Yorkers appear to be pretty lucky in capturing prizes in The Louisiana State Lottery. In the Grand Semi-Annual Drawing held on June 17, Martin H. Simonson, of 412 West 50th St., held one fortieth of ticket 59,843, which drew the First Capital Prize of $600,000. Mr. Simonson is a piano-varnisher by trade, and at the time he received his $15,000, representing his part of the winning ticket, he was employed by Hardman, Peck & Co., the piano manufacturers of this city. Since he received the $15,000 that his ticket won Mr. Simonson has done no work. Mr. Simonson, however, intends to keep a pretty tight hold of his fortune. He has already invested it with the exception of a sum that he has set aside to pay the expenses of a trip to Europe. The lucky piano varnisher is a native of Christiana, Norway, and is going back with his wife and only child in about two weeks to visit the scenes of his childhood and to let his relatives in the old land know how kindly fortune has smiled on him. He has been a very active member of the Piano Varnishers' Union, having been at one time vice-president, and at present is secretary of its Executive Committee.

"I have been very lucky indeed," he remarked to the reporter, "and everywhere I go among those with whom I am acquainted I receive any amount of congratulation."

"Did you ever buy Louisiana State Lottery tickets before?" the reporter asked.

"Oh, yes. I bought them off and on, for a few years past; but for the last nine months I bought them continually, something always told me that I would strike a prize some day, but I never dreamt of winning as much as $15,000.

"I don't think I shall ever work at my trade again," he continued, "because I think I can do better than working at the bench for $16, $18 or $20 a week. I made $20 a week when business was good, but when it was dull I made less."

Another resident of New York who drew a prize in The Louisiana State Lottery on June 17 was Herman Herzbrun of the firm of Galland & Herzbrun, manufacturers of fine coats at 8 and 10 Manhattan St., near Houston. Mr. Herzbrun held one fortieth of ticket 90,207, which drew the third capital prize of $100,00. Mr. Herzbrun received $2,500, minus $11.25 express charges, as his share of the prize. He feels very happy over his success, for he never won more than an approximation prize of $5 or $10 before.—New York Daily News, July 8.

Do Not Be Deceived

If you decide to take Hood's Sarsaparilla, do not be induced to buy anything else instead. In some stores persistent effort is made to sell other articles when Hood's Sarsaparilla is called for, simply because a little more profit will be made on the substitute preparation. Now we submit that such efforts are not honorable, and ought to be discouraged by all who like fair play. Therefore if you call for Hood's Sarsaparilla, insist upon having it. Isn't that fair?

INFERNAL INGENUITY

Could scarcely devise more excruciating tortures than those of which you see the evidences in the face of a rheumatic or neuralgic sufferer. The agonies are the consequence of not checking a rheumatic or neuralgic attack at the outset. Hostetter's Stomach Bitters has been found by skillful medical practitioners to possess not only remedial, but defensive efficacy, where those diseases exists, or a tendency to them is exhibited. Surely this puissant but safe botanic medicine, bearing, too, such high specific sanction, is better than the poisons often employed, but most unsafe, not only in continuance, but in isolated doses. The blood is depurated thoroughly from the rheumatic virus, and the nerves, slightly impurged upon, save from ultimate and direful throes by this benign, saving medicine, which likewise exhibits marked efficacy for malaria, kidney complaints, dyspepsia, constipation and liver complaint.

TESTIMONY OF A PAINTER.

T. H. Backus, 105 Carlton avenue, Brooklyn, N. Y., writes: "ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTERS are undoubtedly the best external remedy manufactured. I make this assertion to the public from my own personal experience of their wonderful virtues. Suffering from severe pains in my side and chest, contracted through a severe cold, I applied a couple of ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTERS upon going to bed at night. The results was, that in eight hours after applying them I could get up and walk about with very little pain or ache, when the night previous I could neither get up nor down without help, nor stoop to remove my shoes. I have since used them in my family for various ailments, and have never known them to fail to give almost immediate relief."

Cuticura Soap
FOR A BAD COMPLEXION, RED ROUGH HANDS AND BABY HUMORS

BAD COMPLEXIONS, WITH PIMPLY, blotchy, oily skin, Red, Rough Hands, with chaps, painful finger ends and shapeless nails, and simple Baby Humors prevented and cured by CUTICURA SOAP. A marvelous beautifier of world-wide celebrity, it is simply incomparable as a Skin Purifying Soap, unequalled for the Toilet and without a rival for the Nursery. Absolutely pure, delicately medicated, exquisitely perfumed, CUTICURA SOAP produces the whitest, clearest skin, and softest hands and prevents inflammation and clogging of the pores, the cause of pimples, blackheads, and most complexional disfigurations, while it admits of no comparison with the best of other skin soaps, and rivals in delicacy the most noted and expensive of toilet and nursery soaps. Sale greater than the combined sales of all other skin soaps.

Nervous Diseases OF MEN

... AND THEIR ...

TREATMENT

—BY—

LOCAL ABSORPTION

THE LA SALLE REMEDIES.

For all forms of nervous waste, decay, exhaustion and debility, whether due to diseases of certain organs or not.

Also the new and direct method of arresting abnormal urinary discharges and restoring to the impotent their departed vigor.

Successful Where All Else has Failed. The La Salle Method and its Advantages.

Our preparations are called "The La Salle Remedies," from the fact that we proeured the original formula of the celebrated Dr. La Salle of Paris, under guarantee that should we think proper to introduce at any time his remedies to the American public we should do so under that title.

Some years ago Dr. La Salle conceived the idea of treating nervous and seminal diseases by rectal medication, believing he would gain the following advantages:

(1.) Application of the drugs directly to the seat of the diseases.

(2.) Avoidance of digestion and neutralization of the active medical agents, there being no stomach drugging.

(3.) The patient can cure himself at very little expense without any physician.

(4.) Their use requires no change of diet or of the ordinary pursuits of life.

(5.) They are absolutely harmless.

(6.) Close approach to the lower apertures of emergence of the spinal nerves from the vertebral column, and hence ease of penetrating to the nervous fluid and matter of the brain and spinal cord.

Feeble men, whose strength is impaired, will find a sure and permanent cure in Dr. La Salle's remedies.

THE LA SALLE BOLUS.

The word Bolus is a Latin name, and means a large pill.

In the preparation of the La Salle Bolus, we use the best cocoa butter for holding and preserving the various drugs, thus making their introduction a very easy matter.

They pass into the rectum with the most perfect ease, by means of a little pressure from the finger.

This method of treatment leaves behind no traces to excite the curiosity of any one.

Diseases of the Kidneys, Bladder, Prostate Gland—Their Treatment and Cure Without Stomach Medication.

SYMPTOMS.—Frequent urination, rising at night to urinate; pain or scalding in passing water; dribbling of urine after completing the act; enlargement of the prostate gland; Bright's Disease of the Kidneys. The most decided benefit is derived by placing these remedies right at the spot where they will do the most good. When the Bolus is introduced into the rectum, it rests directly at the neck of the bladder.

Price for a Full Course of Treatment $10.

THE SUN'S HEAT.

Is the Great Orb Showing any Visible Signs of Decay?

We want to know whether the sun is showing any symptoms of decay. Are the days as warm and bright as they were ten years ago, one hundred years ago? We can find no evidence of any change since the beginning of authentic records. If the sun's heat had perceptibly changed within the last two thousand years we should expect to find corresponding changes in the distribution of plants and animals, but no such changes have been detected.

There is no reason to think that the climate of ancient Greece or of ancient Rome was appreciably different from the climates of the Greece and the Rome that we know at this day. The vine and olive grow now where they grew two thousand years ago. We must not, however, lay too much stress on this argument, for the effects of slight changes in the sun's heat may have been neutralized by corresponding adaptations in the pliable organisms of cultivated plants.

All we can certainly conclude is that no marked change has taken place in the heat of the sun during historical time. But when we come to look back into vastly earlier ages we find the most copious evidence that the earth has undergone great changes in climate. Geological records can on this question hardly be misinterpreted. Yet it is curious to note that these changes are hardly such as could arise from the gradual exhaustion of the sun's radiation. No doubt in very early times we have evidence that the earth's climate must have been much warmer than at present. We had the great carboniferous epoch, when the temperature must almost have been tropical in arctic latitude. Yet it is hardly possible to cite this as evidence that the sun was then much more powerful, for we are immediately reminded of the glacial epoch when our temperate zones were incased in sheets of solid ice, as northern Greenland is at present. If we suppose the sun to have been hotter than it is at present to account for the vegetation which produced coal then we ought to assume the sun to be colder than it is now to account for the glacial epoch. It is not reasonable to attribute such phenomena to such oscillations in the radiation from the sun. The glacial epochs prove that we can not appeal to geology in aid of the doctrine that a secular cooling of the sun is now in progress.

The geological variations of climate may have been caused by changes in the earth itself, by changes in the position of its axis, by changes in its actual orbit; but, however they have been caused, they hardly tell us much with regard to the previous history of the sun. The heat of the sun has lasted for countless ages, yet we can not credit the sun with the power of actually creating heat. We must apply even to the majestic mass of the sun the same laws which we have found by our experiments on earth. We must ask: Whence comes the heat sufficient to supply this tremendous outgoing?—Story of the Heavens.

ANCIENT ALMANACS.

A New England Woman Finds Some That Contain Curious Things.

Spring cleaning generally brings to light a lot of forgotten things, and this time a woman in Hingham Center found some old almanacs, one of them 120 years old, printed at Boston twenty-three years before the present Old Farmers' Almanac was established. It is called the "Astronomical Diary; or, Almanack for the Year of Our Lord Christ 1770," by Nathaniel Ames. Price, 2s 8d per dozen and 6 coppers single.

In the preface is an extract from Rev. Mr. Eliot's "Essays on Field Husbandry in New England," in which the writer, after mentioning the introduction of silk culture into New England says: "And for their future encouragement will inform them that they may soon be furnished with cups and saucers equal to the best chinaware imported, for supping their soul-enchanting tea without molestation, for all the materials are discovered amongst us, and manufacturers are preparing them for making chinaware at Boston, where the best of green and tortoise shell ware is already made. Preparations are now being made for several new manufactures; the people are determined no longer to neglect the one thing needful for their political salvation."

Among the maxims in the calendar pages are:

"The politicians spin so fine a thread that princes think they lead when they are led."

"Dost thou love Life? Improve Time, for that's the stuff Life is made of."

"Fools make feasts and wise men eat them."

"If you would know the value of money, go and try to borrow some."

The compiler in the preface of one for 1774, after explaining that "Almanack is an evident Abbreviation of all my knack, or all's man's knack," says:

"Having made this curious Discovery, the effect of long study and close application, and communicated it, by this Channel, to all Lovers of Ancient Literature; I shall without expatiating on the Care, Trouble, Pains, Expense, etc., etc., that I have been at to render these my Lubrications entertaining, amusing, interesting, etc., take my leave till next year, and subscribe, the Reader's Most obedient Servant, Isaac Bickerstaff."

One for 1775 gives the following cure for toothache:

"Let the patient afflicted therewith lay on the contra side, drop three drops of rue juice into the ear on that side the tooth acheth, let it remain an hour or two, and it will remove the pain."—Boston Globe.

—That's a pathetic story from the South Carolina penitentiary. A negro convict, sent up for life for arson, was pardoned by the Governor after serving eight years because his innocence was established by some newly discovered testimony. The poor fellow had contracted consumption in the prison walls, but was overjoyed when it was announced to him that the Governor's pardon would arrive in the morning. But the excitement proved too much for him, and when morning came he was dead.

THE SPANISH DANCE.

How Valdes Describes It in His Newly-Translated Novel.

Our learned host in a few moments appeared with castanets which he handed to the Sisters. Then they took off their "coronets" and hoods. For the first time I saw Sister San Sulpicio's hair; it was dark and shiny with almost a bluish light, slightly waving, not very long, because at the time that she took her vows the scissors made terrific havoc in them. After we had made still another exploration around the parlor and hermetically sealed all the doors, Suarez began to thrum the guitar. A moment of keen expectation followed; the two girls who were going to perform the dance for us stood facing each other smiling, Sister Maria de la Luz with her head bent and blushing to her ears; her cousin with her arms akimbo a trifle pale, her lips feverish, the slight squinting of her beautiful velvety eyes being a little intensified. My heart leaped within me out of pure excitement.

The Malaganien raised his voice a little and sang a seguidilla.

Instantly the four castanets clacked noisily, the dancers lifted their arms and approached each other, then instantly retreated again, raising first one foot and then the other in time and with the greasest grace and agility. My enamored eyes feasted on the adorable curves of the graceful Sister San Sulpicio, not concealed by the coarse serge.

Followed a series of movements and steps, all adjusted to the sound of the guitar and the castanets, which never for a moment ceased to sound with a joyous and noisy clapping; the bodies of the two cousins rose and fell, bending to one side and then to the other with opposite motions of heads and arms.

The arms indeed had the most to do, sometimes extended with the breast advanced in a challenging attitude, then again picking up from the floor something invisible which must have been intended to represent flowers, then again bent above the head, making around it, as it were, a lovely frame.

My eyes followed only Sister San Sulpicio, not only because of the affection which I felt for her, but also because she was in reality the better dancer; her cousin, either from fear or modesty, or because Nature had not endowed her with much animation, confined herself to marking the movements and keeping time. She, on the other hand, accented them powerfully, enjoying herself in attitudes in which the elegance and flexibility of her body was each instant shown in a bewitching way. Her beautiful head bent to one side, her eyes half closed, her lips parted by a half blissful smile, in which her whole being was submerged, she seemed to be an Oriental bayadere, displaying with mystical rapture, amid the solitude and mystery of the temple, the fascinating brilliancy of her eyes, and the supreme gracefulness of her form, gilded like the lotus leaves in autumn. At that moment I could swear that she saw us not, entirely absorbed as she was in the delight of following out, one by one, the thousand exquisite combinations to which her lovely figure lent itself. The passion of the dance was the passion of her own body, was the ecstatic worship of her own gracefulness. When any particular figure came to an end she seemed to come out of her ecstasy, and would look at us smiling with wandering, humid eyes.

When it was finished Sister Maria de la Luz ran to a chair and sat down in mortification; her cousin remained standing, her breast heaving, her hair in disorder, and still smiling, with the same mischievous expression. The Malaganian, in a fit of enthusiasm, laid the guitar at her feet, expressing his homage in his lisping dialect.—Don Armando Palacio Valdes, in Sister Saint Sulpice.

The Warmest Region on Earth.

There are many very warm spots on the torrid zone, but Bohrin, by the Gulf of Persia, seems to be, as far as temperature goes, absolutely without a rival. For forty consecutive days in July and August last year, which was by no means an exceptional season, the thermometer was known not to fall lower than 100 degrees Fahrenheit, night or day, and often ran up as high as 128 degrees in the afternoon. Nature, as if to make the spot as intolerable to human beings as possible, has banished all water from the rocks of the locality, at least none has ever been procured by digging to depths of nearly 500 feet, and the numerous pits or dry wells in the neighborhood show how thoroughly the upper stratum has been tapped. In spite of these apparently insuperable obstacles, however, mankind has contrived to flourish and multiply in this region to an amazing extent, and the necessary fresh drinking water which the land has refused to yield is obtained from the bottom of the Gulf of Persia, where, at a distance of more than a mile from the shore, innumerable copious springs burst forth.—Scotsman.

A Bright Boy.

Charlie S—— is a very bright boy, and never at a loss for an excuse. He is also something of a naturalist. Walking along with a young lady one day, he heard a tree-toad suddenly begin its shrill chirp. "It will rain within twenty-four hours," he announced, oracularly. "That is a sure sign; never known to fail." His prediction was received in good faith; but after twenty-four hours of remarkably pleasant weather he was taken to task about his prediction. "Oh, well," he replied instantly, in an injured tone, "the tree-toad lied. I am not responsible for his morals."

Another time, having been requested to perform some little service, he came to receive his reward. His father offered him his choice between a silver dime and an old-fashioned copper cent. "I have always been taught to take the smallest piece," he remarked, gravely, pocketing the dime.—Harper's Bazar.

—Mrs. Jaysmith—"What are you reading, Lou?" Miss Jaysmith—"Pope's poems, Ma." Mrs. Jaysmith—"Are they the poems of the present Pope or the last?"—Judge.

HOW SEEDS ARE TESTED.

One of the Branches of Work of the Agricultural Department.

A correspondent of the St. Louis Globe-Democrat, writing from Washington and detailing the work of the Agricultural Department in sending out seeds, says: All the seeds are tested before being sent out, and the way in which it is done is very curious indeed. Shallow tin pans half full of water are employed, and across these, parallel, are laid thick wires in pairs. Each two wires have a strip of muslin sewn between them, so that, when they are laid together across the pan, a fold two inches deep hangs into the water. In this fold all along from one side of the pan to the other seeds are put, and the water, rising by capillary attraction, soaks the muslin and causes the seeds to germinate. The forming roots poke their way in every direction through the muslin, and the plants grow famously. One tin pan two feet long will hold a wonderful number of sprouts, and it is a simple matter to count and find out what percentage of those put in germinate, one fold of muslin being devoted to each kind of seeds. Any seeds that do not prove entirely satisfactory are sent to the gardener of the department, to be tried in earth. Thus Uncle Sam is able to guarantee all the seeds he distributes. The tin-pan idea is a new one. The tin pans are attended to altogether by a pretty enthusiast in petticoats, who thinks it great fun to have a whole botanical garden within half a dozen square feet of room. She does the whole business on a window ledge, and simply in the water that way she has grown beans big enough to eat. And she ate them. Try it for yourself. Use a good-sized tin pan from the kitchen and fix wires and muslin in the way described. Write to the department for the seeds you want and you are all ready to go into business. Own your own kitchen garden; every city family should have one on the window ledge. Flowers will do as well.

Two-thirds of the $100,000 worth of seeds go to Congress, each member of which gets about 5,000 envelopes of them yearly. Usually the department sends them off under instructions from the Congressmen. The remaining one-third is distributed by the department as it sees fit. Its generosity is often abused, for people sometimes send as many as a dozen times for seed in one year. As a rule, they get them, for it is the policy of the department to be very amiable and conciliate every body.

A CANNIBAL FAMILY.

Ona Indians Who Tear Beef to Pieces and Eat It Practically Raw.

The advertisement column of the London newspapers have recently announced that nine cannibals from Terre del Fuego would be fed three times a day in view of the audience at the Aquarium. At two, six and ten o'clock the spectators have enjoyed the privilege of seeing these specimens of an extraordinary type of American savage heat their beef and fish over a fire and then tear the flesh to pieces with their fingers and devour it practically raw.

The familiy of Ona Indians are the only representatives of their large tribe that have ever been taken from their homes. Many years ago some natives from the south coast were taken to England and received there a rudimentary education. But the Onas, who are spread over more than four-fifths of the great island, have been almost unknown until the recent discoveries of Lista and Popper; and the mountain ranges that parallel the south and west coasts have been a barrier which the natives on either side have never tried to cross.

The family now in London includes a woman about fifty years old, her son, a tall and not bad looking specimen of his race, his two wives and their five children, ranging in age from one to nineteen years. The thing about the Onas which most stimulates scientific interest and popular curiosity is the fact that they are regarded by some authorities as the lowest stratum of civilized humanity that has yet been discovered. Many years ago Darwin inclined to the belief that in the race he met in Beagle Canal he had found the missing link in the chain of evolution. In his last years he was of the opinion that the data he gathered in Terra del Fuega were too meager for valuable deductions, and it is certain that had he extended his researches north of the mountains he would have found a tribe that was even lower in the scale of being than the savages he saw and described.

This family now in London seems to possess the most limited vocabulary. Lista said he could not learn that the Onas have any words except those relating to hunting and fishing and the few natural objects that interest them. Popper could never get them to speak except in monosyllables, and they seldom made themselves intelligible. It is probable that their vocabularly does not embrace more than 200 or 300 words.—Chicago Herald.

Revenge.

Wife (from the window)—Well, I declare! John, I wouldn't spend time sprinkling the dust in our neighbors' back yard—especially when they are people who talk about us the way they do.

Husband—That's all right, my dear; their pet poodle was washed this morning—now he's out here rolling in the mud. Trust your husband, my sweet, for thoughtfulness.—Munsey's Weekly.

—A woman of position in London society recently resorted to an original device to decide who should take whom to dinner. The male guests were put up at auction and went to the highest bidder, in imaginary sums, the description of the human wares being hit off wittily by the auctioneer. We may now expect all our Angloman acs to follow suit, and some men may feel humiliated to find how cheaply they are held.—West Shore.

—The simplest method of loosening wall-paper is to start a large kettle of water boiling in the room. The dampness will soon loosen the paper, and it may readily stripped off. If the boiling water is not a possibility, mop the paper all over with wet cloths, and leave the water to soak in, repeating the process many times until loosened.

THE CONSTELLATIONS.

How the Position of the Sun and the Planets Is Defined.

The ancient astronomers gave the name of Zodiac to an imaginary belt extending around the heavens, having for its middle line the ecliptic, which is the line of the earth's orbit, or the apparent path of the sun through the heavens. The ecliptic forms the center of this belt, which is about eighteen degrees in width, which in ancient times included the orbits of all the known planets—but five in number—as well as the sun. The 18-degree belt of the old-time astronomer will not now contain the orbits of all the recently discovered planets and asteroids, which are now technically known as ultra-zodiacal planets. The stars in the zodiacal belt were grouped into twelve constellations, to each of which was assigned one-twelfth of the circumference of the circle, or thirty degrees. This arrangement made it possible to readily define at any time the position of the sun and the planets. The constellations that gave rise to the zodiacal divisions were as follows: Aries, the ram; Taurus, the bull; Gemini, the twins; Cancer, the crab; Leo, the lion; Virgo, the virgin; Libra, the balance; Scorpio, the scorpion; Sagittarius, the archer; Capricornus, the goat; Aquarius, the water bearer, and Pisces, the fishes. As one half of the ecliptic is north and the other half south of the celestial equator, that is, the line where the plane of the earth's equator if extended would divide the heavens, the points of intersection of their planes are known as the equinoctial points. The old-time star-gazers regarded these points as fixed and immovable, and therefore, the one at which the sun crosses the equinoctial line from south to north was fixed upon as the first point in the first division of the Zodiac, the sign Aries. After the sun had traveled 30 degrees eastward in this division he entered the second sign, Taurus, and thus continued his course through all the signs, crossing the line from north to south, when he passed from the sign Virgo into that of Libra. The equinoctial points are not stationary, but move slowly in the heavens, thus the first division of the Zodiac has been almost entirely separated from the constellation of Aries, and now corresponds more exactly with that of Pisces. Anciently the signs of the Zodiac were supposed to have an abnormal effect upon all animal and vegetable life, but this is now looked upon as rankest superstition. The constellations of the Zodiac were arranged by the astronomer Hipparchus in the year 200 A. D., or thereabouts.—St. Louis Republic.

FEMALE COMPOSERS.

Women Who Have Created Pleasing Tunes and Sterling Operas.

The reproach that women, while professing to be fond of music, have never been numbered among the creators of the art is now being happily falsified. Of women song-writers a long list might be quickly compiled. A moment's reflection will suggest the names of Maud Valerie White, Lady Hill, Hope Temple, Mary Carmichael, "Louisa Gray," Edith Cook, Mrs. Goodeve, Miss Wakefield, Mary Ostiere, the late Miss Elizabeth Philp, and many more. But within the last few years women have soared to higher flights. From Paris come continually tidings of new triumphs achieved by women. This new heroine of the hour is Mlle. Augusta Holmes. She is a naturalized Frenchwoman, but of Irish extraction. Her father, Colonel Dalkeith Holmes, when he retired from service in the English army, went to live at Versailles, and the daughter is how a loyal citizen of the Republic of France, where she has found a home. Ireland, however, still retains a strong hold on her affections, and Mlle. Holmes delights in Irish melody and poetry. Although she certainly does not belong to the German school of composers, she follows Wagnerian principles in one respect, for she weds the music to her own libretto, a system which imparts the unity of effect for which her works are remarkable.

Gounod has expressed a highly favorable opinion of her works, and predicts a distinguished career for her. Mlle. Holmes' music has already found a place in the programmes of the Colonne and Lamoureux concerts, and the performance of the "Ludus pro Patria" at the Conservatoire last year was a flattering acknowledgment of her genius. She has also written many charming songs, of which the most popular, perhaps, are "Le Conte de Noel" and "La Serenade Printaniere," and to her native land the fine composition, "Irlande," is dedicated. She is now engaged upon an opera, and report says that the red ribbon of the Legion of Honor will shortly be conferred upon her by the French Government, at whose hands she certainly well deserved this mark of recognition.—New York Commercial Advertiser.

Free Dinners for School-Children.

Free dinners, which the Vienna school-children have been so fortunate to have provided for them during the winter, were stopped at the end of last month, much to the regret of the little ones. Our correspondent says that they will begin again in November. Four hundred thousand portions were served in thirty-three days to 3,000 children. Many of the school-children brought their little brothers and sisters to share the dinner with them, and the portions of such children were always extra large. A great number of children from the streets also applied for food and were never refused. The school masters and mistresses testify that the children's health in the winter has been very much better since the introduction of the free dinners. A good moral effect has also been produced upon the children, who feel themselves cared for and the objects of attention. The Swiss Government has asked for details of the management, as it is intended to establish school-kitchens in Switzerland on the model of those in Vienna.—London Daily News.

CLARENCE AND JESSIE.

Progressive Love-Letter Writing of the Most Approved Type.

NEW EDEN, June 10, 1890.

MY ANGEL: I am in Paradise! The thought of you is a constant source of delight. I never knew what it was to be happy before; but now the whole world is running over with joy. Every thing speaks to me of you! Since we parted I have seen your face everywhere—in dreams, in the sky, in the trees, in the flowers. The birds sing your name, and the wind whispers it in grass. O my darling! I have found heaven at last, and you have led me into it. How I long to hear your voice again, to look into your eyes, to clasp your hand! Believe me, there is not a moment of the day when your image is not in my thoughts. How shall I manage to exist until we meet again? Do you think of me always, love, as I think of you? I know you do! And now farewell for a few hours. A thousand kisses, sweet! Do not fail to answer all my letters promptly.

Your devoted, faithful lover,
CLARENCE.

NEW EDEN, June 12, 1890.

SWEETEST: I have just received your letter—the very breath of your presence in it, the delicate perfume of violets; How good of you to write so promptly! I dreamed of you all last night, and I am dreaming of you now. The fellows laugh at me for my absent-mindedness. What do I care! I have something better to think of than logarithms and Greek roots. But I must study some, I suppose, or our secret will be suspected. So, good-bye for now. I enclose a leaf from the inmost heart of a rose. Kiss it for me, as I have kissed it for you!

Forever, your
CLARENCE.

NEW EDEN, June 15, 1890.

DARLING: You are too unkind. I know that I have missed a day; but examinations are close at hand, and those two weeks, while we were finding our heaven, have made such a gap in my work! You say that I love you less than my "nasty old books." That is just like a girl! Why can't your sex have a little common-sense? But there goes the bell—confound it! Hastily,
CLARENCE.

NEW EDEN, June 20, 1890.

MY DEAR JESSIE: Why can't you keep your temper? I have not been lecturing you, and I have not neglected you. One charge refutes the other. I simply asked you to have a little charitable common-sense, in view of the hard work that is crowding on me just now. Of course, I am just as fond of you as I ever was; but I can't write love letters and grind mathematics at the same time, and no reasonable girl would expect it. You know that I love you. Why should you insist upon my repeating it every single day?

Lovingly,
CLARENCE.

NEW EDEN, June 25, 1890.

MY DEAR MISS NORTHCOTE: I am sorry you feel as you do. I thought you truly loved me. Love is always willing to meet sacrifices; love is always ready to make allowances. Besides, a man can not give up his whole time to sentiment. It is different with women. This is a fact which you do not seem to have taken into consideration at all. I shall have more time after the present week, and will write you at length my views upon this subject. Then, perhaps, you can consistently claim that I am lecturing you! Ever sincerely,
CLARENCE.

NEW EDEN, June 27, 1890.

MISS NORTHCOTE—DEAR MADAM: I beg to acknowledge receipt by express of the package containing ring, letters, photograph, etc. I return, also by express, like articles of yours in my possession. Kindly acknowledge upon delivery, and oblige,

Yours respectfully,
CLARENCE MURCHISON.

JELING IN GERMANY.

Tragedies That Have Evoked Something Like Wholesome Retribution.

Two deplorable cases of death by dueling have recently occurred at medical schools in Germany. To one of these attention has already been drawn—that of the "candidatus medicus" of Wurzburg, Paul Fleurer, who fell at the third interchange of pistol shots, after twice holding out the hand of reconciliation to his implacable adversary. What action the local authorities, academic or civic, have taken or mean to take to bring to justice the homicide or the "court of honor" who aided and abetted him, we have yet to learn; but we shall indeed be surprised if the Wurzburg, or, for that matter the German, public rest satisfied with the condemnation of the proceeding delivered by the chief orator, if not the chief mourner, at poor Fleurer's funeral, that he was the victim of an "unfortunate prevailing prejudice."

Meanwhile, we are glad to see that a similar tragedy at Freiburg has evoked something like wholesome retribution from a German law court. According to the Algemeine Zeitung, of Munich, the duel in which the "candidatus medicus" Solomon lost his life has had the consequence that the "hero" of the encounter, "the student Bering, has been condemned to two years and three months' imprisonment, while the members of the court of honor have also been sent to jail for a period of six months each." We hope that similar sentences on the part of the legally constituted tribunals of Germany will put an end to a practice which is virtually satire on their own efficiency. For what purpose do law courts exist if not to consider and settle such differences as these so recently referred to the arbitrament of sword or pistol? The Emperor William has adopted measures to abolish dueling in the German army. Are the universities, in which the Fatherland takes an even greater pride, to lag behind the military service, and to cherish a tradition handed down from times when reason and right had no better arbiter than force? Were the results less lamentable the more civilized world would find something ludicrous in a practice which makes the legal and medical schools of Germany the theater of encounters in which law is ignored or defied by its students and in which medicine assists—though often too late—in healing the wounds inflicted by its future professors on each other.—London Lancet.

COLLEGE TRAINING.

It Is No Longer Inimical to Success in Business Life.

A good deal of discussion has been excited by Mr. Andrew Carnegie's declaration that, so far as his observation, goes, college-bred young men are not apt to succeed in business. Assuming that the purpose of business is to make money, he says that a college graduate does not fulfill it so quickly or so surely as one who goes into business immediately upon leaving school. There was a time, no doubt, when no one would have disputed the assertion. The original aim of universities was to fit young men for the church, and up to the beginning of this century, such colleges as Harvard, Yale and Princeton so far conformed to the mediæval conception of their functions, that a majority of their graduates were intended for the ministry and entered upon its duties. Even those who chose the professions of medicine or law were largely impelled by other than pecuniary motives, and did not contemplate rivalry with business men as regards the accumulation of property.

In the days when a college curriculum was mainly confined to Greek, Latin and the higher mathematics, it was generally acknowledged that a lad looking forward to a business life would do better to enter a store or counting-room at an early age than to spend at college the seven important years between fourteen and twenty-one. Not only would the graduate find it difficult to make up for the long start acquired by his non-collegiate competitors, but he would be handicapped by habits, tastes, predilections and points of view, but ill adapted to success in business. It was, perhaps, the belief once current in the disqualification of highly educated young men for business pursuits that led the elder James Gordon Bennett to say to Mr. George W. Childs (as the latter tells us in his "Recollections"):

"Childs, how unfortunate it is for a boy to have rich parents. If you and I had been born that way, perhaps we wouldn't have amounted to much."

In this country, however, and to a considerable extent in England, the purposes and methods of college education have undergone a process of re-adjustment during the present generation. The results of the changes in the aim and the curriculum of universities are not yet so manifest as they will be later, but we may already predict with confidence that the Carnegies of the future will have comparatively little ground for pronouncing a college training unsuited to business success. To make clergymen has ceased to be the primary purpose of our chief institutions of learning. They are rather designed to qualify young men for effective exertion in whatever vocation they may choose to enter.

Their present function is twofold; first to effect a general stimulation and discipline of the mental faculties: and, secondly, to supply instruction through elective courses in subjects specially adapted to secure advancement in the particular vocation to which a young man looks forward. The time which formerly a lad must have expended upon Greek, he can now devote to civil engineering or to electricity and chemistry, whose relations to industry are manifold, direct and obvious. Moreover, the spirit of undergraduate life, as might be expected, now that studies are adjusted to post-graduate intentions, has become less academical and more practical. Instead of being, what it used to be, a microcosm sequestered from prosaic bread-earning existence and having scarcely any points of contact with it, the college has become a vestibule of the outdoor world. Universities, in fine, have recognized the necessity of such radical reconstruction of their programmes and processes as shall make education not merely an intellectual gymnastic but a specific and substantial promoter of advancement in any career.—N. Y. Ledger.

Remarkable Cause of Death.

The Sumterville (Fla.) Times tells a remarkable story in connection with the phosphate excitement. It says that several persons have been drowned in the Withlacooche river while diving for hidden treasures. "A colored man named Abrams is the last victim, and his case was a very peculiar one. A party was sounding the bottom of the Withlacooche for phosphate, and when an extraordinary bone or tooth was discovered Abrams would dive down and bring it up. At last he saw a very large bone and dived for it, but remained at the bottom. Waiting a few moments and seeing his body at the bottom, grappling-hooks were obtained by his comrades and his body was brought to the surface. As he came up a huge horn or tusk was seen sticking out of his head. Upon examination it was found that in diving he had struck head first a huge elephant's tusk that was standing on the river's bed in an upright position. It had pierced his brain, causing instant death. The tusk was over four feet long."

Biddy Creates a Sensation.

A short time ago a family living on State street extension hired a green servant. She was told by her mistress to wash the second-story windows. She had seen the way in which that labor was performed by the neighboring servants, and was all right as far as washing the outside of the windows was concerned. When that part of the job had been finished, it occurred to her that the proper thing was to wash the inside in the same way. What was the surprise and edification of the passers by to see a pair of generously proportioned nether limbs, clad in brilliantly striped hosiery, dangling from the outside of the windoow, with the owner blissfully unconscious of the sensation she was creating. The lady of the house saw the crowd collecting and went out to see what was the matter. Looking upward the queer spectacle met her gaze. Shocked and horrified she rushed in doors and called the domestic to the lower household regions.—Bridgeport (Conn.) Farmer.

ONE BIRD'S NAMES.

Titles By Which the Erismatura Rubida Is Known in This Country.

People who have never made a study of any branch of natural history often speak sarcastically of the Latin names by which plants, butterflies and other natural objects are called in scientific works. They can not see why our New England "Mayflower" should not be called by that pretty vernacular name rather than by the less pleasing foreign name, Epigœa repens. Not to speak of other reasons, however, it is apparent that for the purposes of science it is necessary to have names which are not mere local nicknames, as it were, but names that are recognized among students the world over.

As an example of a confusing variety of local names applied to the same bird we may take the case of one of our small ducks. Its "book name" is the ruddy duck, and in scientific language it is called Erismatura rubida. The first or generic name, Erismatura, is a Greek compound, of which the first half means a prop and the second half a tail, that is to say, the bird has a stiff tail. The second or specific name, rubida, means reddish or ruddy.

The duck is well known to gunners, and for that reason has a superabundance of what we have called local nicknames, many of which are applied indiscriminately to this and other species. Along the New England shore it goes at different points by the following titles: Blue-bill, Broad-bill, Broad-bill dipper, Hard-headed broad-bill, Dipper, Dopper, Dapper, Bumble-bee coot, Creek coot, Spoon-bill, Sleepy-head, Goose widgeon, Tough-head and Booby.

This ought to be sufficiently confusing, but as we pass south of New England we find a superabundance of other names: Mud-dipper, Butter-ball, Butter-duck, Butter-bowl, Batter-scoot, Blather-scoot, Blather-skite, Sleepy brother, Bull-neck, Booby-coot, Salt-water teal, Brown diving teal, Stiff-tail, Quill-tail coot, Pin-tail, Bristle-tail, Stick-tail, Spine-tail, Dip-tail diver, Dun-bird, Hickory-head, Greaser, Water-partridge, Steel-head, Book, Paddy, Noddy, Lightwood knot, Paddy-whack, Leather-back, Dumpling-duck, Hard-tack, and many more.

It will be noticed that many of these names are based upon the same character as the generic scientific name—that is, upon the stiffness of the tail feathers. Many others have to do with the hardness of the bird's head, and the difficulty of killing it. As Mr. Gurdon Trumbull says, in the book from which we have taken these names: "To put shot into a Ruddy is one thing, to kill him is quite another matter."

This ability to stand fire, or, as the gunners say, "to carry away shot," is happily indicated by a name applied to the bird at the West—Shot-pouch.

The goodness of the ruddy duck's flesh may be gathered from such a name as Butter-ball. There is another species which is more commonly known by this name; but its flesh is less savory, and Mr. Trumbull suggests that it might be called Oleomargarine-ball to avoid confusion!

Evidently the ruddy duck is looked upon as in some respects a foolish creature with some comical aspects. Hence we have names like Sleepy-head, Fool-duck, Booby and Stub-and-twist.

A Wilmington gunner called him Dickey—a perversion of the common name Dinkey. "Don't you know," said the man to Mr. Trumbull, "how, when they start, they go dickey, dickey, dickey, patting the water with their wings and feet?"

Many of these vernacular names are interesting and more or less appropriate, but in view of their multiplicity, it is easy to see one of the reasons why scientific men find it necessary to name things for themselves rather than accept the names which the common people have given them.—Youth's Companion.

ROMANS RUINED ROME.

Ancient Works of Art Destroyed to Obtain Building Materials.

Dr. Lanciani, in his book on "Ancient Rome," tells how much of the destruction of ancient works of art was wrought, not by "barbarism," but by the age and people which gloried in its devotion to the beautiful. "In order not to wander too far from the main subject I will cite one item only of the annals of destruction; I will mention what happened in the valley of the Forum between 1540 and 1549. In less than ten years' time the men employed by the contractors of St. Peter's to search for building materials crossed the valley of the Forum from end to end, like an appalling meteor, destroying, dismantling, splitting into fragments, burning into lime, the temples, the arches, the basilicas most famous in Roman history, in the history of the old world, together with inscriptions which indicated their former use or design, and the statues and bas-reliefs which ornamented them. In 1540 the podium, steps and pediment of the temples of Antoninus and Faustina were removed to St. Peter's or otherwise made use of. Between 1541 and 1545 the same fate befell the triumphal arch raised in honor of Fabrius Maximus, the conqueror of Savoy; the triumphal arch raised in honor of Augustus after the battle of Actium; the temple of Romulus, son of Maxentius; and a portion of the Cloaca Maxima. In 1546 the temple of Julius Cæsar was leveled to the ground, together with the Fasti Consulares and Triumphales engraved on its marble basement; in 1547 the temple of Castor and Pollux was dismantled; in 1549 the temple of Vesto, the temple of Augustus, and the shrine of Vortumnus. Michael Angelo cut a pedestal out of one of the columns of the temple of Castor and Pollux, and Raphael and Lorenzetto transformed into a statue of Jonah. Innocent XII. restored the obelisk of Augustus with granite from the monument of Antonius Pius, and the Pantheon was restored with columns from the baths of Septimius Severus. 'There is no longer any doubt,' so our author sums up the case, 'that the Romans have done more harm to their own city than all invading hosts yet together.'"

County Official Paper.

It is of far more vital interest to the people of the State, and far more nearly concerns their real good, who should be at the head of the public schools than who should be Governor. An ignoramus might become Governor and still the duties of his office be discharged fairly well, or if an immoral man should be placed in office decent men could shun him till his term of office was ended, and while in office he could be held up to scorn. But it is absolutely necessary that the man who is placed at the head of our public schools should have a fine education, be of clean, pure life, and entirely devoted to the great work of teaching. Just such a man is now offered in the person of James W. Anderson, of San Francisco, the Republican candidate for State Superintendent of Public Instruction.

MISCELLANEOUS.

REPUBLICAN County Convention.

A REPUBLICAN CONVENTION IS HEREby called to assemble at Bishop, Inyo county, California, on THURSDAY, SEPT. 11, 1890,

At 2 p. m., for the nomination of County candidates and the transaction of such other business as may properly come before it. The Republicans of the several precincts are requested to hold Primaries, at the places named on SATURDAY, SEPT. 6, 1890.

From 2 to 5 o'clock p. m., for the selection of delegates in accordance with this apportionment:

Round Valley	School-house	2	Delegates

All entries to be made with the Secretary on or before 12 o'clock m. of the day preceding the race.

California State Agricultural Society Rules to govern running races. National Trotting Association Rules to govern trotting races.

In all exhibits of animals for premiums, other things being equal, blooded stock will be preferred.

All articles included in the above list, except the first department, to be on exhibition at the Pavilion on second day and remain during the Fair.

Special premiums will be allowed for articles exhibited not included in above list

If you have entries to make, attend to it at once, and when your entries are made, see to it that they are on time and at place for examination by the committee.

Accept no rumors in regard to the business of the exhibition. If you do not know what to do, inquire of the officers whose duty it is to tell you. One half of the trouble and disappointment at the Fair is caused by relying on hearsay. Attend to your business yourself. If it is done wrong you know where the blame lies.

Read the rules, and, by example, at least, assist in enforcing them; but don't forget that mistakes will occur where many people are congregated. The Board endeavors to do justice to all.

If the Superintendents and Committeemen are not always ready at the appointed hour, keep your stock and articles where you can command them at any time. Remember that we have but little time to do much business; patience, with a little system, will overcome many obstacles.

The Board will give the same special attention to details that has contributed to success in the past. It remains for the exhibitors to achieve still better results for the Fair of 1890.

ADMISSION.

Life Membership	$30 00
Membership ticket, admitting member, wife and minor children	5 00

BORN.

ANTON—At Lone Pine, August 29th, to Mr. and Mrs. M. Anton, a son.

DIED.

HALL—At Bishop, September 1st Mrs. M. C. Hall, née Alice Meade.

Mr. G. Sanger of Alvord was in town a few days this week.

Mr. W. K. Miller of Lone Pine is laid up with a severe attack of illness.

Two car loads of ore from the Dumphy—O'Keefe mine at Cerro Gordo were sent north yesterday.

J. Wilson came in from Darwin on Tuesday. He will remain until after the Fair at Independence.

The INYO INDEPENDENT acknowledges with thanks the receipt of a season ticket to the fair at Bishop.

Last Tuesday Mr. and Mrs. Eibeshutz left town for San Francisco. They expect to be gone several weeks.

A strong force is at work on the water pipe at Darwin. The pipe will be all laid and water turned in very soon.

The cattle disease appears to have run its course for the present. No more losses are reported the last week or more.

On Tuesday morning Mr. W. S. Enos went north with three carloads of horses. The animals will be offered for sale at Sacramento.

Mr. Frank Fitzgerald and Martin Mee got back home last Monday morning. Mr. Mee is much better in health than when he went away.

A. P. Taylor, section boss at Citrus on the C. & C. railroad, has been transferred to Hawthorne. He left Citrus yesterday morning.

Vegetables of all kinds; everything of the best quality; orders promptly filled. Address Mrs. McCall, Lone Pine. See advertisement.

Every north bound train carries out large quantities of fruit from Lone Pine, Independence and Big Pine. The demand for Owens Valley fruit far exceeds the supply.

On Tuesday William Alsorn had a preliminary examination before Justice C. Mulholland and was committed for trial on a charge of having committed the crime of forgery.

Mr. W. K. Vanderbilt has given an expensive present to his children. It is a steamboat sixty feet long and of very light draft. The vessel will probably be floated on watered stock.

Thomas P. Hawley, Chief Justice of Nevada, has been appointed by the President United States District Judge, to succeed the late Judge Sabin. Nevada papers express satisfaction with the appointment.

At Santa Monica the Southern Pacific Company is building a wharf twenty-five hundred feet long. Evidently the railroad managers expect a big increase in sea-going commerce at Santa Monica, which is the port of Los Angeles.

Mr. L. D. Mathews arrived at Independence to-day from San Francisco. He is accompanied by Mr. R. S. Starrett. Mr. Mathews says if no hindrances are put in the way an engineer and assistants will be brought here within a short time to begin surveying for the big canal to run to Salt Wells Valley. This would make the liveliest times we have had since the bonanza days of Cerro Gordo.

The wife of Mr. M. C. Hall, of Bishop, died last Monday at her home. Her maiden name was Alice Meade. The young people were married last February. Mrs. Hall was on a visit in Nevada and was taken sick of typhoid fever. She was brought home as soon as possible but the disease could not be checked. Mr. Hall deeply mourns the loss of his wife.

Last week the miners of Candelaria asked for an increase of fifty cents in wages. The rise in the price of silver was given as the ground for the demand of increased pay. The mine managers at once granted the request of the miners. When silver was depreciated in value the miners quietly agreed to the reduction of pay. Now their reasonable request for an increase is promptly granted. The poor were the greatest sufferers by the gigantic robbery perpetrated by the gold kings.

Mr. W. H. Russell of Benton is a candidate for the Republican nomination for the Assembly. For several years past Mr. Russell has been connected with mining operations in Inyo County. He is well known here, has the reputation of being a man of good business capacity and if nominated would surely receive the full vote of his party. As Inyo has nearly votes as the other two counties of the District combined, some consideration is due in selecting an Assemblyman.

Ireland is threatened with a repetition of all the horrors if the famine of 1847. During that awful time when hundreds of miserable people, including men, women and children, were dropping dead every day from sheer starvation, steamships were daily leaving every part of Ireland loaded with provisions for England and Scotland. The men who produced this food with their wives and children were dying of hunger, but the landlords cared nothing for that, they must have their rack rents. Hell will yawn till the last rack renting landlord and the last vestige of English tyranny shall disappear from Ireland.

Water Supply in Death Valley.

It appears that a vast supply of pure water may be easily had in Death Valley and the surrounding country. A correspondent of the Mining and Scientific Press says: "At the Armagosa Works in the Death Valley basin, a well has been sunk to a depth of 528 feet, using a seven-inch pipe. The discharge is 20,000 gallons in 22 hours, throwing the water above the curb 20 feet. Four miles south from this point is a well sunk to a depth of 40 feet. From its bottom, when bored 40 feet farther, a flow of pure water came in so strong that the workmen were unable to put in pipe, and the water having no check or restraint, flows to the surface and overflows. The Calico dry lake, situated four miles above Daggett, contains six wells on the northerly shore, from one-fourth to two miles apart, which average 100 feet deep and in which the water rises to a hight of ten feet in inexhaustible quantities. The water is pure and soft. The wells on the north shore of Lava Bed mountain in a dry lake 35 miles east of Daggett, average 60 feet in depth. Water good and supply inexhaustible.

For Sale.

The ranch known as the "Rittgers place" near Lone Pine is offered for sale together with the the farming implements and stock. The ranch contains 320 acres of excellent land. The stock consists of thirty head of cattle and twelve brood mares. There is now sixty tons of hay on the place and feed enough to winter 200 head of stock. The winter pasture is rented for five years at $300 a year. The soil is a rich loam and excellently adapted to vegetable raising. There is plenty of outside range, making it a good stock ranch. New Flour

Before beginning to grind the new crop of wheat Mr. A. N. Bell made several radical changes in the machinery of his mill. By repeated trials of his new flour we are able to say that he is now turning out an article that makes beautiful bread, white, light and sweet. No imported flour that we have seen makes bread that surpasses this. If farmers will take clean wheat to Mr. Bell and not insist on any unreasonable proportion of flour they can rely on getting and excellent article.

Gilbert & Sullivan's popular opera "The Mikado" will be reproduced at Mairs' Hall, Independence, on Wednesday and Thursday evenings of Fair week with a partially new cast and entirely new settings. Every effort will be made by the management to equal, if not surpass, the former presentation.

The fair at Bishop will begin on next Wednesday. The people of the north end of the county have done much and sacrificed much to make the fair a success. They labor under many serious disadvantages and corresponding praise and support are due them. Many visitors from Independence will attend the fair.

Mr. Stansfield, Secretary for the mines at Cerro Gordo, was taken ill on Wednesday. Superintendent Farrington drove down to Keeler to send for a physician and finding Dr. Woodin there he took him up to Cerro Gordo the same night. Nothing has since been reported of the condition of Mr. Stansfield.

Colorado papers publish the statement that an English syndicate has options on all the leading silver mines near Aspen. The price agreed upon is twenty-seven millions of dollars. England has twice made the attempt to conquer the United States by force of arms. She failed both times but she seems in a fair way to succeed in buying us out.

There is strong probability of a great increase of mining activity at Darwin within a short time. Heavy mine operators will soon be there to examine the various mines in the District. At Coso there are several mines that have turned out a good deal of fine ore. Lee district has turned out large quantities of ore that paid from $250 to $800 per ton. Indications are plenty that in the above and other places around Darwin there are many valuable ore bodies. The advance now general along the whole line will help Darwin, and there is no more promising region anywhere.

About
HALE'S
$2.50 Shoes!

It is not everywhere that you can get a FULL CALF shoe for $2.50. It costs too much—cuts too deep into the profits for ordinary shoe dealers to handle them

There is but one place in the State where you are sure of getting just such a shoe for your money. This advertisement is intended to tell you that place.

Hale's $2.50 Shoe is made of solid calf, tanned to meet the requirements of our California climate. The workmanship is thorough and lasting. The shapes are neat and pleasing to the eye as well as easeful to the feet. Such a shoe as we have described is commonly sold for $3.00 or more. Its worth shows in its wear. We have it in the following styles:

Hook and lace—Plain French toe; London toe, with tip.
Congress gaiters—Plain French toe; London toe, with tip.
Button shoe—Plain French toe; London toe, with tip.

BEHIND THE SCENES.

The poet sings of lover's bliss,
Of Heavenly smiles and rapturous kiss,
Of woman's beauty fair and sweet;
And vows that life is incomplete,
When forced by fate to dwell apart,
From her whose image fills his heart.

He raves of eyes of every hue,
Of golden brown and sapphire blue;
Of waving tresses touched with gold,
And glossy bands of ebon fold;
Of graceful figures, tall, petite;
Of glance demure, or smile so sweet.

He tells each tale of joy and woe,
So tenderly, we feel a glow
Of sympathy; our bosoms fill,
And hearts responsive beat and thrill,
And smouldering fires start up anew,
While doubting hearts for pardon sue.

We think of him whose gifted hand
Has penned these lines, and swift is fanned
The hero worship in each soul,
And all his virtues we extoll,
And fancy clothes with every grace,
And manly beauty, form and face.

Alas! when we the veil have torn
That hides the truth, our hero, shorn
Of all our fancy held so fair,
Is just a man, with head most bare,
And form too stout for early youth.
('Tis not romantic, but the truth.)

And while within his cosy den,
He talks of love with stubby pen,
While clouds of smoke around him soar,
No doubt he votes the whole a bore;
Nor would he leave his pipe and chair,
For any maid, however fair.

—Cornelia W. Boyden, in Yankee Blade.

THE OLD SETTLER.

He and the Squire Have a Little Misunderstanding;

But After a Few Exciting Words They Apologize and Shake Hands—Curious and Uncommon Winds and Hurricanes—Tale of Hiram Wuncut.

NEVER in all my born existence heered tell on setch rampageousin' winds an' harrycanes ez they seem to be havin' out West," said the 'Squire. "They don't seem to stop at nuthin', Major. They slosh housen around ez if they wa'n't no more consekence ez to heft th'n buckwhit chaff is, an' knock things helter-skelter an' t'other eend up giner'ly. They'm orful to read about."

"Pooty high winds, be they, 'Squire?" inquired the Old Settler.

"Nothin' like 'em ever heerd on afore!' asserted the 'Squire.

"Do they do any thing p'tic'lar cur'ous an' oncommon?"

"Cur'ousest an' oncommonest ever heerd on!"

"Has any on 'em ben high enough an' cur'ous enough to change the shirt on a man's back 'thout his knowin' of it?" asked the Old Settler, with the air of an examining lawyer.

"Wull, Major," replied the 'Squire, slightly miffed, "harrycanes don't giner'ly trapse 'round the kentry playin' funny jokes."

"Ah! Don't they?" said the Old Settler, with a sarcastic smile. "Wull, then, mebbe ye kin tell me wuther any o' these here harrycanes o' your'n is high enough an' cur'ous enough to git up a b'ar fight a quarter miled or more 'bove the 'arth an' durn nigh ag'in the clouds? That wouldn't be playin' no funny joke, I reckon."

"Major," said the 'Squire, after a moment's consideration of the subject, "if y've got any relations ez keers fer ye, they orter take ye in hand to wunst. Y've got permonit'ry sym'toms o' goin' crazy!"

"That hain't nuther here nor thar, b'gosh!" exclaimed the Old Settler, shaking his fist at the 'Squire. "Y've gone an' fetched up a heap o' talk about some high an' cur'ous winds an' harrycanes, an' y've slung it at me without me ever givin' ye a durn provvycation fer it. I wa'n't sayin' nuthin' 'bout no wind! Ye say th' never was any setch winds heerd on, an' w'en I 'cept yer chal'nge an' try to git some fac's outen ye 'bout the 'zact natur' o' these winds yer braggin' on, ye don't dast come to the dough trough, but try to sneak outen the charge ye made ag'n me by turnin' the subjec' onter wuther I've got any relations or not! I've got ez many relations, b'gosh, ez you hev! An' they kin eat ez much ez your'n kin! Thuz this leetle differ'nce 'twixt my relations an' yourn, though: Your relations kin eat ez much ez mine kin, but mine alluz has it to eat, b'gosh t'l-mighty!"

"W'ICHEVER ONE YE DARN PLEASE!"

"I don't keer a durn fer you ner yer relations!" shouted the 'Squire, shaking his fist as threateningly as the Old Settler had shaken his. "Ez fer eatin', I dunno how much yer relations kin eat, but I know one o' their relations who kin drink a durn sight more'n anybody else's relation th't I ever know'd; but he don't alluz hev it to drink, though, unless somebody else buys it!"

"Is present comp'ny 'cepted, 'Squire?" exclaimed the Old Settler, jumping to his feet and brandishing his cane. "Is present company 'cepted? Is it? Or shell I consider th't yer a liar? One or t'other! W'ich shell it be?"

"W'ichever one ye durn please!" exclaimed the 'Squire, snapping his fingers under the Old Settler's nose. "If the shoe fits you, consarn ye, put it on!"

The Old Settler glared at the 'Squire and the 'Squire glared at the Old Settler. The latter's cane was raised over the 'Squire's head and the 'Squire's fist was very close to the Old Settler's nose. The two veterans had never before been seen in attitudes quite so threatening. But nobody thought it worth while to interfere. By and by the Old Settler lowered his cane, but his glare remained. The 'Squire's fist dropped, but the snap did not leave his eye. Then the Old Settler exclaimed:

"Who said I thort ye were referencin' to me? I never thort o' setch a thing, b'gosh! Thuz more present comp'ny th'n me here th'ts relation o' my relation. Yender sets Sol Duzenberry. He married M'riar's secon' cousin, an' d'ye 'spose I'm gointer set still an' hev ye throw impytations on Sol? Not w'ile I kin git up an' pertest, b'gosh!"

"Wull," said the 'Squire, a good deal gentler, "is th' any o' your relation's relation here 'sides you an' Sol?"

"No, th' hain't," replied the Old Settler.

"Then, Major," said the 'Squire, "I don't mind sayin' to ye th't I didn't mean Sol."

"All right, 'Squire!" exclaimed the Old Settler. "I 'cept yer 'pology!"

The 'Squire and the old Settler shook hands and sat down, the 'Squire's eyes twinkling as he winked at the boys, while the Old Settler ordered a leetle sumpin' refreshin' fer all han's.

"Major," said the 'Squire, after awhile, "I think ye said a spell ago th't I made a charge ag'in ye an' wouldn't stan' by it. How'd I make a charge ag'in ye?"

"Wull, 'Squire," replied the Old Settler, "speakin' o' them high an' cu'rous winds o' your'n, ye said th't I hadn't never heerd o' winds ez was ez high an' cu'rous ez them. That were a charge ag'in me, an' a ser'ous one, an' w'en I begun to try an' git some fac's outen ye 'bout them winds o' your'n ye drifted to subjects ez was furrin' to the question, an' a little unfort'nit."

"Sech bein' the case, Major," said the 'Squire, "I'll take back the charge an' ast ye to perceed with yer 'zamination o' me ez to wuther them winds o' mine, ez ye call 'em, was ekal to sartin things or wuther they wa'nt. Replyin' to yer two fust questions now, I'll say th't none o' them winds o' mine ever dreamt o' changin' a man's shirt 'thout him knowin' of it, and ez fer gittin' up a b'ar fight 'mongst the clouds, they wouldn't ha' had no more idee o' doin' of it th'n they would ha' had o' takin' up a c'lection fer the heathens in Afferky."

"That's wat I thort, b'gosh!" said the Old Settler. "An' now, then, 'Squire, was any o' them winds o' your'n high an' cur'ous enough in their natur' to hev a man arrested charged with cattle stealin'?"

"Never, sir!" replied the 'Squire, with the solemnity of a witness in court.

"Good!" ejaculated the Old Settler. "Now, sir! Did any o' them winds o' your'n, ever show their height an' their cur'ousness to be setch az to change the veenoo of a case in court an' save an innercent man from persecution?"

"Never!" answered the 'Squire.

"Then, 'Squire," said the Old Settler, "th'has been winds and harrycanes a durn sight higher and cur'ouser th'n them o' yourn, an' I'll prove it to ye by the case of an ancistoro' mine who lived in the Sugar Swamp deestric' at an 'arly day. 'Cordin to the dockyments his name were Hiram Wuncut. I wun't say that the winds they had in the Sugar Swamp deestric' in them days was higher an' cur'ouser th'n any th't had ever ben heard on afore, 'cause it mout be a charge ag'n somebody, but the fam'ly dockyments says they was, an' also says th't they was oncommon sudden an' contrairy in their dispositions.

"If ever th' were a victim o' sarcumstances, the dockyments says his name were Hiram Wuncut. Hiram were a poor man, but he were ambitious. He had a clearin' th't were contin'ally bein' squatted on by a b'ar th't didn't make no bones o' walkin' off with a sheep or a pig or a calf, right afore Hiram Wuncut's eyes, an' it was the ambition o' Hiram to lay that b'ar low. But the b'ar were too cunnin' a chap fer Hiram, an' he continnered to gether in the livin' prejuce o' Hiram's farm an' keep Hiram poor. The b'ar didn't seem to bother nobody else's sheep nor calves but Hiram's, an' so, w'ile his neighbor Philander Boles k'd raise wool enough to make him nice flannen shirts an' his calves grow'd up inter cows an' oxen, Hiram had to keep on wearin' ruther used up ol' cotton shirts th't had kim with him w'en he landed in Sugar Swamp, an' his calves couldn't stay with him long enough to git to be cows nor oxen.

"Them winds o' the Sugar Swamp deestric', so these fam'ly dockyments says, usety come up so suddent th't one minute yer corn in the garden wouldn't be shook by ez much ez a zephyr, an' the next minute yer house 'd be sot down in the nex' township by a streak o' wind. Folks in housen th't was bein' scooted through the air in one d'rection 'd meet housen from neighborin' deestric's passin' along in t'other d'rection, them winds run in setch contrairy streaks. Hiram Wuncut alluz said th't nuthin' th't none o' them winds mowt do would ever s'prise him not one ioty.

"One afternoon Philander Boles' wife hung out her wash, an' lef' it out over night. 'Mongst the wash were one o' Philander's flannen shirts. Nex' mornin' w'en she went out to take in the wash the flannen shirt were gone, an' in its place on the line were a cur'ous-lookin' cotton shirt. That were astoundin', but w'en Philander found th't his yoke o' steers were gone, 'long with his wagon, th' were a time on that clearin', an' no mistake.

"'One o' them tarnal winds must ha' ben playin' hob ag'in, las' night,' said Philander, 'but I never know'd one of 'em to take a shirt offen a line and pin another un in its place afore, an' hitch a yoke o' steers to a wagon an' drive 'em away.'

"Philander walked over to Hiram Wuncut's, w'ich were a miled away, an' he didn't find Hiram to hum. Somehow or other, he went to trapsein 'roun' the deestrict, an' 'long in the afternoon he foun' Hiram way over beyent Lost Crow Barren, goin' west, in a dazed sort o' way, an' drivin' a pair o' steers. Philander were a cross an' overbearin' sort o' chap, an' he grabbed Hiram by the neck an' hollers:

"'Whar ye goin' with my yoke o' steers? An' w'at a-ye doin' with my flannen shirt on?'

"Hiram looked kind o' crazy at fust, an' then he rec'onized Philander, an' kim to hisself.

"'Jeewhizz!' he says. 'If it don't beat all!'

"'Sh'd say so!' says Philander.

"'It's all kim back to me now!' says Hiram. 'Fore daylight this mornin' I see that pesky ol' b'ar takin' my las' sheep. I tore fer your place to hev ye come an' help me run him down. Jis' ez I got to your cabin one o' the winds grabbed me. It husseled me around in the air over your patch fer a minute or two, an' then swished me up more'n a quarter of a miled, an' started west with me. We hadn't gone fur 'fore we met that b'ar. It'd ben grabbed up by a contrairy wind, an' were comin' along back east. The sight o' that b'ar riled me, an' ez he kim by me I clutched him. Thar we war, right in the swirl o' them two contrairy winds, an' every time I'd sling the b'ar's heels up he'd kick a cloud, an' w'en h'ed sling me up I'd kick ag'in a cloud. Bime by I socked my knife clean through the b'ar's wizzen, an' he give up. Jist then, w'at should come sailin' along on the wind goin' west but a yoke o' steers, hitched to a wagon. I slung the b'ar in the wagon ez it kim up, jumped in arter it, an' away the hull on us went. Bime by the wind begun to fall, an' let us down gradjally to the arth, jist ez if we was goin' down a big long hill. The hull business turned my head clean inside out, an' I ben wanderin' about like a crazy man. These is your steers, sure enough! An' I'm durned if this here hain't your flannen shirt! I've said that nuthin' none o' these winds done 'd ever s'prise me, but the doin's o' this un clean kerflummixes me! Hullo! Th' hain't no b'ar in the wagon! If some one ain't gone an' stoled it, then I'll eat my ears!'

"But knowin' all about the Sugar Swamp winds, Philander were mean enough to hev Hiram arrested fer cattle stealin' an' stealin' his shirt. Hiram were took back an' brought up 'fore ol' Jedge Sniffits. The jedge were ag'in him from the start, an Hiram ast for a change o' veenoo, 'cause he couldn't get jestice thar. Change o' veenoo were denied and the case ordered to perceed. But it didn't, fer just then, all of a sudden, kerl-o-o-o-o-gh! kim one o' them winds, an' the nex' secont the jedge's office an' all th't were in it war sailin' west'rd through the air like a soarin' eagle. Ten miled away in the Wild Gander deestric', the wind let the buildin' down, and it hadn't no sooner landed than Jedge Sniffits hollers out:

"W'AT A-YE DOIN' WITH MY FLANNEN SHIRT ON?"

"'Let the perceedin's perceed!'

"Then up pops Hiram. 'Not much they won't!' says he. 'That wind has changed the veenoo o' this case! This here hain't the Sugar Swamp deestric'! This here is Wild Gander, an' ye hain't got no jurisdiction here, b'gosh! You let me go, or I'll make you sweat fer usurpatin' jurisprudence, b'gosh, an' then we'll see who's on top!'

"Ol' Jedge Sniffits know'd too much to go on in that deestric', an' Hiram Wuncut walked out o' court, and never went back to Sugar Swamp.

"'I wun't live in a place,' he said, 'whar natur' is so durn queer an' neighbors is so mean!'"—Ed. Mott, in N. Y. Sun.

BELLIGERENT CRETANS.

Grim, Armed to the Teeth and Always Ready to Fight.

The people of Canea, as of all Crete, are not pleasant to look upon. Never have I seen so many lowering brows and savage expressions. They never smile. Now and then one laughs in a sardonic style, as hideous to the ear as the snarl of an angry wild beast. But of mirth there is none. The light-heartedness and merriment which characterize most southern peoples, even under oppression, are here unknown. Every one seems perpetually in a bad humor and in a belligerent mood. No matter whether they are talking of the weather, or selling cabbages or silk, or complaining of Turkish despotism, they are always the same, grim, frowning, truculent. As a rule they are finely formed and powerful, straight and broad-shouldered, and no matter what they are doing or where they are, their normal condition is to be armed to the teeth with knives and pistols, while the walls of their homes and shops are thickly hung with swords, spears and rifles, so that the stranger among them feels as though he were in an arsenal, where every lethal weapon needed only a look to set it in deadly action.

It is easy to see why breaches of the peace are so frequent among these people and why any outbreak is certain to have ghastly results. When they quarrel they quarrel in dead earnest. Every blow is meant to kill. They seem devoid of any of the ordinary compunctions of humanity when once the easy curb is slipped from their passions. And considering how largely the nominal Christians outnumber the Turks it is evident that should they once unite to throw off the Ottoman yoke they could do so in a day. But they do not unite. They are as ready to quarrel with each other as with the Turks, and are so continually divided into jarring factions as to make Turkish mastery of them an easy matter to maintain.—Canea Cor. N. Y. Tribune.

—Among various expressions of intelligence which often places the dog in no mean place of comparison to his master, a little habit developed by a dog in the suburbs is worth mentioning. Whenever this dog becomes angry, instead of making an exhibition of his temper he turns away from the offending person as quickly as possible and makes a bee line like a flash to the nearest brook. In a few minutes he returns dripping, but serene, without a trace of his former excitement in his manner. His plunge has apparently cooled off all angry feelings and even caused forgetfulness of causes of disturbance.—Boston Journal.

—Some idea of the great cost in time and money required in producing a great engraving or etching and the risks assumed by the publishers may be had when it is known that the engraving of Meissonier's "Friedland, 1807," in size 19x33 inches, was begun by the etcher, Jacquet, in August, 1888, and it is not yet ready for publication. Two years' time, of an expert, the risk of destruction by fire and of the death of the artist engraver during the prosecution of the work and then the additional risk attending every publication whether it will afford a profit or not. When considering the price charged for some engravings all the way from $250, or more down these facts may be borne in mind.

WHAT THE DRUGGISTS SAY.

Manufacturers of the Great Sierra Kidney and Liver Cure:

MARCH 24th, 1889.

GENTLEMEN:—It pleases us to state that in our judgment California productions are coming to the front very rapidly. In the case of your remedy as in proportion to sales of any other Kidney and Liver Cure or medicine for the cure of kidney and liver disorders, The Great Sierra Kidney and Liver Cure is the best selling article on our shelves, and is rapidly on the increase daily.

Respectfully yours,

TAKE CARE! THERE IS DANGER

In allowing inactivity of the kidneys to grow through neglect. The deadly shoals of Bright's disease and diabetes will wreck the goodly bark of health if it is allowed to drift rudderless upon them. The bladder, too, if inactive, and judicious medication does not speedily direct the helm toward the port of safety, will be whelmed by the quicksand of disease. In selecting a diuretic, let your choice fall upon Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, which stimulate the renal organs without irritating and exciting them, two effects to be apprehended from the unmedicated stimuli largely resorted to. These have a tendency to react prejudicially. The Bitters invigorate the kidneys and bladder, in common with the nerves and the digestive organs, and so afford lasting aid. It also affords dual assistance in preventing and curing intermittent and remittent fever. Biliousness, constipation and rheumatism it also subjugates.

A man's reformation always dates from the last time he was caught.

THEY STRUCK IT RICH.

Two Philadelphians Who Drew $30,000 from The Louisiana State Lottery.

Henry, John and Daniel Gilbert are three brothers and residents of Frankford. Their home is at Ditman and Pratt streets, where they all reside as bachelors. The Gilberts are not, or at least were not very rich, and they dispensed with the services of a housekeeper, in fact, they do not require one to superintend their home, which is but a low one story wooden building. Like all other men whose worldly possessions are limited, the brothers have dreamed frequently of wealth. But how to acquire wealth was a problem not easily solved. But all things come to him who waits and it didn't fail in this instance.

Of course, the brothers could hardly achieve fortune by remaining at their occupation—laborers—and they cast about for some side issue whereby they could increase the size of their pile.

One day Henry, who is the oldest, told his brothers of a friend of his who had struck it rich in the Louisiana State Lottery. After some consultation the brothers invested in one twentieth of a ticket.

Their maiden effort was unsuccessful, as likewise was the second, but the third trial was made and a week later ticket No. 59,813 was sent to the brothers. They laughed when two days after the drawing took place, on June 17, a list of the winning numbers were handed them.

"It will be like the rest," said Dan.

"Now wait, me boy, we might strike the capital prize," said John in a jesting manner.

Henry said nothing but glanced down the long row of figures.

Suddenly his finger, which was following the line stopped, and he turned slightly pale.

"What's our number?" he asked.

"59,813," was the reply.

"Whoop, boys we got her," and the elder brother, usually so quiet, executed a war dance. It was time, for their ticket had drawn the first capital prize of $600,000, and as the brothers held a one twentieth ticket they suddenly found themselves the lucky owners of $30,000.

Last Tuesday they received a check for the amount from the Louisiana State Lottery, at New Orleans, and it was immediately deposited in the Frankford Bank, where it will rest until the brothers, who are, as yet, undecided as to its disposal, call for it.—Philadelphia (Pa.) Ti m, July 8.

NOT ONLY THE NATIONAL DISEASE BUT MANY OTHERS.

It is said that dyspepsia is our national malady. Well, BRANDRETH'S PILLS will cure the national malady.

It is said that constipation is the curse of our sedentary life. Well, BRANDRETH'S PILLS certainly cure constipation.

It is generally conceded that rheumatism comes from acid stomach and sudden changes of temperature. BRANDRETH'S PILLS have corrected all this and will do it again.

Chronic diseases are cured by taking two to four of BRANDRETH'S PILLS every night for a month.

BRANDRETH'S PILLS are sold in every drug and medicine store, either plain or sugar coated.

THE WONDERS OF ALASKA.

By Alexander Badlam.

An Illustrated Book describing the wonders and beauties of the Glacial Zone. A complete history of Alaska and its resources, replete with interesting legends and superstitions of the queer people of the Icy North. A perfect set of maps of the Inland Channel, with descriptive chapter that will enchant the reader.

OPINIONS OF PROMINENT MEN.

SAN FRANCISCO, July 12, 1890.

My Dear Mr. Badlam: The reading of "The Wonders of Alaska" has afforded me great pleasure. To one like myself, who, from force of circumstances, has seen so little outside the courthouses of California, it has been almost as good as a visit to the far northern wonderland, to glacier and forest, to that strange people and those stranger traditions. I come from its perusal with a better understanding and a higher opinion than ever of Mr. Sewards's grand bargain with Russia. It is a very satisfactory production in every way. You from Alaska, and Lynch from Egypt, have made me wiser and happier. I know of nothing that could make me better.

Yours truly,
W. H. L. BARNES.

I have read "The Wonders of Alaska" with great pleasure and am not at all astonished at its phenomenal success. While I know you lay no claim to being an author, you have presented to the public a beautiful volume invaluable to the tourist, in easy language, giving a complete history of Alaska and its people, with beautiful and expensive illustrations of all the principal points of interest seen in a trip to the great glaciers, with correct maps of the inland channel and steamship routes. You are entitled to great praise for an elegant publication, the rapid sales of which have called for a second edition so soon.

GEO. C. PERKINS.

THE WONDERS OF ALASKA.—The APPEAL has received from Alexander Badlam his new book, "The Wonders of Alaska." Alaska has long been an unknown land to most of the inhabitants of the United States, and not until the past ten years has there been much of an effort to explore it. Badlam's book is intensely interesting. It is written in a plain matter of fact way, straight and to the point, until the author reaches the point where the dazzling splendors of the icebergs and glaciers need descriptive work, and here the author revels in magnificent word-painting and imagery, showing what he can do when his sense of the beautiful is roused. He also gives interesting information relative to the peculiar habits of the people, and the immense natural resources of the wonderful country which, in geographical area, is almost as large as the United States. The book is beautifully illustrated and throws more light on the strange region than all that has heretofore been written regarding it.—Morning Appeal, Carson, Nev., July 1, '90.

MR. JOHN W. FURBUSH
An Army Veteran,
OF WAKEFIELD,

who has probably suffered more than any man or woman in America to-day. Taken sick while in the Army, he has endured untold agonies since. Describing his first symptoms he said: "My head ached and my appetite was poor. I felt a faintness at the pit of the stomach, and a bad taste in my mouth, while my skin was sometimes hot and sometimes cold. I next felt pains in my back and around the lower portion of my body, and noticed a peculiar odor and color in the water I passed, which was scanty at one time and free at others. Sometimes it pained me to void it, and again it was almost impossible to do so at all. Finally I began to pass clear blood accompanied with the greatest strain and agony."

No less than 20 eminent physicians attended Mr. Furbush at various times, but not one of them could help him. He was near death's door. And yet he says: "I am alive and well to-day, wholly through the wonderful power of Hunt's Remedy which took me from the verge of the grave."

This Great Remedy absolutely cures all Kidney, Liver and Urinary Diseases.

THE ANGRY WORD.

Weary and heartsick from work and pain,
Was it any wonder the hard word came?
With children's clamor and heavy care,
It seemed that mine was the "lion's share,"
And John, with a look that told he heard,
Went on to his work with a calm absurd.

Weary and heartsick all of the day,
The heavy hours went slowly away,
The night came down, but no John returned,
To where the hearth-fire sulkily burned;
I gave the children their supper and bed,
And crouched by the coals with an aching head.

O was it a dream—that I seemed to be John—
So weary and painfully hammering on,
Seemed to be laboring over my strength,
Till the long, long day was over at length,
With cruel words and a taunting sneer
Flung often at him by the overseer?

O was it a dream that, the day now o'er,
They doubled his task and abused him more,
That the patient mind had but one refrain,
"I bear, for my home and the living to gain;"
But the word I had spoken held its smart,
And was like a fire in the patient heart.

A step on the stair! O John has returned,
The sulky fire now more brightly has burned,
A leap in my heart moves me on to the door,
I sob in the arms of my darling once more;
O never again by a word or a sign
Will I claim that his burden is lighter than mine.

A QUADRUPLEX COMPACT

Why a South-Side Residence Will Soon Be for Rent.

I.

There was considerable excitement of a quiet kind in the neighborhood and not a little cause for it, either. The roomy house in the middle of the block, that had stood empty for several uneventful months, had been rented. At least the elderly lady who lived on the corner and officiated as a perambulating repository of all the news of the locality confided to the insurance man's wife, a little lower down, that a tall young man with lavender trousers and eye-glasses had entered the empty house the previous afternoon and pulled the "For Rent" card down out of the window. Moreover, he had driven up in quite a natty cart and had worn light kid gloves with broad black stitching on the backs, in addition to the lavender trousers and eye-glasses; a circumstance that indicated the new tenant, whoever he was, to be a person of perfect respectability.

If there was mild excitement when the news went about that the house was rented, it ceased to be mild when it became known who was to live in it, although it must be confessed that the excitement was confined principally to the young ladies residing in the vicinity. The newcomers were nothing less than four spruce, dapper young men—"four beautiful dudes," as the red-haired girl across the way, who never appeared in public without her tennis racquet and terrier pup, expressed it. It gradually became known that the four young men were guiltless of blood relationship to one another. They were simply friends, all engaged in business down-town, all sick of the nameless horrors of modern boarding-house life, and all enraptured with the prospect of the stagger at housekeeping they were about to make.

And it may be said at the outset that a likelier-looking quartette of young men, as young men go nowadays, would have been hard to discover on the South Side. They differed somewhat in appearance, of course, but each, in addition to the neat and becoming clothes he wore, bore in some measure the stamp of refinement and intelligence. They were the kind of young men who look out of place at a snide variety show or a cock-fight.

II.

The neighborhood was curious, the marriageable female element (as before intimated) especially so, to know more of the latest arrivals than could be gained by mere ocular observation; and if the neighborhood could have been made aware of the peculiar, not to say unique, compact that bound the quartette together, this curiosity would have been infinitely enhanced.

The surnames of the newcomers do not matter; Tom, Dick, Harry and Jack will serve to distinguish them. Their compact was simply this: Their lease ran for two years, and each one of the four was pledged to his fellows not to marry or evince any inclination to do so until the term had expired. The expenses of housekeeping were to be shared equally. Each one was to take his turn for a week at doing the family marketing, pay the bills and so on; while an antiquated colored lady had been engaged at a liberal wage to preside over the kitchen. The terms of the agreement were ironclad. No member of the quartette was to be permitted to stick the other three if the latter could help it.

The arrangement, moreover, seemed to work swimmingly. The experiment was not so costly as it might have been. The young men lived comfortably and felt contented. They were all musical, and with two mandolins, one guitar and one banjo manipulated by them, formed a very respectable string quartette. Attired in fetching neglige dress, they sat in their porch in the languorous June evenings thrumming popular melodies after the healthily enthusiastic manner of amateurs, to the great enjoyment of the families in the vicinity. And, of course, on such occasions, all the attractive girls in the block, looking very wholesome in their fleecy white frocks, found occasion to pay many visits to the corner drug store and back, the route taking them, of course, directly past the porch wherein the players sat. When a group of them passed by it was the habit of the young men to gaze blankly up at the stars, though the gaze was often productive of discords from Dick's mandolin that brought wrinkles to Tom's alabaster forehead.

III.

"Carrie," said the red-haired girl to her chum from Vassar one bright morning shortly after the last of the young men over the way had gone down-town, "I think that little dude who wears the black sash and the cute straw hat is simply lovely. I wish I knew him."

"Tot," rejoined the Vassar girl, with a reproving look on her classic features, "how can you say such things? But I don't really think that one is as handsome, and he is certainly not so distinguished-looking as the tall one with the lavender—ahem! the lavender—I mean the one who wears light clothes."

That afternoon Tot, the red-haired girl, tennis racquet, terrier pup and all, was drinking a glass of that concoction composed principally of sugar and wind, but which is known to the general public as "soda," at the little store kept by the French lady two streets away, when who, of all people in the world, should walk in but Dick, his loins girdled with the inevitable black sash and his head adorned with the cute straw hat. She was so astonished that the racquet fell to the floor with a clatter, and as she and Dick both stooped at once to pick it up their heads bumped together vilely. Both apologized profusely, of course.

Dick had a rather guilty look when he faced his friends at dinner an hour or so later. When the four were seated on the porch in the twilight, he bowed with great politeness at the girl across the way.

"Who's your red-haired friend?" inquired Tom, surlily.

"A young lady I know," was the indifferent response, as Dick thrummed carelessly on his mandolin.

"Take care," mouthed the other three in unison, scenting treason. And then the regular evening concert proceeded.

IV.

The four friends had a box at the Auditorium for one of the Strauss concerts, and Tom found his gaze wander every now and then to the face of a statuesque beauty who sat in the parquet next to a girl with red hair. He was certain he had seen her somewhere, but could not quite decide where. She wore a fluffy white gown with wonderful puffed shoulders, and he was forced to confess that she was provokingly pretty. In the foyer, during the intermission, he strayed away and found a friend who introduced him. He was a little surprised to find that she was spending a vacation at the home of the girl with red hair who lived opposite to him. Both young ladies were very inquisitive as to how he and his companions got along in their bachelors' hall, but he parried their questions with the adroitness of an old stager. It was with difficulty, however, that he dragged himself away and joined his friends in the long room near the cafe where more or less inviting liquids are dispensed. It may readily be surmised, however, that he made no revelations as to events occurring in the interim.

That night, just before the Vassar girl dropped off to sleep, she whispered to the red-haired girl: "You see, dear, I was the first to get an introduction to one of your dudes, after all."

"Nonsense, dear,' croned the red-haired girl, with a suggestion of triumph in her drowsy tones. "I have been on excellent terms with the little one with the sash for over a week."

Silence.

V.

Somehow or other a sort of cloud hung over the house where the four young men dwelt. There were fewer evenings spent by the four together, and a tinge of restraint seemed to have fallen over the party. Harry and Jack, two of the handsomest and best-behaved boys in the world, who had hitherto been the life and soul of the quartette, spent a good many evenings out as the summer wore on, and when they did stay at home were less cheery and light-hearted than formerly. They smoked incessantly and assisted very little in the conversation.

By the merest accident one afternoon "Tot," returning from a slashing tennis tourney at the park, saw Harry, all about whom Dick, of course, had told her, emerging from the house of one of her friends three blocks below her own home. She hid behind her terrier until the youth had passed from sight and then pounced in on the aforesaid friend, a pleasing miss with a pair of wicked, snapping black eyes.

"How long have you known him?" was the fair caller's greeting.

Without detailing the conversation it may be stated that the black-eyed beauty confessed to a six-weeks' acquaintance with the departed one, and from that the talk grew very confidential.

"But do you know, Tot," said the little hostess, as the red-haired girl rose to go, "that there's something queer about that boy. If ever a fellow loved me"—the black eyes glistened—"he does, but he seems to have something on his mind. Tot, I am ashamed to say it, but he has sworn he loves me to death, and has never let fall so much as a hint about marriage. And more than that, his friend Jack, who lives with him, goes about with Tilly here, my next-door neighbor, and she says he acts in precisely the same way."

During this speech Tot's gray eyes had been growing bigger and bigger, while each particular red hair shone with added brilliancy. "Maud," she gasped, "another of those dudes—the one with the black sash—is in love with me, and his actions are precisely those you have described in the other two. There is a mystery here, and we'll unravel it. Come up to my house Saturday night and bring Tillie with you."

The black-eyed one agreed and they parted.

VI.

"Dick," demanded the red-haired girl, "do you love me or do you not?"

They were standing in a sequestered spot in South Park on the scorching Saturday afternoon. The young man fumbled nervously at his sash. "You know I do, Tot," he observed, meekly.

"Then," answered the red-haired girl unabashed, "will you marry me?"

A piteous look came into Dick's face. "I—I—I—" he stammered and could get no further.

"You monster, you!" ejaculated the red-headed girl, in a white heat of passion. "You would have me a woman scorned, would you? You say you love me. You. Bah! I asked you to marry me for a bluff, so I did. Marry nothing. You're a milksop, a dude. You pretend you love me because you want a summer girl. I wouldn't marry you now if you got down on your knees and begged me till you wore two holes in the grass each big enough to bury you in."

This was too much. In another minute the unfortunate youth had grabbed both her hands and poured out his story about the two years' lease and the deadly anti-matrimonial compact. When he had finished, her face was still a whole pucker of frowns. "Go then," she said, dramatically, "go back to your friends and your lease and your compact and leave me here. Go, I tell you!" and the two and a half slipper hit the turf with a dainty thud. Slowly, therefore, the crestfallen youth moved off with the cute straw hat pulled far down over his eyes. When he had disappeared the red-haired girl leaped to her feet like an antelope and sped in the direction of the train for home, ripples of delighted laughter falling from her lips.

And when she, too, had vanished, a tall form, with its lower extremities encased in lavender trousers, emerged from the bushes, mounted a bicycle and flew swiftly northward over the dusty road.

VII.

At the dinner-table of the four that night a gloomy silence prevailed. Dick was sulky and said nothing. Harry and Jack seemed in low spirits, while a look of awful sternness overspread Tom's blonde features. It was a relief when the meal was concluded, but as they rose Tom said, gravely: "Gentlemen, will you kindly step into the parlor for a moment?"

Dick gave him a quick look, but the grimly set face afforded him no comfort. When all were seated Tom rose, advanced to the center of the room and announced: "Gentlemen, we have a traitor in our midst—or at least one who stands in danger of becoming a traitor. Gentlemen, to-day I saw" pointing at Dick whose face had grown ghastly white—"to-day I saw—"

"You saw something very interesting, no doubt," interrupted a musical voice, and lo! in the doorway was a strange apparition. It was the red-haired girl in the very sweetest of complicated summer costumes, and as she moved forward there appeared in the rear three other girls, the statuesque beauty from Vassar, the black-eyed Maud, and Tillie, a diminutive blonde, with a dimple in either cheek.

"My Paw," went on the red-haired girl, without deigning to notice the dazed astonishment of the devoted four, "wants to buy this house, and he sent me over to find out who the owner is? ("Oh Tot, may Heaven forgive you!" gasped the Vassar girl.) I didn't quite like to come alone so brought some of my friends for company. What? Are you acquainted? Why, how funny! I do declare, there's my old friend Dick! Its too nice for any thing. Say, who does own the house?"

In about five minutes some one had proposed a dance, but the red-haired girl objected because there was no chaperon. An appealing glance from the Vassar girl sent Tom hurrying into the kitchen whence he presently returned with the antiquated colored lady who, he said, would take great pleasure in chaperoning the party.

So, while one couple supplied the music the other three danced, and the antiquated colored lady sat in a big arm-chair grinning like a Cheshire cat and beating time on the carpet with her big old feet.

When four people enter into a compact and all get sick of it at once there is no special sin in smashing it.

JOHN ADAMS' PUPILS.

A Lively Description of His School and Certain Thoughts Thereupon.

After taking the degree of Bachelor of Arts at Harvard, John Adams taught school at Worcester, Mass. In the following letter, written March 15, 1756, he gives a lively description of his school and certain thoughts thereupon. The letter is to Judge Richard Cranch, of Boston:

"I sometimes in my sprightly moments consider myself in my great chair at school as some dictator at the head of a Commonwealth. In this little State I can discover all the great geniuses, all the surprising actions and revolutions of the great world in miniature.

"I have several renowned Generals but three feet high and several deep-projecting politicians in petticoats. I have others catching and dissecting flies, accumulating remarkable pebbles, cockel shells, etc., with as ardent curiosity as any virtuoso in the Royal Society.

"Some rattle and thunder out A, B, C, etc., with as much fire and impetuosity as Alexander fought, and very often sit down and cry as heartily upon being outspelt as Cæsar did when at Alexander's sepulcher he recollected that the Macedonian hero conquered the world before his age.

"At one table sits Mr. Insipid, fopling and fluttering, spinning his whirligig or playing with his fingers, as gaily and wittily as any Frenchified coxcomb brandishes his cane or rattles his snuff-box. At another sits the polemical divine, plodding and wrangling in his mind about 'Adam's fall in which we sinned all,' as his primer has it.

"In short, my little school, like the great world, is made up of kings, politicians, divines, LL. D.'s, fops, buffoons, fiddlers, sycophants, fools, coxcombs, chimney-sweepers and every other character drawn in history or seen in the world. Is it not then the highest pleasure to preside in this little world, to bestow the proper applause upon virtuous and generous actions, to blame and punish every vicious and contracted trick, to tear out of the tender mind every thing that is mean and little, and fire the new-born soul with a noble ardor and emulation? The world affords no greater pleasure."—Youth's Companion.

—The Spanish Government is a hard master. It pays the workmen in the Almaden quicksilver mines, which yield an enormous revenue, only twenty cents per day, and owing to the deleterious nature of the work the strongest men can only labor two days in the week. After five or six years' work the miners become disabled altogether, when the government magnanimously gives them a license to beg.

ODDS AND ENDS.

Sixty thousand blue gum trees have been planted this year on one ranch in Los Angeles county, Cal.

Women have recently been admitted into Greenwich observatory, and four have joined the staff of the astronomer royal. Their duties will require attendance at all hours of the night.

If all the persons whose names are in the new government blue book were to form a line four abreast it would take ten hours for the procession to pass the White House.

Georgia has plenty of room for immigrants. There are in Pierce county 400,987 acres of land, of which only 12,118 are improved; Ware contains 117,903 acres, of which 10,087 are improved; Wayne 249,000 and 9,997 improved; Appling 357,075 and 13,352 improved. Other counties make a similar showing.

The government statistician of New South Wales, T. A. Coghlan, has estimated the population of Australia at the beginning of the current year to be 3,786,798. This is an increase during 1889 of 113,995, or 3.10 per cent. The population of New Zealand is now 620,279, an increase during the year of 12,899.

According to the East Asiatic Lloyd there are 7,905 foreigners and 474 foreign business firms in Chinese ports. Great Britain has there 3,276 citizens and 290 firms; Germany 596 citizens and 72 firms; the United States 1,061 citizens and 27 firms; France 551 citizens and 20 firms.

Coffee is brewed by electricity in a Berlin cafe. In the center of the room are several large glass jars, through which passes a platinum wire in spiral form. The electricity, on heating the wire, speedily raises the temperature of the water in the jars to the boiling point, and prepares the coffee in the sight of everybody. Lastly, a small electric railway transmits the coffee to the various tables, so that the guests may help themselves to their liking.

An eight wheeled railway church has been finished at Tiflis, in the factory of the Transcaucasian Railway company, for use along the line. It is surmounted by a cross at one end, and at the other there is a handsome belfry with three balls. Besides the church proper, it has apartments for the priest. It can comfortably seat seventy persons. The altar is made of carved oak, and the church furniture was made in St. Petersburg.

An enthusiastic entomologist is receiving daily from the local lineman the moths which find their way into the arc lamp globe in an adjacent street during the night. Birds are fearlessly building their nests in the hoods of the lamps, and we are told that an electric light superintendent in Nashville received a unique present from a colored workman in the form of a sack full of honey bees. The swarm was found in the hood of an electric lamp, where it had settled the day before.

Billy, the goat, mascot on the United States steamer Galena, has been transferred to the flagship Baltimore, along with whatever goes with an able seaman. Billy left the Galena most unwillingly, and it looked for a time as if the drill known as "abandon ship" would have to be ordered as the only means of getting him over the side. Billy was especially skilled in this evolution, and he always fearlessly leaped into the cutter when the signal for abandon ship was given.

A state grant of 8,000,000 marks has just been made for the extension of the telegraph and telephone lines in the German empire. Of this 3,099,550 marks are to be devoted to the town telephones already existing, 606,000 marks to the erection of new ones, 1,928,000 marks to new telegraph lines, principally in the country; 761,900 marks for improvements in and 87,500 for extensions of the pneumatic postal services in Berlin and Hamburg.

At Dijon a convict under a sentence of twenty years' penal servitude was permitted to leave his prison and marry his sweetheart. He returned to prison after the ceremony, and in two years' time his wife will be able to join him in New Caledonia.

One of Dr. Talmage's Converts.

The captain of the Iroquois and the purser of the same steamer are both Brooklyn men. The former, Capt. L. W. Pennington, is an enthusiastic admirer of Dr. Talmage and a member of his congregation. Talmage calls him his converted sailor boy, and in connection with his religious experience Capt. Pennington related to me the following remarkable story:

"Up to the time of my conversion I had been an infidel, and very worldly in my inclinations. Quite accidentally, one Sunday, I accompanied my wife to the Tabernacle. Dr. Talmage's sermon on this occasion did not interest me, and before it was half over I left the church and went home. But I could not forget the doctor's words; they kept ringing in my ear, and at last I told my wife I was going back to hear the rest of the sermon.

"As I approached the Tabernacle I met Dr. Talmage just about to leave the church, having concluded the service. I told him how I had left after hearing half of the sermon, and why I had returned. 'Come right back with me,' said the doctor, 'and I will open up the church for you.' This he did, and prayed and reasoned with me for over an hour. I was converted that evening, and from that day to this I have believed in Dr. Talmage.—Brooklyn Eagle.

A COLLEGIATE PRISON.

The Most Interesting Penal Institution in the United States.

At Concord, in Massachusetts, there has been in existence for more than five years a prison conducted on the "collegiate system," which had previously been adopted at the similar establishment at Elmira, in the State of New York. The Concord prison, although styled "the Massachusetts Reformatory," is practically a State convict prison; for its inmates include the worst class of criminals, amongst whom are many burglars, robbers and common thieves, together with others guilty of arson, forgery, manslaughter and attempted murder. Thus, out of the 664 prisoners released from the establishment in 1889, there were 94 who had been convicted of burglary or house-breaking, and 125 thieves and robbers. Even convicts guilty of capital crimes may be legally committed to Concord "Reformatory," the difference between it and ordinary prisons being that the age of its inmates must not exceed forty years on entry, and that they must not have been convicted more than three times previously. But, once within its walls, the convicts find themselves in a comparative paradise. In the first place, the maximum period of detention is only five years, even for the most atrocious offenders. And by means of the "graded" system of "indeterminate" sentences, legalized for special application at this establishment, its inmates may, by good behavior, obtain their liberty in eleven months, instead of the five years' maximum. As at Elmira, intellectual study and high-class teaching are prominent elements in the daily routine. The report, issued 1890, gives a list of sixty-five persons, chiefly clergymen and professors, who, during the past year, delivered addresses on various subjects to the prisoners. The topics selected included, amongst many others, the following: Profit and Profitsharing; Socialism from a Christian Standpoint; the Early Church; an Evening in the British House of Commons; Luck and Pluck; Monks and Nuns, etc. The regular classes for study were for political economy, music, architectural drawing, mathematics and other branches. There are periodical examinations, which furnish a basis for the apportionment of good marks, which materially expedite the period of liberation. Amongst the questions and tasks recently put at examination times were such as these: "Describe rectilinear perspective, telling wherein it apparently is false when compared with curvilinear." "Draw a spiral with instruments." "What is meant by division of labor, and how does it increase labor's productiveness?" "Explain the law of 'diminishing returns' by a clear illustration." "What percentage of dictionary words are of Anglo-Saxon origin?" etc. The drawing class execute freehand designs in terra-cotta, plaster and stucco; also designs for internal and external house decoration in wood, iron, stone and copper. There is a debating society, a scientific and literary club, and an athletic society in the prison. There is a Protestant minister, Rev. Mr. Batt, and a Catholic priest, Rev. Father Crow, both of whose labors are highly commended in the report. A farm of about 100 acres is worked by the prisoners. There are 83 head of cattle and 500 swine upon it. There is in the establishment a printing-office, and, as at Elmira, a weekly newspaper is printed and published by the prisoners. But, notwithstanding all the various studies and pursuits encouraged by the authorities, it is admitted that many of the inmates hate honest labor. Rev. Mr. Batt naively records: "In our more private prison meetings I have repeatedly endeavored to discuss the subject of deligence; but I have rarely been able to escape the feeling that many of the prisoners did not want the matter talked about with any freedom. Some of the opponents have expressed fears that such discussions might lead to an increase of tasks in the work-shops. Others have said: "I will work when I get out of here, when I can work for wages; but I don't want to hear any thing about work here.' Others, claiming to be friends, have besought me to desist, lest I should break up my meetings." This prison is a very costly one to the State. Last year the expenses were $165,000, including salaries and wages. Four-fifths of the inmates of the prison are native Americans and one-fifth foreigners. There are sixty-one resident officers, of whom forty-five have salaries ranging from $1,000 to $3,500 per annum.—Cor. Leeds (Eng.) Mercury.

Schopenhauer's Last Thoughts.

The last thoughts of Arthur Schopenhauer have been found in a note-book in the Hotel d'Angleterre, the hotel where he died on the 23d of September, 1860. Some of the maxims are characteristic. For example, he says: "Each nation has but one great poet—its first. I set little store by a novelist who does not love evil for its own sake. When you make a new friend think of the future enemy who is already in him. Not one of the tortures of the inquisition is equivalent to that of doubt; it is lifelong. A really free man would be a monster. If I dared to promulgate a code it would pass but one sentence for all crimes: 'Live, wretch!' And the punishment would be too inhuman. Every thing has been sung. Every thing has been cursed. There is nothing left for poetry but to be the glowing forge of words. Style exhales the odor of the soul. In this age of machines I expect that one will keep cows."—Chicago Herald.

A Prudent Parent.

Indignant Father—Hadn't you done any thing but laugh?

Boy—No, sir?

"And the teacher whipped you for that? The scoundrel! I'll teach him ——"

"Yes, and he whipped me just as hard! He's a great big man."

(Not quite so indignant)—"H'm! You mustn't laugh in school, Johnny. It's against the rules."—Chicago Tribune.

THE HABITS OF "BOB WHITE."

A Sportsman Writes About His Experience with the Quail.

In studying the quail one cannot fail to notice the almost complete change of habits in this bird which attends the transition from one season of the year to another. In the spring and summer the once shy and bevy keeping Bob White becomes individualized and tame—we say individualized because, although mated, man and wife are always one flesh just as truly among birds as among human beings. No longer in flocks, Bob White turns up everywhere under your feet in the fields, especially if you haunt the vicinity of his nest and brooding mate. You will frequently see him running along by the fence, or even venturing out into the road, while his cheery, sweet song—for it is a song, albeit but of two notes—rings out again and again on the sunny air.

So tame and regardless of her own safety does the female grow in the nesting season that not unfrequently she will allow herself to be almost trodden upon before leaving the nest, and I have known late brooding birds in grass meadows to sit fearlessly upon their nests until cut to pieces by the relentless knives of the mowing machine.

Young quail are perfect little necromancers. Almost as soon as they are out of the shell they seem to have the power of making themselves invisible at the wave of a wand. Wherever they go to nobody can tell. The ground may be as bare as a floor, but somehow they manage to vanish utterly from the eye. And this is a trick which they do not entirely forget as they grow older. It takes a sharp eyed sportsman to see a bevy of quail before they rise, even if the dog is pointing right at them and the grass is as short as it is on a lawn.

By August Bob White begins to take on a different character altogether from that he has displayed during the spring and summer months. He ceases to perch himself in conspicuous places and sing for the delight of himself and his friends, both feathered and unfeathered. He no longer makes excursions into exposed and dangerous localities, nor does he trust to the friendliness of every human being who comes his way. Gradually he begins to assemble his family and nearest relatives into a little community conducted on the simplest communistic principles, and animated by one all pervading desire—to get through the terrible open season without being brought to griddle.

That Bob White has developed remarkable powers for realizing this desire every sportsman will readily acknowledge. No bird can place so many yards between itself and the gun in two or three seconds as the lively little quail. It takes a remarkably quick shot to get in both barrels effectively at a bevy of quail, even when the birds rise in the open and the sportsman has an unobstructed field of view. The almost irresistible tendency is to "fire at the thick of 'em," but besides being unsportsmanlike this method is generally ineffective also, for, while it may now and then cripple a bird, it oftener lets the whole bevy get away unscathed, or else sends two or three slightly wounded birds into the cover to die a cruel and lingering death.

The philosophy of this result is easy enough to explain, for, quickly as a covey of quail may seem to the excited sportsman to fly together when they are flushed, a little calm observation will show that the intervals between the several birds are almost always nearly as great as the spread of a charge of shot at thirty yards. Thus it will be seen that, if the center of the charge falls in one of the intervals or spaces, as it is just so much more likely to do as the space is larger than a quail's body, the only possible chance is that a bird may be crippled by the outer pellets, and even this chance is small compared with the alternative which has been previously stated.

Therefore, my advice to the true sportsman in quail shooting is to select one bird for each barrel; make a clean kill or none at all. And if you are not skillful and quick enough at first to select a bird for each barrel, make sure of your first shot only, for a time, until you get so that you can drop your bird quickly and neatly; then begin to attempt your double on the principle which has been laid down. I make a practice of concentrating my attention every time on what I call the "laggard"—that is, the bird nearest me when the gun is raised; or, if the bevy crosses me instead of going straight away, it is the last bird in the line that I fire at. This rule applies to the use of both barrels. Select the laggard each time.—Paul Pastnor in Shooting and Fishing.

A Wealthy Woman.

Mrs. Robert Goelet is not yet thirty years of age. She has a cottage in Newport worth $250,000 and an income of $182,500 a year, or $500 a day. Her father is George Henry Warren, the wealthy financier, from whom she learned how to keep her account book balanced. Mrs. Goelet is exceedingly pretty. She has bright yellow hair, a fair complexion, violet eyes, and her manners are those of a patrician lady. Her little son and daughter are beautiful as dolls and her constant companions through the day. She thinks nothing of asking a caller to excuse her when a doll's dress or a paper kite is in process of construction.—New York World.

Men to Beware Of.

Samuel W. King, at the head of one of the largest legal collection concerns in the country, has met and seen every type of man. From his observations he has made the following deductions, had them printed, and hung in his office:

Beware of the man who "Swears by all the gods at once," or one at a time, for that matter.

Of the man who slaps you between the shoulders and calls you "old man." No amount of familiarity is an excuse for this.

Of the man who hyphenates his words with "er-a."

Of the man whose salutation is, "What's the news?"

Of the man who asks you, when he has seen you speak to another, "Who's your friend?"

Of the man who asks you "Where did you get it?"

Of the man who in leaving says, "See you later."

Of the man who pokes you in the ribs when he is talking.

Of the man who adjusts the lapel of your coat or rubs one sleeve, or both, when he is talking to you.

Of the man who talks to you on the train, or on a street car, when he never saw you before, unless there is a public crisis. Victor Hugo says that such salutations show public anxiety, and are only excusable when there is public excitement. Sensible fellow, that Hugo.

Of a man who occupies a whole table in the writing room of a hotel.

Of the man who can't get out of a chair without kicking it from under him.

Of the man who drops into a drug store to look up a name in the directory and hangs onto the book as if it were a new novel when he sees three or four others waiting to look up names.

Of the man who stands at the box office of a theatre when there is a crowd back of him, talking about best seats and other topics.

The woman who will do this is no better. She isn't as good as a man.

Finally—Beware of the man who comes but never goes, and of his companion picture, the man who starts to go but doesn't.—Chicago Tribune.

A Bachelor's Lament.

I am living with a married sister, who has a baby about fourteen months old, that is the pest of my life; and the fact that it is named after me does not in the least diminish its disagreeableness, although the naming of it for its Uncle Anthony was and is considered the highest compliment that could be paid to any human being; but I am a bachelor and shall die rich. That baby—my nephew, namesake and godson—rules the house in every possible (and I might and will say impossible) respect. The whole domestic economy of the household is conceived and executed solely with reference to that diabolical urchin's wants—or rather, its supposed wants. I am constantly compelled to do this, and am prevented doing that, and solicited to do the other thing, either because the doing or the not doing of the thing to be done or not to be done may, can, must, might, could, would or should, or mayn't, can't, mustn't, mightn't, couldn't, wouldn't or shouldn't be good or bad for the little imp of pandemonium.

I am infested by that baby by day and it haunts my dreams by night. My whole existence is pervaded by it, and made wretched by it. And the worst of it all is, I have to pretend to like it—even to exhibit enthusiasm over it; to admire with especial and never flagging appreciation its head, its shoulders, its eyes, nose, mouth, chin, ears, hands, fingers, thumbs, feet, toes, dimples and plumptitudes; also its actions—its unspeakably abominable actions. My life, therefore, by virtue of that baby, is a never ceasing lie—a continuous sham and deceit. If the thing goes on I shall become utterly demoralized and be made miserable for the life to come as well as in this present existence. Now, not to bother you any further, what shall I do?—Cor. New York Ledger.

Center of the United States.

Do you know the exact location of the center of the Union? Never thought anything about it, probably. Well, it is marked by a grave—that of Maj. Ogden, of the United States army, who died at Fort Riley, Kan., in 1855, during the cholera epidemic of that year. The remains of the major were removed to Fort Leavenworth and buried in the National cemetery there, but his monument still stands upon a little knoll to the northeast of the fort—Fort Riley—and it lifts its head towards the clouds in the exact geographical center of the United States. Of the thousands of men who have been located at Fort Riley during the past forty years, perhaps not one in a hundred knew or cared anything about the oddity of his situation. The post is a few miles east of Junction City, Kan., and was formerly one of the most important in the United States.—St. Louis Republic.

The Secret of His Career.

All this heavy, systematic robbery was made possible by the fact that the thieving clerk never took a holiday or a vacation; he was the first man at the bank in the morning and the last to leave it at night. Frequently he worked alone by gas light. I know of more than one great commercial establishment in this town where the officers enforce the absolute rule that no employe shall work longer than the others, and that every employe shall take a vacation every year and surrender his books or department to another man.—Chatter.

All articles included in the above list, except the first department, to be on exhibition at the Pavilion on second day and remain during the Fair.

Special premiums will be allowed for articles exhibited not included in above list

If you have entries to make, attend to it at once, and when your entries are made, see to it that they are on time and at place for examination by the committee.

Accept no rumors in regard to the business of the exhibition. If you do not know what to do, inquire of the officers whose duty it is to tell you. One half of the trouble and disappointment at the Fair is caused by relying on hearsay. Attend to your business yourself. If it is done wrong you know where the blame lies.

Read the rules, and, by example, at least, assist in enforcing them; but don't forget that mistakes will occur where many people are congregated. The Board endeavors to do justice to all.

If the Superintendents and Committeemen are not always ready at the appointed hour, keep your stock and articles where you can command them at any time. Remember that we have but little time to do much business; patience, with a little system, will overcome many obstacles.

The Board will give the same special attention to details that has contributed to success in the past. It remains for the exhibitors to achieve still better results for the Fair of 1890.

Reverend H. J. Winson will preach at Lone Pine at 11 a. m.; Georges Creek 2:30 Independence at 7:30 o'clock in evening. Sunday School at Independence and Lone Pine at 11 o'clock a. m.

Ira Brown, of Olancha, spent a couple of days in town this week.

Doctor Bronson, late of Virginia City, is dead He died at San Erancisco last Friday.

Speaker Reed has been reelected, having received the largest vote ever given a member from that district.

Furnished sleeping rooms to let during the Fair, at corner of Main & Edwards streets. MRS. S. A. DENSMORE.

Governor C. C. Stevenson, of Nevada, is very ill of typhoid pneumonia. He has been sinking for some time. His physicians refuse to answer any inquiries.—Enterprise.

Mr. C. S. Swan, who has been visiting the lower country for the past three months arrived at Independence Thursday morning. He reports the outlook as flattering in the sections which he visited.

Mr. J. C. Miller, of Big Pine, has leased the Palace Saloon in Independence. Jake will be pleased to have his many friends give him a call. None but the finest brands of liquors and cigars kept in stock. See his ad.

The loss of live stock in Humboldt County, Nevada, during the past winter is estimated at nearly a million dollars, or an average of $275 for each man, woman and child in the county.

The Republican Convention has nominated a strong ticket. Every one of the gentlemen named are men of ability and sterling integrity. The Republicans of Inyo will this year stand by their nominees and elect the ticket by a handsome majority.

Hon. W. W. Bowers, of San Diego, is the Republican nominee for Congressman from the sixth District. Mr. Bowers was an active and useful member of the State Senate; he is a man of great energy and will do good service in Congress. The nomination is equivalent to an election.

It is reported that two prospectors named Titus and Payson—the latter a brother to Lew Payson—have made a strike of rich ore in the ridge on the south side of Deep Spring lake. There is said to be three feet of ore that goes 172 ounces silver per ton and 68 per cent lead. If the report states facts the prospectors have found a fortune.

Mr. Brooks, a civil engineer, arrived at Independence at the end of last week. He is making a preliminary examination of the route for the canal to Salt Wells Valley. This is one of the greatest works ever projected in the State, and will far exceed in magnitude any similar canal ever built on the Pacific Coast. Mr. Brooks has had charge of very extensive works of like character in India. So far, he reports being well satisfied with the result of his examination. He is going over the ground southward.

Nevada Nominations.

R. K. Colcord is the Republican nominee for Governor of Nevada. J. A. Poujade is the nominee for Lieutenant Governor, James D. Torreyson for Attorney-General and O. H. Grey for Secretary of State. Hon. H. F. Bartine is again nominated for Congress. Mr. F. G. Newlands acted in a most manly way in seconding the nomination of Mr. Bartine. It is clear that in Mr. Newlands Nevada has secured an able citizen. He is doing good work for the State.

Backward Versus Forward.

A certain voter attended the Democratic primary, and to the test "Will you support the Democratic nominees?" answered promptly "Yes" and voted. The same voter attended the Republican primary last Saturday, and to the test "Do you support Harrison and Morton?" promptly answered "Yes" and voted. This shows the spirit of looking at a test backward and not forward. The voter was entirely logical in his replies on both tests.

The Mystery of the Ages

Stanley's book, "In Darkest Africa," is by far the most interesting and remarkable book of the year published in this generation. The mysteries opened up by Stanley are sufficiently destined to become a vast nation like the United States. The present generation may witness great changes and advancement in the heart of Africa. A copy of this book should be in every school library. No better book than this can be put into the hands of young people. Parents should, if necessary, make a little sacrifice to secure it for their children. Mr. W. L. Hunter is agent for Inyo County and is now canvassing Owens Valley.

Republican County Ticket

The Republican Convention which met in Bishop on Thursday last nominated the following ticket:

Superior Judge—George M. Gill, of Independence.

Sheriff—John S. Gorman, Camp Independence.

County Clerk—John N. Yandell, of Keeler.

Assessor—P. A. Chaltant, of Bishop.

District Attorney—Charles Mulholland, of Independence.

Treasurer—William F. Matlack, of Independence.

School Superintendent—James H. Shannon, of Bishop.

Coroner and Public Administrator—Thomas Parker, of Independence.

Supervisor, First District—J. D. Harger, of Bishop.

Supervisor, Third District—James Steward, of Big Pine.

AT BISHOP.

The past three days have been busy ones at Bishop. Trains and private conveyances had filled the town with visitors by Tuesday forenoon. About midday a large procession was formed on Main Street and marched to the Brewery grove. Pioneers, Odd Fellows, Good Templars and Native Sons all turned out in large numbers in the procession. On arriving at the grove the assembly was called to order by S. G. Sneden, President of the day. Rev. Andrew Clark opened the proceeding with prayer. Dr. Chapman delivered an address as representative of the Parlor of Native Sons at Bishop, and Mr. Frank Densmore spoke as representative of the Parlor at Independence. Miss Brockman, Miss Carrie Stoutenborough and Miss Louise Clark, by recitations and songs contributed much to the pleasure of the occasion. Mr. John W. P. Laird delivered a lengthy and well prepared speech. During the proceedings a strong choir rendered several selections very effectively. Owing to the large crowd and much restlessness it was not possible to hear any part of the exercises except in the immediate vicinity of the platform. A barbecue was prepared and an abundance of good things to eat for the whole assembly, large as it was. A ball was given the same evening by the Native Sons. There was such a jam in the Hall that the dancers were crowded quite uncomfortably till after midnight; then many retired and the young people kept up the fun till morning.

The town was full of candidates and delegates to the Republican Convention. Among these all other considerations were of secondary importance. There was a great deal of bitter feeling evident, and charges were freely made of bargains and combinations such as have led the party to defeat at every election for many years past. Curses enough were uttered to sink a nation, and threats enough to make lasting feuds. The best citizens of Bishop, and as staunch Republicans as live, were very open in their condemnation of a repetition of the same practices that have never failed to lead the party to defeat in the past. We make no comments here, but plainly state the facts. It remained to be seen if harmony could be restored before the meeting of the Convention on Thursday.

Andy Allen was down from Bridgeport with his trotting stallion "Andy." Chase of Modesto, sent over a running horse to contest with Smith's "Pickpocket." I. H. Mulholland was up from Independence with a little mare to run and a trotting horse. It appears, however, that outside horses were not very badly wanted, and at latest accounts Allen and Mulholland were both barred out from all set races. They would be permitted to use the race track if they wanted to make private matches. This way of doing business is not very likely to draw strangers and outside visitors to attend a race meeting.

Though the Fair did not begin till Wednesday, on that morning nothing had been taken to the Pavilion for exhibit. During the day loads of products and articles of all kinds kept coming in and the ground floor of the school house was fairly well filled. The fruits and farm products would do credit to any country. Grapes, apples, pears and other fruits of high excellence and beauty were shown. These prove that the north end of the valley has a great future as a fruit producing region. Corn was shown worthy of the virgin prairie soil of Illinois, and all other farm products were of equal excellence. A marked improvement was evident in all kinds of exhibits, live stock as well as the produce of the orchard, the vineyard and farm, over the exhibits of other years. It is gratifying to every good citizen of the county to see that these Fairs are producing their intended effect of stimulating everybody to constant efforts after greater excellence.

We Are Seven.

A few evenings ago a group of citizens were discussing politics on the porch of the Norman House, at Independence. One at length said, "Let's all take a drink." There were no skulkers, all hands firmly advanced to the bar. There were seven in the party, and every man of them staunch Democrats, with Jack Gunn as leader. Of course it would be expected that they would all take "straight goods" and so they did but it was'nt whiskey. Every man of the party took soda water and nothing else, and Murphy was in the party, too. This is, as Dominie Sampson would say, pro-digi-ous, but it's the honest truth.

For Sale.

The ranch known as the "Rittgers place" near Lone Pine is offered for sale together with the the farming implements and stock. The ranch contains 320 acres of excellent land. The stock consists of thirty head of cattle and twelve brood mares. There is now sixty tons of hay on the place and feed enough to winter 200 head of stock. The winter pasture is rented for five years at $300 a year. The soil is a rich loam and excellently adapted to vegetable raising. There is plenty of timber and water, making it a good stock ranch. BROTHERHOOD IN BUSINESS.

Enterprises Which Encourage Thrift and Industry.

Until a radical change is made in the constitution of men no greater extension of the brotherhood principle seems possible, for barter and trade, however warped from their purpose on occasion, are founded on a just enterchange of commodities, and no form of brotherhood can give us more than justice save in the way of alms. But association and co-operation, founded upon a sense of the brotherhood of man, are nevertheless capable of doing good to humanity, though they may not be able to overturn business principles based upon barter. They encourage thrift and industry, two habits that go very far to correct the evils of poverty; they help to impart practical knowledge of business affairs to the co-operators—knowledge which is of use to them in all their dealings. A careful examination of the results of co-operative enterprises shows that their immediate material returns are uncertain and of no great magnitude or importance, but that their indirect benefits are sometimes very great, though incidental and unlooked for. It is this circumstance that leads to the never-ending contentions between calculating mathematicians and the advocates of co-operative enterprises, who, without reasoning from cause to effect, are nevertheless sure that they bring about good results. The advocates of building societies, which may be taken as one form of co-operation, will claim in one breath that the borrowers pay less than the legal rate of interest on moneys borrowed, and that the society gains much more than legal rate of interest on the same sums. Even when allowance is made for the compounding of interest, the calculating mathematician finds that this is not true. If he is also something of a financier he can prove—on paper—that the building society member could better afford to save and invest his money and borrow money when he needed it in the open market than deal with his co-operative bank. But the mathematician who comes to this conclusion is in as much error as the deluded advocate of co-operation, who thinks that a little sentiment will change the market rates for money. His theory is not a practicable theory. It does not take into account the weaknesses of men and the temptations to which they are subjected. The building society removes some of these temptations, encourages the member to save, stimulates him to make safe investments of a speculative nature in real property, teaches him business principles, and, by promoting his interests in these indirect ways, apparently fulfills the promise of its advocates. But these and other co-operative enterprises must follow business principles if they are to succeed; the brotherhood idea may help to form them or hold them together; it must not govern them in their dealings.—Baltimore Sun.

A WEALTHY BEGGAR.

A Blind Mendicant Who Is Worth All of Five Thousand Dollars.

Probably the richest professional mendicant in this country is the blind man whose face has become familiar to all the habitues of Chestnut street during the past three months, which is about the length of his most recent visit to this city. He must be quite sixty years old, and his face is scarred with the marks of small-pox, and his battered black Derby hat and the faded brown overcoat that he wears have been long in service. He guides himself slowly down the crowded thoroughfare with his stick, and makes no appeal for alms other than that which is conveyed by his wretched appearance. Yet "Blind Johnny," as he is known in the circles of his profession, is said to have at least $5,000 to $6,000 invested in tenement houses in Baltimore, from which he realizes 8 or 10 per cent. annually, and he is supposed to have as much more cold cash stowed away in some hiding-place known only to himself.

He has been seen in every city from Washington north and between Boston and Chicago, and rarely spends more than three months in any one place. He always travels by rail at the cheapest rates of fare, but never attempts to beg on the trains. When he goes to Baltimore, which he does at least once a year, he makes a personal inspection of his property and has conferences with a regular agent who collects his rents. On these occasions he usually indulges in a week's debauch, at the end of which he is off on the road again. It is probably true, as it is said of him, that he knows the principal streets of every great city as well as any resident and can pick his way through any throng.—Philadelphia Inquirer.

Ugly Capes and Hideous Sleeves.

Capes, capes everywhere. They are more in favor than ever, strange to say, for at best they are ugly enough. Some have great ruffles which flap and flop and give the wearer a most grotesque appearance. The triple cape of cloth, with the high collar, is most effective. The accordion-plaited cape is a fancy which will pass into history as did its predecessor, the fluted skirt. The capes of lace and ribbons are pretty trifles for summer evening wear. In place of the long fringes worn over a plain skirt this past season, narrow ribbons are now worn depending from the waist. The effect is rather pretty, especially if the ribbons be of two or three different shades. Sleeves grow larger and proportionately more hideous. Walking behind a smart young woman these days, you seem to see a hump-backed, reckless creature. I saw a slim girl in the park the other day in a gown of Scotch plaid with sleeves that rose nearly to her ears. Her waist was like a wasp's, and the view from the rear was something too awful to be true.—Philadelphia Ledger.

Betrayed.

Mistress (looking into the kitchen)—Do you happen to know at what time your master came home last night?

Servant Girl—No, ma'am, but this morning at seven his boots were still warm.—Dorfbarbier.

—A missionary who settled in the Province of Sz-Chuan, Central China, and visited the great Buddhist peak, Mount Omel, describes the temples as still showing many wonderful works of art, notwithstanding conflagrations, devastating wars and rebellions. Near the foot of the mountain is a pagoda of bronze, thirty feet high, in fifteen stories, covered with an immense number of figures delicately cast. Of figures of Buddha there are no less than four thousand seven hundred, some of which have been mutilated by collectors of relics.

NOISES OF THE NIGHT.

Calls and Cries Which Bespeak Animated Nocturnal Life.

There is always something abroad—some creature of the fields and woods—which by its voice or movements is betrayed. Just as in an old rambling house there are always strange noises that can not be accounted for, so in the bye-paths of nature there are innumerable sounds which can never be localized. To those, however, who pursue night vocations in the country—gamekeepers, poachers and others—there are always calls and cries which bespeak life as animate under the night as that of the day. This is attributable to various animals and birds, to night-flying insects, and even to fish. Let us track some of these sounds to their source. "When comes still evening on, and twilight gray hath in her sober livery all things clad"—then it is that the white owl comes abroad. Passing the remains of an old baronial hall, its piercing screech comes from the dismantled tower. Here the owls have lived time out of mind, and we have seen and heard them, asleep and awake, through every hour of the day and night. It is unnatural history to assert—as Mr. Grey asserts—that the barn owls ever mope, or mourn, or are melancholy. Neither are they grave monks, nor anchorites, nor pillared saints. A boding bird or a dolorous! Nonsense; they are none of these. They issue forth as very devils, and, like another spirit of the night, sail about seeking whom they may devour. The barn owl is the "screech" owl of the bird literature; the brown owl the true hooting owl. This species is found in old and heavily-timbered districts, and it particularly loves the dark and somber gloom of resinous pine woods. But the barn owl is only the precursor of new life—life as animate under the night as that of the birds and butterflies under the day. We follow the path by the river, and on through the meadows. Among the nut-bush tops a bat is hawking for night-flying insects. Great white moths get up from the grass, and go looming away through the darkness. A bend in the stream brings us to a quiet river reach with brown pebbles and a shallow. A sentinel heron, that has been standing watchful on one leg, rises and flaps languidly away down the river reach. The consumptive figure of the gaunt bird stands by the stream through all weathers. He knows not times nor seasons, and is a great poacher. In the wind, when he takes his lone stand, his loose, fluttering feathers look like driftwood caught in the bushes. He reminds one of the consumptive! But, unlike him, has wonderful powers of digestion, and, withal, an immense capacity for fish. Woe to the luckless mort or trout that comes within reach of his formidable pike, or the attacking peregrine that he attempts to impale on his bill. The heron is essentially a wanderer, and like Wordsworth's immortal leech-gatherer, he roams from pond to pond, from moor to moor. Herons come and go by the same routes; and night after night have we flushed our fisher from the self-same shallow. The peculiarly wild whistle of the curfew comes from out the night sky, and swifts screech for an hour after darkness has fallen. We are now by the covet side, and a strange "churring" sound comes from the glades; it approaches nearer and nearer until a loud flapping is heard in the bushes. The object approaches quite closely, and it is seen that the noise is produced by a large bird striking its wings together as they meet behind. Even in the darkness it may be detected that each wing is crossed by a definite white bar. The bird is the goatsucker or nightjar. Had we it in our hand, we should see that it was a connecting link between the owls and the swallows, having the soft plumage and noiseless flight of the one, and the wide gape of the other. The object of the noise it produces is probably to disturb from the bushes the large night-flying moths upon which it feeds.—Cornhill Magazine.

A PENURIOUS BANKER.

An Amusing Anecdote Illustrating His Remarkable "Nearness."

On April 21, 1836, James Wood, one of the wealthiest private bankers in England, was buried. He was noted for his penuriousness, and a good story illustrating this trait in his character is told. One Sunday before going to church he gave a little boy, who acted as his servant, a chicken to be roasted for dinner. The cooking process began, and as the bird was turned and basted the savory steam which arose whetted the boy's appetite and he ventured to rub his finger on the breast, which was being gradually browned, and apply the finger to his mouth. The taste was delicious. He became hungrier and bolder, and picked away a morsel of the chicken's breast, then another and another, and before he realized what he was doing the whole bird had disappeared. His hunger being appeased, he saw his fault, and, trembling at the prospect of meeting his master, he thought of hiding. On entering a closet adjoining the room he saw a small bottle with the awful label "Poison" upon it. He feared death much, but his master more, and he resolved to end his days then and there. He drained the bottle, and thought he was safe from his master's rage. In a short time the old banker returned, ready to enjoy the chicken and his glass of brandy and water. Great was his surprise when he saw th both the chicken and boy had disappeared. On making search he found the youthful cook lying on the pantry floor with the empty bottle by his side. The mystery was solved. The boy was drunk, for the bottle had contained Wood's brandy, and he had labeled it "Poison" to prevent the servants from drinking the liquor. What he did with the boy is not recorded.—Chicago News.

Sudden Change of Terms.

"Snukes an embezzler? What was the extent of his operations?"

"Only about twenty dollar."

"Is that all? The miserable thief!"—Chicago Tribune.

—"What is a republic?" asked an official of a candidate for naturalization. "Shur'n I don't know." "What is a monarchy?" "I don't know;" and so on through a series of questions. At last the wearied official handed a copy of the constitution to the applicant's sponsor, and said: "Take this man out and instruct him a little." In the course of fifteen minutes the "gay, guiltless pair" hurried back into the presence of the representative of the United States Government. "It's all right," cried the sponsor; "I've rid the constitootion to Pat, and he's very much pleased with it."

A NEWSPAPER RELIC.

Journalism in Washington When This Century Was a Babe.

Some quaint reminders of events and conditions in this country eighty-six years ago look out from the dim pages of a worn and faded copy of the National Intelligencer and Washington Advertiser, bearing date of May 25, 1804. The paper was printed in Washington City by Samuel Harrison Smith. It is much smaller than the one-cent evening dailies now circulated in this city and is printed on a quality of paper that would be regarded as very poor wrapping paper in these days. Its subscription price was $5 per annum.

Ten lines of large type, double leaded, gives the latest news in this venerable paper as follows: "As a testimonial of the President's high opinion of the gallant conduct of Lieutenant Decatur in taking and destroying the frigate the Philadelphia, a commission to him as a captain in the navy has been duly issued and will, without delay, be transmitted to Commodore Preble to be presented to him." Following this piece of news is an extract from a letter to the Secretary of the Navy, dated Havana, April 23, announcing that the Governor of Cuba has manifested his friendly disposition toward the United States by prohibiting French privateers from bringing American prizes into any of the ports of Cuba.

The official returns of the April election for Governor of New York are given by counties, showing that Morgan Lewis received a majority of 8,782 over Aaron Burr. In an adjoining column is a call for the citizens of Washington to exercise their privilege of voting for "eighteen characters" to represent them in the city council. Dispatches from New York dated six days before the day of publication announce the safe arrival in the metropolis of General Wilkinson, "Commander-in-Chief of the army of the Un ted States, and several officers in his suite."

Thomas Bailey, a Maryland sheriff, advertises that he has captured a runaway negro woman, who is imprisoned in the Baltimore county jail, "and if her owner does not release her she will be sold for her jail fees according to law." John T. Mason advertises that he wants to sell a strong, healthy negro boy, fifteen years old, "whose conduct has been such as to oblige me to part with him." There are other advertisements offering rewards for the recapture of runaway negroes.

A two-and-a-half-month-old report presented to Congress by the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures occupies two full columns on the first page of the National Intelligencer. It sets forth the grievances of American seamen in their own country, claiming that, although taxed for hospital duties, they were refused admittance into the infirmary. The committee concluded "that the seamen of this country ought to be distinguished when in distress from common paupers" and recommended that steps be taken to increase the permanent fund for the relief of superannuated and decrepit seamen.

One-half of a page of this old paper is given up to a sketch of General Moreau, "a young hero lately brought before the public in consequence of his supposed friendship and connection with General Pichegru." A letter from Constantinople, dated the previous Christmas, fills a column. It tells about the plague that had raged in Turkey, and discusses vaccine inoculation from a skeptical point of view. A batch of general European gossip six and eight weeks old is printed, including the statement: "A new class of people will be formed in Russia, under the title of Free Farmers, in consequence of an imperial decree which allows land owners to grant freedom to their peasants in order to raise money to pay their debts."—N. Y. Times.

ALASKA GOLD FIELDS.

Deposits Which Rival in Richness Those of California.

Gold in variable quantities and under different cond tions has been found in three principal districts of Alaska—the Juneau and Douglas Island district, one hundred and eighty miles northeast of Sitka, and bordering Gastineau channel, a narrow inlet which separates Douglas Island from the mainland; the Sitka district, the quartz deposits of which are found at Silver bay, a narrow, tortuous arm of the Pacific, indenting Baranoff Island, and in the valley of the Yukon river in Western Alaska. Gold-bearing quartz has also been found at Unga Island, one of the smaller of the Aleutian group, and some effort has been made there at development, but more of that hereafter. As concerns the Yukon valley, little attention has been paid by explorers and prospectors to discover gold-bearing quartz, and the only results, so far, relate to placer mining. At the head of Lynn canal, one of the inner passages adapted to steamer navigation, about three hundred miles northeast of Sitka, is the mouth of the Chilcatl river, navigable for canoes for a score of miles. At the head of this canoe navigation are three large Chilcatl villages, and it is at this point, where commences what is known as the Chilcatl portage, across the range to the head waters of the Yukon river in British territory. The distance from the Indian villages on the American side of the divide to the first lake, the source of the Yukon, is about thirty miles, but the route is one of the most difficult in the Territory, yet the only practicable one by which to reach the Yukon valley from the south. During the past three years the reports that the bars of the Yukon and of its tributaries, Stewart and Pelly rivers, and Forty Mile creek were rich in placer gold, have induced several hundred Alaskan miners to venture across the range, at the Chilcatl crossing, and descend those streams. Several parties are also known to have perished in this perilous search for the new gold fields.—Judge J. H. Keatly, in Arena.

Try, Try Again.

Mrs. Highflyer—What's the matter, Henry? You look down-hearted.

Mr. Highflyer—I am almost discouraged. I have failed three times and am not independently wealthy yet.

Mrs. Highflyer—Well, dear, fail again. You will succeed eventually.—Munsey's Weekly.

—Angora-goat farming is perhaps the most important and profitable industry of the Tasmanian farmer. This industry was introduced into Tasmania forty years ago, and mohair first appeared as an export ten years later, the quantity shipped being 1,033 pounds. In 1875 the clip reached 1,157,000 pounds, valued at $600,000, while in 1887 7,154,000 pounds of hair were exported, valued at over one million dollars (the price of the hair having been much reduced by this time), besides skins to the value $500,000.

A FORTUNATE CHICAGOAN.

Smiled Upon by The Louisiana State Lottery Goddess to the Extent of $15,000.

Eternally sticking to it brings success. Young men in Chicago have had this old maxim reeled off to them so often that whatever they engage in they keep at with a persistency bound to be rewarded. If the object sought to be attained is a praiseworthy one so much the better for the young man. The rule applies, whatever be the motive.

The good fortune to-day enjoyed by a young Chicagoan, W. E. Spingenberg, a clerk in S. Schipps' fire insurance agency at 206 La Salle street, may have been in the nature of a reward for persistent efforts, or it may have been simply one of the smiles which Dame Fortune so often sheds on favored residents of the world's fair city.

Be it as it may, Mr. Spingenberg in June invested in one-fortieth interest in ticket No. 50,-542 in The Louisiana State Lottery and now has 15,000 cold, hard dollars to show for it, the entire ticket represented by his number being $600,000. When called on by a Times' reporter he was very reticent as to details, but tacitly pleaded guilty to extent named. His good fortune has become so generally know among his many friends that he is daily the recipient of hearty congratulation and quantities of good advice. Mr. Spingenberg is a sharp, shrewd, young business man, and already has his newly acquired fortune invested to good advantage. Riches have by no means turned the young man's head, but the unexpected possession of even this little $15,000 has given him an idea of the pleasant troubles that riches generally bring with them. —Chicago (Ill.) Times, July 17.

"Don't you think young Rignald de Jones a very promising youth?" "Very. I'm his tailor."

There is very little that the average politician does not know and it will be found in the Constitution of the country he is striving to save.

An Indian Boy's Composition.

Here is a composition written by Fred Big Horse, a smart 13-year-old Sioux boy, who has been a year or two at the Indian school at Carlisle, Pa. Fred is evidently cut out for a newspaper humorist. The title of the composition is "Monkeys," and this is what he writes about them: "There are many kinds of animals. Monkeys and monkeys, etc. The monkeys are very much like a monkey, too. The monkeys can climb a tree like a monkey. They have long fingers like a monkey. The monkeys have long tails and long bodies like a monkey. They often play a merry game and sing a merry song like a monkey. Once upon a time my friend and I were young men that time we took a trip we started off from Dakota and away we went and then we went to South America. There we saw the monkeys and monkeys everywhere on the trees screaming and chattering everywhere on the trees. They were very cheerful like monkeys. We saw all kinds of monkeys in South America; we caught a ship load of them and brought them back to the United States and sold them for so much money. Then we took the money to buy a big balloon and it blew away. Then we had no monkeys, no money and no balloon."—New York Sun.

TAKE CARE! THERE IS DANGER

In allowing inactivity of the kidneys to grow through neglect. The deadly shoals of Bright's disease and diabetes will wreck the goodly bark of health if it is allowed to drift rudderless upon them. The bladder, too, if inactive, and judicious medication does not speedily direct the helm toward the port of safety, will be wheelmed by the quicksand of disease. In selecting a diuretic, let your choice fall upon Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, which stimulate the renal organs without irritating and exciting them, two effects to be apprehended from the unmedicated stimuli largely resorted to. These have a tendency to react prejudicially. The Bitters invigorate the kidneys and bladder, in common with the nerves and the digestive organs, and so afford lasting aid. It also affords dual assistance in preventing and curing intermittent and remittant fever. Biliousness, constipation and rheumatism it also subjugates.

CURE OF SPINAL WEAKNESS.

E. F. Woolston, Yates, Orleans Co., N. Y., writes:

"My wife, five years ago, was confined to her bed with inflammatory rheumatism of the muscles of the back. The doctors thought her case hopeless, and doomed her to be a bedridden invalid. The violent pain kept her awake almost every night. She lost over thirty pounds in weight. To ease her pain I thought I would put on ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTERS. I covered her back with them. To my great delight she began to sleep well. The pain very much abated in one week. I then took the plasters off, washed her back, and put on fresh ones. At the end of the second week, she insisted on getting up, and by the third week was entirely well and able to attend to her household duties."

DOGS AND THEIR TRICKS.

Most Any Dog Can Be Taught Some Trick and He'll Never Forget It.

Professor Burton, who has a troupe of clever dogs, is an old circus man. He used to be tumbler in the ring. There comes a day in the life of every circus tumbler when he must quit the business and go into something else. Burton went to training dogs. He has been with several companies, but is now on his own hook. He had a valuable troupe of dogs once in New York, but somebody poisoned them.

The professor's present family of dogs consists of Italian greyhounds, German poodles, a Russian poodle, a Russian spaniel, a liver-and-white spaniel, a spitz, a black dog that does the somerset act, and several others.

"There is no dog," said the professor, "which can't be taught a trick of some sort. Of course there are some dogs that learn quicker than others, and more tricks. I am always asked how I teach dogs these tricks. Well, there is no trick about it that I ever knew. It takes patience and judgment and kindness. I seldom use the whip, and never in giving instructions. In fact, I have to be very cautious. The other day two of my family got into a squabble. I separated them, but with trouble. In doing so I had to cut one of them with the whip. That fellow is heartbroken. He has had the sulks ever since. He won't eat and he won't act. I've got to send him away for a few days.

"A dog should be at least a year old before training. I select different breeds for different acts. The greyhound is a natural leaper. The spaniel is a trickster. The spitz is the clown. The black dog—the black-and-tan one—is the acrobat.

"Under ordinary circumstances the average dog will learn his trick in five weeks. Then the test comes when he goes on the stage the first time. Talk about people having stage fright! I've known dogs when brought on the stage for the first time make a break and run away and tremble like a frightened child. When they get used to it, though, they like the stage, and the more applause they get the better they act. You may think that is stretching it, but it is a fact that trick dogs do better if they are applauded, and this is especially true if the applause comes from children.

"These trick dogs know their places on the stage and take their cue from my looks. They are as eager for the show to begin as children are eager for play. This, I think, is instinct, for anybody could go on the stage with them if he knew the words to speak and the motions to make, and the dogs would go through the same programme they go through with me.

"I keep them in cages after the show. Every morning at 9:30 I take them out for exercise. They are fed twice a day—in the morning and after the show at night. This troupe consumes about fifteen loaves of bread and a large size market basket of cooked meat every day.

"They never forget a trick. I laid off some months ago and sent the dogs to the country. I had a vacation of several weeks—me and the dogs. When I returned to the stage with them they went through every part without a break. There is good feeling between the members of the present family. They are healthy and full of fun. There isn't a cynic in the lot."—Chicago Tribune.

The Craze for Odd Leather.

An extensive leather dealer of London, traveling in this country, says that never before was there such a craze in London for queer leather as at the present time. He adds: "All kinds of skins, from elephant's to frog's, are pressed into service to meet the demands of the fashionable. Some of our shops are stocked with a supply of fancy articles that are made from the skins of all sorts of beasts, reptiles and fishes. These queer objects are displayed in the windows, where their appearance attracts wondering crowds. Made up into various articles are yellow pelican skins, lion and panther skins, buffalo skins, fish skins, monkey skins, snake skins, and the coverings of almost every living thing known. They are tanned and sometimes colored with blue, gray or red. I think it looks hideous to see a pretty English girl walking along the street swinging a portemonnaie made of the scaly hide of a boa constrictor. But it's fashion's order, you know."—Exchange.

Preferred His Own Importation.

Col. Reynolds was wounded. His thigh was shattered by a ball, and after a grave and protracted consultation the surgeons informed the brave Irishman that his leg must be amputated in order to save his life. He was true grit to the backbone, and protested against this strongly. "Can't you cure the leg?" he pleaded. The surgeons shook their heads, and one of them informed him that it would not be so bad after all, as he could wear a cork leg. "It's a Cork leg I have now," he replied, with a grim smile, "and I think a great deal of it because I imported it myself—I imported it from Ireland."—Chicago Herald.

Once in a While.

When a judge tells a prisoner that he has been tried by a jury of his peers, he may be correct, but the chances are, with the jury system run the way it is, that the average prisoner has more sense and intelligence than the average man sitting on his case. He has got to be a mighty poor man who is the peer of a juror.—Detroit Free Press.

BRASS MULE MEDICINE.

A Chinese Cure That is Simpler Than the Patent Drugs of America.

A traveler recently returned from Peking says that he saw there a peculiar method of cure. In a temple outside one of the city gates is to be found a brass mule of life size supposed to have wonderful healing properties. Patients suffering from every imaginable disease seek this temple to obtain a cure.

The method pursued is as follows: Suppose you suffer from sciatica, you go with all speed to this famous temple, and having discovered the particular part of the brass mule corresponding to the painful region of your own body, you must rub the animal a certain number of times, and then with the same hand shampoo your own disabled member, and then—well then the pain goes.

The special feature of this method of cure is its delightful simplicity. Is your toot aching? Just scrub the mule's teeth and afterward your own, and voila! the cure is complete. Have you an ulcer of the cornea? Pass the tips of your fingers to and fro over the particular eyeball of the mule, and then with well-regulated pressure rub repeatedly the afflicted eye.

The mule has unhappily lost his sight during the many years he has been engaged in his benevolent work, the eyeballs, we are told, having been gradually worn away, as the result of constant friction until now you have only the empty orbit to operate upon.

The animal is patched in all directions with fresh pieces of brass to put on to cover holes produced by the constant friction of eager patients, and a new, perfectly whole mule stands ready at hand, awaiting the day when his old colleague, having fallen to pieces in the temple, shall give him an opportunity of likewise benefiting posterity.—Chicago Herald.

AMONG THE LAPPS.

Curious Table Habits of These Diminutive Natives of the Far North.

I was taken into one of the Lapp's huts, says a writer in an English journal. In the center a wood fire was burning brightly on some stones, and at first the smoke was very unpleasant, but soon one became accustomed to it, and it served the useful purpose of driving away the winged plague, which had followed us all day.

The man proceeded to boil some coffee, which in a few minutes was set before me, together with a wooden bowlful of reindeer's milk. The coffee was not very palatable, but under the circumstances worse fare would have proved acceptable. The milk I found to be too thick and rich to drink much of.

A sugar loaf was produced from beneath some cloths in a corner, and a few pieces was chipped off and handed to me. I accepted them with my politest smile, accompanied by a bow; but when I proceeded to sugar my coffee in the orthodox style the action caused much amusement to the juvenile Lapps, who roared with laughter, and appeared to enjoy the fun immensely.

I found that I ought to have eaten the sugar separately, as they did, and they evidently considered my way of sweetening coffee irresistably funny.

Cakes were then served to each one. These were about the size of a penny bun, but of the consistency of putty or dough, which they some what resemble in appearance. Sour cream was eaten with them. So nasty were they that a mouthful gave me "quite a turn," and I was glad to smuggle the remainder underneath the rug on which I was sitting. I did not like to throw it away, for fear of offending my hosts, but trusted to the sharp noses of the dogs to get me out of the difficulty.

ELECTRICAL TERMS.

There Is Nothing Wonderful in Connection With Their Origin.

Electricians use many odd terms in their technical conversations, which are but component parts of a dead language to most listeners. Thus, we hear them speak of "farad," "ohms," "joules," "amperes," "watts," etc. The unit of capacity is one farad; the unit of resistance, one ohm; the unit of work, one joule; the unit of activity, one watt, the unity of quantity, one coulomb; the unit of current, one ampere; the unit of magnetic field, one gauss; the unit of pressure, one volt, and the unit of force, one dyne. Odd as these names may sound to the ear, there is really nothing wonderful in connection with their origin, they all having been derived from the name of some man famous in his special field of electrical study. Thus Michael Faraday, George S. Ohm and James P. Joule, famous English and German discoverers, give their names to the first three units mentioned above; James Watt and Andre M. Ampere, English and French inventors, to the two units following. Chas. A. Coulomb and Carl F. Gauss, the former a Frenchman and the latter a German, give their names to the units of quantity and magnetic field. The volt is named for the Italian discoverer, Volta; the dyne is derived from the root word of dynamo, itself meaning force.—St. Louis Republic.

The Court Poet Must Go.

Discussion still continues in various journals as to the poet best fitted to fill the post of laureate after Lord Tennyson. I have my suggestion to make. It is that this ridiculous office be abolished, for what can be more absurd than that a Prime Minister, who, perhaps, knows nothing of poetry, and cares, if possible, less, should suddenly be called upon to decide between the conflicting claims of a crew of versifiers, each worshiped by a select band of literary toadies, and none likely to be remembered beyond nominis umbra 100 years hence. Poetry really immortal is the rarest of products; poetry fairly good is a drug in the market. Poetry and officialdom are antagonistic. A court poet should go the way of the court buffoon.—London Truth.

THE DEATH PLANT.

It Distills a Deadly Perfume Which Kills Insects and Small Birds.

A magnificent kali mujah, or death plant of Java, has been recently received here by Mrs. Madison Black. The specimen, which is the only living one that has ever been brought to this country, was sent Mrs. Black by her brother, Jerome Hendricks, who went out as a missionary to the island. The kali mujah is found only in the volcanic districts of Java and Sumatra, and then but rarely. It grows from two to three and a half feet in height, with long, slender stems armed with thorns nearly an inch long, and covered with broad, satin-smooth leaves of a heart shape and of a delicate emerald on one side, and blood red, streaked with cream, on the other.

The flowers of the death plant are large, milk-white and cup-like, being about the size and depth of a large coffee cup and having the rim guarded by fine, brier-like thorns. The peculiarity of the plant lies in these flowers, which, beautiful as they are, distill continually a deadly perfume so powerful as to overcome, if inhaled any length of time, a full-grown man, and killing all forms of insect life approaching it. The perfume, though more pungent, is as sickingly sweet as chloroform, which it greatly resembles in effect, producing insensibility, but convulsing at the same time the muscles of the face, especially those about the mouth and eyes, drawing the former up into a grin. An inhalation is followed by violent headache and a ringing in the ears, which gives way to a temporary deafness, often total while it lasts.

Other plants seem to shun the kali mujah, which might be termed the Ishmael of the vegetable kingdom, for it grows isolated from every other form of vegetation, though the soil may be fertile. All insects and birds instinctively seem to avoid all contact with it, but when accidentally approaching it have been observed to drop to the earth, even when as far from it as three feet, and, unless at once removed soon died, evincing the same symptoms as when etherized.

Mr. Hendricks, who writes describing how he secured the specimen sent his sister, says he discovered it first by seeing a bird of paradise he was endeavoring to capture alive fall, stunned by the deadly ordor of the kali mujah, and on examining the plant, though warned by the natives to let it alone, himself experienced the headache and convulsions which are its invariable results.—Savannah (Ga.) Cor. Philadelphia Times.

A CONNUBIAL QUARREL.

Two English Birds That Acted in a Singularly Human Way.

In the yard of a Scranton bird student a pair of English sparrows began a few weeks ago to get ready to go to housekeeping. They took up their abode in a little box that was fastened to the top of a pole. Other sparrows undertook to occupy the box, but the pugnacious first comers soon drove them away, and from that time on the plucky pair fixed up their household and got every thing in readiness to raise a family without being disturbed by their apparently envious neighbors.

When the industrious birds were nearly ready to settle down to a quiet married life, an accident happened that caused a row between the pair. One day before the female had begun to sit, her husband flitted away and was gone a good deal longer than usual. During his absence the female busied herself by flying from the nest to the yard and back, adding finishing touches to her household and sprucing things up inside of the box. By and by Mr. Sparrow returned, but he didn't look as neat and natty as he did when he sailed away. In some way he had lost all of his tail feathers while he was gone, and his wife wouldn't have any thing to do with him or let him enter the house. He seemed to try to explain matters to her, but she wouldn't listen to him at all, chirped at him spitefully, and fought him whenever he attempted to approach her.

The student knew that the bobtailed bird was the rightful husband by a peculiar mark on his head, and he watched the result of the family trouble with deep interest. For two days the unhappy husband coaxed and begged his wife to treat him as she had formerly done, but his pleadings made her all the more determined to get rid of him for good. All at once the bobtailed sparrow disappeared, and has never been seen around there since. The female continued to occupy the box, and inside of three days she got another husband, set up housekeeping anew, and in due time hatched out a nest full of little ones.—N. Y. Sun.

Bismarck on Nihilism.

In an interview with the correspondent of the London Daily Telegraph, Prince Bismarck declared that no concession to the Nihilists was possible. Overeducation had led to much dissatisfaction and disappointment in Germany, but in Russia it had led to disaffection and conspiracy. There were ten times as many people educated for the higher walks as there were places to fill. Further education was making pedantic theorists and visionaries, unfit for constitutional government. Referring to the labor question, the Prince ridiculed the idea that workmen would ever be contented, because, he said, the rich are never contented. He spoke strongly against any dictation as to the hours of labor and against the usurping of the rightful authority of parents over their children. He said that Chancellor von Caprivi was a perfect gentleman. He praised Emperor William and said he was hopeful for the future.

The Diet of American Women.

Dr. Hammond says that all American women are underfed, and this is undoubtedly true of a great majority of American women, for they take so much tea and white bread with cake, pie, pickles, condiments and sweets instead of substantial, blood-making food that they are really trying to live on a starvation diet. There are thousands of women who take nothing but a little toast and tea for breakfast, which is next to no food at all.—From lecture by Dr. Kellogg.

GLASS-EYED CITIZENS.

They Are More Numerous Than Is Generally Supposed.

"The best artificial eyes," said a Cincinnati dealer, "are made in Germany, those made in this country wearing out ever so much sooner. Artificial eyes, you must know, are made of glass. The cornea and pupil, of course, have to be colored, and this part of the work can be done better in the old country than in this. The colors are put on and then the substance is glazed over, thus protecting the color. Now, in American glass eyes there is more or less red lead and arsenic. When the acid exuding from the eye touches the glass it has the effect of drawing these substances to the surface and fades the eye. The quality of German glass is very much superior, it being much harder. The approximate wear of the two, as near as our firm has been able to determine, has been from four to six years for German-made eyes against about three months for American eyes."

"How can you match the colors of the eyes of your patients?"

"That is not so very difficult a matter. There are only three principal colors—the blue, gray and dark brown. Of course, there are many varieties of each, from a very light to an extremely dark shade. In ordering an eye the sender states as nearly as possible the color, such as very light blue, or something of that sort. Then we send a number of shades near that color, and in almost every case a shade that suits is picked out. If not, then the nearest one to it is selected and the requisite color is found by that."

"Do glass eyes have to be made to order?"

"No, there is a uniform size of the sockets and the glass eyes will fit any of them. Glass eyes are shaped differently than most people imagine. Many think them to be solid, resting against the matter where the natural eye was formerly, but they are mistaken. The artificial eye is hollow, resembling a shell, only a small fraction of an inch in thickness. They are light and are easily held in place by the lids of the eye. If they were solid, as supposed by many, it would become very painful to wear them. They would rest against the optical nerve and cause inflammation."

"Does not the size of the cornea and pupil of the eye differ in various persons?"

"Very little. The pupil dilates some, but we have no way of meeting that, as we have not yet got to manufacturing dilating eyes. The only difference that we notice is in people upon whom old age is creeping. In their cases, a gray ring forms on the edge of the cornea. In general, on a bright day, the pupil contracts and at night it expands."

"Are there as many as 500 artificial eyes worn in this city?"

"Yes, there are between 500 and 1,000. The general public doesn't know it, because it needs more than a passing glance to tell an artificial eye from a natural one. Then the wearers of glass eyes are naturally sensitive on that point, and they keep quiet about their misfortune. The local wearers are from four years of age almost up to four score. Their eyes cost them all prices. A few years ago the exorbitant price of $100 was charged for eyes. Now the best can be purchased for the modest sum of $10. This reduction is due, not so much to a fall in the cost, as to the falling off in the tendency to bleed a customer, as was done years ago."

"How about the care of glass eyes?"

"Oh, they are easy enough to take care of. All there is to do is to remove them at night and wash them in clear lukewarm water. With good care a pair of German-made eyes will last five years. They are seldom broken, but some people have an extra one on hand in case of accident. This reminds me of a peculiar incident in this respect. One of my customers had an extra eye. He also had a friend who wore a glass eye, and the colors happened to match. No. 2 had the misfortune to lose his artificial optic, and as he happened to be short of funds he applied to his friend for the loan of his extra eye. He actually got it and wore it until fortune smiled on him and he was able to purchase one for himself."—Cincinnati Times-Star.

PERUVIAN COURTSHIP.

It is Exceedingly Proper in Every Respect But Very Expensive.

Peruvian young ladies marry at fourteen, and, like their sisters in the United States, they look with favorable eyes upon a young man who has wealth. If a young man sees a girl who pleases him, he haunts the street where she lives, and if he finds her on the balcony, where she spends half her time, he raises his hat and bows to her.

If she smiles in return, he sees that his advances are accepted and then he applies to her father for an introduction. Even if the father consents he never can meet the young lady alone, but always in the presence of the family.

If he invites her to a concert or theater, he must always invite her mother and all the female members of the family. During the courtship the couple are never left alone, and frequently the father or mother orders the daughter to retire, when the young man has remained long enough.

Every Peruvian must have a godmother and a godfather who officiate at the baptism, at confirmation and at the marriage. The same persons may act in all the instances, or an entirely different set may be elected.

The marriage must inevitably take place in the church, and both parties must go to confession and partake of the communion before the ceremony. Invitations are issued to the gentlemen friends of the contracting parties, who attend the ceremony at the church and afterward the reception at the house, where the only ladies in attendance are the bride and her female relatives.

Each guest is presented with a solid silver medal, made at the mint, with the name of the bride, bridegroom, godfather, godmother, and the date. The medal is prettily tied with a bow of ribbon. After the wedding congratulatory calls are in order, but the bride makes no calls and remains secluded for three months.—Chicago Journal.

LIGHT IN THE WINDOW.

The Pretty Story on Which the Well-Known Song Was Founded.

Few are probably the persons who have not one time or other heard the Sunday-school song, "A Light in the Window." Unless I am mistaken it is founded upon a story told upon the little island of Sylt, but which might easily have its exact counterpart on almost any seashore where a mother's heart beats with yearning love for her sailor son and keeps its fond promise from night to night.

Among the simple fisher folks on the island lived a woman and her son. He was her only child, the pride of her heart as well as the source of constant dread, for the boy loved the sea as his father before had loved it, and nothing gave him so much pleasure as to watch the incoming tide tumble its curling waves over the sands. No sooner was he strong enough to wield an oar and steer a boat than he joined the men in their fishing expeditions.

The mother, with all her fears, and the fate of a long line of sailors in her mind, yet would not have had it otherwise, for it would have been deemed dishonor among the hardy coasters to have kept the boy at home or sent him safely at work for some farmer. Whatever the dangers, they must be faced for the sake of family pride. Had not the boy's grandfather been a captain when he went away the last time? Had not his father sailed his own ship when he went down in a great storm? The child was the last of his race, but he must not dishonor it by tame and cowardly safety on shore. So the boy grew up, tall of his age, straight as a mast, nimble as the fleetest and handiest boat, blue-eyed, fair-haired, true-hearted, a real son of the sea. The fishermen taught him the tricks of his craft until he knew how to sail a boat, splice a rope, or do many little things which a sailor must know. Whenever a ship was in the offing he was soon aboard, learning the rigging and how work was performed upon her. He was a great favorite among the longshore folks and with the sailors, and when at last his thirteenth year came around and he obtained the consent of his mother to go to sea, he easily found a good ship and captain. Then there was parting, and tears shed by the mother, while he looked forward into the great, wide world with all the joyous eagerness of a boy. But with her last blessing the widowed mother promised that every night a light should burn in the seaward window of her cottage to light him homeward and to show him that she still lived, awaiting his return.

The ship sailed. Six months passed and sailors dropped into the village and told how she had been spoken and all was well, and the neighbors came to the cottage and told the pleasant news to the waiting mother, who nightly trimmed the candle, lit it and set it in the window to make a bright path upon the sands. Again six months elapsed and other sailors arrived from far-off lands, but they had no news to tell of the ship. A great storm had happened and she was overdue. She might yet make port, but—and the people shook their heads and carried no tales to the widow, whose candle burned brightly every night and cast long streams of light out upon the sea. Another year passed, but the sailors going or coming brought no news of the ship, and the neighbors whispered apart and shook their heads whenever any one spoke of the widow's son, but no one was cruel enough to cut the tender threads which held the anchor of her hope. And thus the light continued to glow out toward the sea at every gloaming, and burned steadily through every night.

Years came and went. The children who had played with the sailor lad had grown to be men and women, her own head had been silvered with age, her form was bowed, yet no one dare to cut the cables of her hope. Tender words cheered her and tender hands smoothed her way for her as she patiently waited for the home-coming of her fair-haired boy, and every night the glow of her candle streamed out to seaward and told the story of the loving heart waiting at home.

How many years did she watch and wait? I do not know. But one day, at eventide, there was no gleaming patch of light across the sands. The window remained dark, and the accustomed beacon failed the fisher folk, and when they wondered and went to the cottage they found that the mother's soul had gone to seek the son. — Louisville Times.

He Was in No Doubt.

Poots, looking out of the window of his sitting-room, saw a man ascend the steps of his residence whom he didn't wish to receive. To be candid, he was a bill collector. Calling the servant, he bade him tell the man that he (Poots) was not at home.

"Did you tell him I was out?" said Poots, when the servant returned from answering the bell.

"I did, sir."

"Did he appear to be in doubt about it?"

"Not at all, sir; he said it was a blanked lie."—Texas Siftings.

A Business-Eyed Girl.

Timpany (Jeweler)—Say, Bobby, come here and tell me, like a good little boy, if you ever heard your sister, Gwendolin, say any thing about me!

Bobby—Yesterday she said to mamma that it would be a good thing for you if you married her, as then the wedding-ring would cost you nothing and all her friends would buy the presents at your store; and perhaps you might sell them afterward.—Jewelers' Circular.

Willing to Oblige.

Clara's Young Man—Won't you play something for us, Maud?

Maud—What shall it be?

Clara—Oh, any thing you can think of that is appropriate.

Maud—Then I'll play something soft.—Munsey's Weekly.

A Cunning Dog.

A good dog story is always appreciated, because canine sagacity seems inexhaustible in its resources. A Glasgow gentleman owned a very intelligent Newfoundland dog, who accompanied his master wherever he went, and was his inseparable companion in his visits and to church. One evening the gentleman went to visit a neighbor. The dog attended him. It was quite late when the gentleman started for home and, to his surprise, the dog could not be found.

After the family had retired there was a great noise in the kitchen. It was supposed that burglars were robbing the house. Soon there was a crash and a smash like the breaking of a window, and then all was still. The morning revealed the mystery. The dog had fallen asleep under the table. He had realized that his master had gone home, and the noise heard was the attempt of the dog to make his escape. As there was no other way to get out the sagacious animal went through the window, taking the glass and frame with him.

It was a long time before his master visited that house again. When he did, his dog accompanied him, and the animal found his way through the open door of the kitchen to his old hiding place under the table. When the master was about to start for home neither his hat nor cane could be found. After a long search the dog was discovered fast asleep under the table; one paw was on his master's hat, the other resting on his stick. How the dog obtained possession of those articles no one could tell. He remembered his last visit to the place, and how scurvily he had been treated. The sagacious creature resolved not to be left behind next time. He knew that his master could not go home without the hat and stick, and that he would be awakened when the owner got ready to start. His plans were acutely laid, and if he had been human he could not have done better.—Boston Budget.

Buildings in Berlin.

Speaking of symmetry in the building of cities, the people of Berlin, Germany, are quite logical and successful in their methods. In that city uniformity in building is preserved by a municipal law that dictates the height of edifices according to the width of the street. For instance, on a street sixty feet wide the law provides, I think, that houses over four stories in height shall not be erected thereon. On streets eighty feet wide the height is six stories, and on other streets in proportion, thus giving tall houses to wide streets and less altitudinous buildings to narrow streets. I may not have mentioned the exact dimensions of streets and houses, but that is the general plan of the system. By this means great and, I think, attractive uniformity is secured.

Again in Berlin the people cannot build residences or business houses anywhere they please. The city has been built up solidly and compactly simply because the law compelled buildings to be erected adjoining each other either on the south, north, east or west extensions. A cannot build a tall minaret on some isolated lot away from B, but he must, in order to build at all, secure the land adjoining the last house built, in either direction, and when C comes to build he must follow suit. These two provisions of the Berlin municipality law tend to make it the most uniform city in the world.—H. S. Fairchild in St. Paul Pioneer Press.

The Gamelle.

There is a kind of tin mug called the gamelle, in which the French soldier receives his rations, and which he carries on his knapsack. The form is a little peculiar, so as to distinguish it from other ordinary tin mugs. A simple implement which, carried on the backs of French soldiers, has marched so often to victory, and of late to defeat, has at last received its reward in its glorification. When the young Duke of Orleans came before the court, and exclaimed: "I ask for nothing but a gamelle," meaning nothing but the treatment of a common soldier, the public readily seized upon the emblem.

Scarcely three days had elapsed before a great jeweler of the Rue de la Paix had hundreds of "tin mugs" in silver, gold and jewels as pins and badges, which sold immediately as the "tin mug of Orleans," and were worn all over Paris. A popular florist designed a vase in the shape of the "tin mug," and presented the first specimen to the prince, who sent it to his bride, Margaret de Chartres, filled with roses and lilies of the valley. In the meanwhile all Paris is sporting the soldier's tin mug in the tri-color, and the young duke has left a fashionable ornament to remember him by.—New York Ledger.

A Columbus Novel.

We are about to celebrate the four hundredth anniversary of the discovery of the continent by Columbus. Many readers, not aware of the fact, will be glad to know that one of Fenimore Cooper's novels—"Mercedes of Castile"—is a Columbus story. The hero of that romance accompanies Columbus on his venturous enterprise, and a large part of the narrative consists of an account of the voyage, of the discoveries, and all that occurred. At this juncture readers will find it timely and entertaining. The real experiences of Columbus are interwoven with some romantic adventures of the hero, and there is introduced in the story an Indian girl, Ozema, who is probably the most fascinating of all the savage beauties that figure in fiction.—Appleton's.

THE ROSE AND THE FERN.

Lady, life's sweetest lesson would'st thou learn,
Come thou with me to love's enchanted bower;
High overhead the trellised roses burn,
Beneath thy feet behold the feathery fern—
A leaf without a flower.

What though the rose leaves fall? They still are sweet,
And have been lovely in their beauteous prime,
While the bare frond seems ever to repeat,
"For us no bud, no blossom, wakes to greet
The joyous flowering time!"

Heed thou the lesson. Life has leaves to tread
And flowers to cherish; summer round them glows;
Wait not till autumn's fading robes are shed,
But while its petals still are burning red
Gather life's full blown rose!

—Oliver Wendell Holmes in Atlantic

Cost of Electric Lights.

From the list of cities in which lights are supplied by private companies we take the following statement of the number of lamps and annual charge per lamp, where the lighting continues all night and the lamps are of (nominal) 2,000 candle power: Alliance, O., 8 lights at $144; Chattanooga, Tenn., 30 lights at $121.66; Fall River, 50 lights at $180; Portsmouth, N. H., 60 lights at $100; Petersburg, Va., 82 lights at $96; Binghamton, 99 lights at $140; Indianapolis, 100 at $80; Atlanta, Ga., 100 at $120; Boston, 105 at $180; Milwaukee, 130 at $150; Reading, 156 at $146.75; Dayton, O., $200 at $150; Poughkeepsie, 212 at $123; Harrisburg, 270 at $90; Philadelphia, 800 at $177; New Orleans, 11,010 at $130; New York city, 1,357 at $90.

In some of these cities the contract has been made with two or three different companies, but in no such case is there any difference in the charge—in other words, competition does not give lower rates. Let us now give the figures obtained from those cities which own their own electric lighting plants. Huntingdon has 50 lights, $48.64; Decatur, Ill., 52 at $60; Dunkirk, N. Y., 55 at $36.50; Madison, Ind., 85 at $48; Lewiston, Me., 96 at $42; Hannibal, Mo., 96 at $52; Chicago, 292 at $65. Taking an average of the whole of the two tables, from which we have only quoted a portion, we find that the average price paid to private companies is $105.13, and that the same article furnished by the city itself costs $52.12 1-2 per light per year.—Engineering and Building Record.

Praise of the French Peasant.

The common notion of the French peasant as a narrow minded, penurious and not too moral person receives no support from Mr. Frederic Harrison, whose personal study of French rural life has nevertheless been very considerable. The indomitable endurance of the French race has, he reminds us, enabled France to surmount crushing disasters, losses and disappointments under which another race would have sunk. She bears with ease a national debt, the annual charge of which is more than double that of wealthy England, and a taxation nearly double that of England, with almost the same population—a permanent taxation that exceeds 100 francs per head, and is greater than has ever before been borne by any other people. She lost over one war a sum not much short of the whole national debt of England, and she has written off without a murmur a loss of £48,000,000, thrown into the Panama canal. If France is thus strong, the backbone of her strength is, in Mr. Harrison's opinion, found in the marvelous industry and thrift of her peasantry.—London News.

He Was Ready to Be Baptized.

"When I first arrived in New Zealand," said an Anglican bishop, "a Maori chief came to me and said that he wished to be baptized. I knew that he had two wives, so I told him that he must first persuade one of them to return to her family. He said he feared that would be difficult; but that he would see what could be done and come back to me in two months. When he returned he exclaimed: 'Now, missionary, you may baptize me, for I have only one wife.' I asked: 'What have you done with our dear sister, your first wife?' He replied, smacking his lips: 'I have eaten her.'"—San Francisco Argonaut.

A Merciful Man.

Mrs. Simkins has just heard that her husband has been drawn to serve on a jury.

"John Simkins on the criminal jury!" exclaimed Mrs. Simkins. "Well, all I can say is that I congratulate the criminals."

"Why, Mrs. Simkins? Is your husband a very merciful man?"

"Merciful? Why, John Simkins wouldn't hang a pictur', much less a door, unless he was jest made to!"—Montreal Star.

The Sliding Railway of Paris.

The essence of the invention of the "sliding railway," which was the sensation of the Paris exposition, is the substitution of a thin film of water, over which the vehicle slides, for rolling wheels, the film being maintained by hydrostatic pressure, and propulsion by successive jets of water under pressure, acting against a rib of buckets extending under the whole train, thus dispensing with all locomotive power.—Christian at Work.

Gen. Sherman recently set the measure of salt that is to be allowed to war recital when the hero is himself holding forth. He says: "I have met 200,000 men in the last three years on whom turned the fate of the war. When you listen to old soldiers it is well to make good allowance. Ten per cent. is not too little. I do not except myself from that calendar."

A rusty nail is a prized relic in the museum of Houlton (Me.) academy. It is one of the nails used in building the sea wall at Louisburg, is nearly 150 years old, and comes from the center of the struggle which determined whether France or England should control North America.

A letter of Lamb's, in which he said, "I am recovering, God be praised for it, a healthiness of mind something like calmness, but I want more religion," brought $95 at a sale in London.

County Official Paper.

A good solid boom has again visited Los Angeles. This time it is not a craze of gambling in lots of paper towns, but an exchange of the products of the soil for coin. The demand for California fruit in the east has brought vast sums of money to Los Angeles and paid very high profit upon land. Four hundred dollars per acre for prunes and other fruits was not at all uncommon the present season. But if no more than half this price were paid, the profit in fruit raising would still be so great as to make land of great value and vastly increase population and all kinds of business. During the single month of August more mortgages were paid up in Los Angeles County than during the preceding three years. In California there is not the same liability to destruction to the fruit crop by frost as in the east, and the far greater certainty of a crop here, as well as the superior quality of our fruit, ensures continuance and increase of the business. The same fruits that are now enriching the people of Los Angeles can be grown of equal excellence and unlimited quantity in Owens Valley. The time is near when all our surplus fruit can be shipped east as readily as the fruit of Los Angeles. Those who are wise enough to set out fruit trees now and be ready to supply the demand when shipping facility is offered, will reap a rich reward.

California State Agricultural Society Rules to govern running races. National Trotting Association Rules to govern trotting races.

In all exhibits of animals for premiums, other things being equal, blooded stock will be preferred.

All articles included in the above list, except the first department, to be on exhibition at the Pavilion on second day and remain during the Fair.

Special premiums will be allowed for articles exhibited not included in above list

If you have entries to make, attend to it at once, and when your entries are made, see to it that they are on time and at place for examination by the committee.

Accept no rumors in regard to the business of the exhibition. If you do not know what to do, inquire of the officers whose duty it is to tell you. One half of the trouble and disappointment at the Fair is caused by relying on hearsay. Attend to your business yourself. If it is done wrong you know where the blame lies.

Read the rules and be examined at least, assist in enforcing them; but don't forget that mistakes will occur where many people are congregated. The Board endeavors to do justice to all.

If the Superintendents and Committeemen are not always ready at the appointed hour, keep your stock and articles where you can command them at any time. Remember that we have but little time to do much business; patience, with a little system, will overcome many obstacles.

The Board will give the same special attention to details that has contributed to success in the past. It remains for the exhibitors to achieve still better results for the Fair of 1890.

MARRIED.

Parkinson—Buelna—At Keeler, September 10th by Hon. John A. Hannah, Superior Judge, Mr. William Parkinson and Miss Tennie Buelna.

Independence Cornet Band has been engaged to furnish music during fair week.

Furnished sleeping rooms to let during the Fair, at corner of Main & Edwards streets. MRS. S. A. DENSMORE.

At the race track good stable room, hay and grain are provided for all horses. A good boarding house is also provided. Apply at the track to Mr. Jacob Vogt.

William Alcorn was brought up for trial in the Superior Court on Thursday. He plead guilty to forging the name of Frank Fitzgerald and was given two years in San Quentin prison.

The Republicans of Mono have nominated for the Assembly Frank E. Hubewill. This nomination is subject to the action of the Conference Committees of Alpine, Mono and Inyo, the three counties comprising the Assembly District.

Charles E. Sherman of Bakersfield is the Republican nominee for State Senator. Mr. Sherman is a very bright man, aged about forty years, though he does not look much over thirty. He would make an able Senator and Inyo will give a big majority to help elect him.

The Holmes and Mount Diablo mines at Candelaria are reported to be looking first rate. There are large ore bodies in sight in both mines and ore can be taken out faster than the mills at Belleville and Candelaria can work it. Candelaria is reported to be very lively with fine prospects for the future.

The anniversary of Mexican Independence was celebrated at Lone Pine last Tuesday. Mr George H. Palmer delivered a very eloquent speech at sunset, when the flag was hauled down. At night there was a ball attended by a large crowd, visitors being present from Independence and all the south end of the valley.

Some rich ore is being taken out in Beveridge District. Recently J. Stansbury sent down several tons that netted 367 ounces silver per ton. A miner named Jolbusque sent out a lot that paid him 373 ounces per ton. This ore comes from a short distance east of the Keynot mine.

The fair Directors at Bishop made a special race for the Bridgeport horse, "Andy", and the Independence horse, "Fred". The race was trotted on Saturday and was won by the Independence horse in two straight heats. The owners of the horses were entirely satisfied with the treatment given them by the Directors. This was the most closely contested and best race of the meeting.

The men in charge of the project for building the big canal to Salt Wells Valley say matters are now in such shape that there is no doubt the canal will be built. Mr Brooks, the consulting engineer of the Company, expects his assistants here to begin work. A very large force will be employed from the start. This will make lively times in the Valley.

A large party came down from Carson last Friday in a private car. Several of the visitors are from England, and represent parties who propose to buy the East side canal and all the land irrigated by it. This proposed purchase has been the subject of negotiation for some months past. The Englishmen who were here will report to their associates in London, and upon that report final action will probably be taken. It is said that the report will be favorable.

Fixing Precincts

The Supervisors are in session fixing the precincts and various other matters for the coming election. The election law now in force makes so many requirements that some of the more remote precincts may have to be abolished. The Supervisors will be forced to do this unless all the conditions required by law and complied with.

The Mikado

The Mikado will be played at Mairs' Hall on Wednesday evening. The company have made a thorough preparation and will render the opera in good style. When last presented the Mikado was pronounced the best performance of its kind ever given at Independence. It will be better rendered this time than on the former occasion as the company have more experience and have given more time to preparation.

A Wedding Party.

A large party attended the wedding of Mr W. Parkinson and Miss T. Buelna at Keeler. The ceremony was performed at the Lake View Hotel, and soon afterward supper was announced. Landlord Barnes set out a grand spread, and after due justice had been done to the feast, dancing was begun and kept up till five o'clock next morning. This was one of the pleasantest parties ever seen at Keeler.

A Hot Contest Promised

Mr. Childs of Modesto and Mr. S. P. Smith of Bishop are very desirous of trying the merits of their horses at Independence. Pickpocket, the horse owned by Mr. Smith, ran at Independence last year, and is therefore well known here. Mr. Childs is as as confident that his horse can beat Pickpocket, as the owner of the latter is that his horse will win. There is keen rivalry between these horse owners and if the race comes off it will be for blood. Mr. Childs is at the Independence race track with his horse. Mr. Smith in a letter to the Secretary of the fair Association here says that he will be at the track with Pickpocket by Sunday evening. If this race comes off it will be the hottest contest ever witnessed in Inyo County.

DEMOCRATIC CONVENTION.

The Democratic County Convention was called to order yesterday at 10:30 a. m. by E. Robinson, chairman of the County Central Committee. Mr. W. Walker was chosen temporary Chairman and I. H. Mulholland temporary Secretary. The Chair appointed the following committees:

On credentials, J. W. Murphy, Mike Anton and G. P. Bourland.

On permanent organization and order of business, D. Olds, J. Scott Broder and J. Wilson.

On platform and resolutions, W. O Meroney, G. Story and W. L. Hunter.

Sherif Eldred was appointed Sergeant at Arms and the convention adjourned till 2 o'clock p. m. when it again met.

The committee on permanent organization reported in favor of making the temporary Chairman and Secretary permanent officers of the convention.

The committee on platform and resolutions reported, endorsing the principles of economy in public business, fitness of candidates for office and strict adherance to the principles of Democracy.

The committee on credentials reported that credentials had been presented for 39 delegates.

The reports of these commitees were adopted. Chairman Walker in a very neat manner thanked the convention for the honor conferred upon him.

NOMINATIONS.

The first nomination was a candidate for Assemblyman. J. R. Eldred was nominated by acclamation.

For Superior Judge Mr. D. Olds nominated Mr. J. W. P. Laird, and the same was confirmed by acclamation.

For Sheriff A. G. McGee was nominated by D. Olds and Ben. T. Williams was nominated by George Storey. McGee received 15 votes and Williams 23, the latter being declared the nominee.

For County Clerk W. O. Meroney nominated P. H. Mack and W. L. Hunter nominated J. E. Shepherd; Mack received 28 votes and Shepherd 10; Mack was declared the nominee.

An adjournment was taken for 15 minutes and when again called to order G. P. Bourland nominated P. P. Keough for Assessor and Frank Shaw performed a like service for Charles W. Garrettson. Keough received 18 votes, Garrettson 20 and the latter was declared the nominee.

Frank Shaw named J. J. Moore for Treasurer and the nomination was made by acclamation.

For District Attorney A. Dell nominated P. W. Forbes and G. M. Clarke named James Hutchings; Forbes received the nomination by a vote of 22 to 16.

For Superintendent of Schools D. Olds named James E. Reynolds and W. O. Meroney named H. H. Howell. Reynolds received 26 votes and was declared the nominee, Howell receiving 12 votes.

The nomination for County Surveyor was passed.

For Coroner and Public Administrator J. W. Murphy was nominated by acclamation. He attempted to decline but was met with a storm of cheers and he finally bowed under the weight of the honor.

COUNTY CENTRAL COMMITTEE.

On this important committee the following were appointed:

ROUND VALLEY—David Olds and C. H. Parsons.
LINCOLN—George Clarke, J. L. Bourland and John Barlow.
LAWS—R. C. Schively and J. McNally.
COTTONWOOD—Lew. Payson.
BISHOP—Wm. W. Yandell, W. O. Meroney, James Hutchings and David Levy.
SYLVANIA—B. H. Yandell.
POLETA—Geo. Storey.
BIG PINE—Henry McMurry, R. Thomas and R. P. Hessian.
FISH SPRING—James Jones.
INDEPENDENCE—J. J. Gunn, A. W. Eibeshutz, J. W. Murphy, Irv. H. Mulholland and E. Robinson.
GEORGES CREEK—J. E. Shepherd.
LONE PINE—John Lucas, F. P. Meysan and Mike Anton.
KEELER—John Barnes.
CERRO GORDO—J. Hertel.
DARWIN—Jas. A. McKenzie and John Wilson.
LOOKOUT—Frank Fitzgerald.
PANAMINT—H. G. Chickering.
OLANCHA—W. T. Grant.

Frank Shaw was nominated for Supervisor in the First District and E. Robinson in the Third District.

P. W. Forbes, W. O. Meroney and Geo. Storey were appointed delegates to a joint Assemby Convention.

A vote of thanks was tendered the Chairman and three cheers given for the ticket, whereupon the Convention adjourned.

The County Central Committee organized by the election of W. O. Meroney as Chairman and Irv. H. Mulholland as Secretary. Ordered that the Independence members constitute an Executive Committee. Ordered that all meetings of the Central Committee be held at Independence.

Declination.

To the delegates of the Republican County Convention the undersigned tender thanks for being nominated as candidate for the very responsible and honorable position of County Treasurer. Being unsought by me, the nomination is the more highly appreciated and will always be remembered with gratitude. But highly as the honor is valued, I am forced to decline it, as my private business requires all my time and attention and without great injury to this I could not give that careful attention which the duties of the office of Treasurer require. My wish is most sincere for the success of the of the Republican ticket and all the time I can spare from now till election will be devoted to secure that end. Again, Gentlemen of the Convention, permit me to return my most sincere thanks for the honor conferred upon me.

Very Respectfully,
W. F. MATLACK.

For Sale.

The ranch known as the "Rittgers place" near Lone Pine is offered for sale together with the the farming implements and stock. The ranch contains 320 acres of excellent land. The stock consists of thirty head of cattle and twelve brood mares. There is now sixty tons of hay on the place and feed enough to winter 200 head of stock. The winter pasture is rented for five years at $300 a year. The soil is a rich loam and excellently adapted to vegetable raising. There is plenty of outside range, making it a good stock ranch. GRAND
FAIR BALL.
Friday Eve., Sept. 26

REPUBLICAN CONVENTION.

The work of the Republican county convention held at Bishop last week is now known all over the county. The members of the Convention were most earnest in in their efforts to nominate such a ticket as Republicans can heartily support. Where so many candidates sought nominations, and all of them being men well qualified for the several positions, it was inevitable that some must be disappointed. It is safe to say that better material to choose from never was offered to a Republican convention in Inyo County. Every defeated candidate will freely admit that his successful rival is such a man as no one need be ashamed to be beaten by. Two of the nominations were conferred by the convention without peing asked for by the men so honored. In fact neither one of these men was even consulted before their names were offered to the convention. Mr. W. F. Matlack was nominated for Treasurer and C. Mulholland for District Attorney. The former was at Independence when the nomination was made; the latter was a member of the convention, and the first intimation he had that there was any intention of nominating him, was when Mr. John E. Jones, of Round Valley, put his name before the convention. Both men were deeply grateful for the honor conferred in so flattering a manner. Mr. Matlack, to his very deep regret, feels compelled to decline a nomination that was equivalent to an election. Business obligations force him to this conclusion. Mr. Mulholland will stay in the canvass and respectfully asks that his party will endorse the action of the convention. Mr. P. A. Chalfant was the only candidate who is already in office; he was renominated for Assessor by a handsome majority. It is hoped and believed by the members of the late convention that they have given the party such a ticket as merits the support of Republicans.

EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE.

The Executive Committee of the Republican County Central Committee are the following: Wells Barnes, H. P. Cartier, F. McIver, J. C. Roeper, John Lewis and C. Mulholland of Independence. S. A. Chapman, W. T. Bunney, Mark Wattersan, B. H. Yaney, Henry Shirley, B. F. Scott and F. G. Powers of Bishop. A. N. Given was chosen chairman of the County Central Committee and George F. Willis, Secretary; both of Bishop.

CONFERANCE COMMITTEE.

The following were appointed a Conference Committee to meet with like committees from Mono and Alpine Counties and nominate a candidate for the Assembly: A. O. Collins, M. Watterson, H. E. Wright, C. Mulholland and T. Boland. The Convention ordered that the County Central Committee shall add more members to this Committee if it shall be found that the other two counties of the District have appointed commitees on a less ratio of votes than adopted in Inyo County.

SUPERVISORS.

Mr. J. D. Harger was again nominated for Supervisor from the Second District. Mr. Harger is a severe critic of all claims for money presented to the Board. Every matter brought up for consideration is subjected to close examination and unsparing criticism if any flaws are discovered; but for this very reason he is one of the best Supervisors the county ever had. Mr. J. B. Steward, of Big Pine, is the Republican candidate for Supervisor from the Third District. Mr. Steward is one of the oldest settlers in the County, is well aquainted with the needs of the District and if elected will make a careful and competent Supervisor.

OUR GAME OF LIFE.

We each take turns upon an earthly field—
Stand twixt the pitcher Life and catcher Death,
Within our hands the club of Destiny—
Beneath our eager feet the diamond Hope!
High or low ball? Shall the grim catcher, Death,
Laugh at our whizzing of the bat through space,
And Fate, the umpire, call us out on strikes
Before the first base of our youth is gained?
Or shall we touch the goal and laugh to scorn
The quick in-hurling of the well-sent ball?
Suppose we gain the first; a brother comes
And in his hand now lies our weal or woe!
Should he, by lucky chance, so wield the bat
That the good ball shall scar o'er fielders' heads
And lose itself 'midst mustard plant and dock
'Twere most miraculous! And we are wise
If, now, we watch with cool, unblinking eyes
The nearest short-stop, Necessity.

Home runs
But few of us may hope for; if we creep
From base to base and watch each wary chance
We're doing pretty tolerably well
To score on singles even! Lucky we,
If liners fly not swift to fielders' hands
And send us to our durance on the grass,
Where, near by, Captain Cunning coaches men!
The odds are great against us; for the ball
In taking downward curves escapes our sweep
And falls too often in the catcher's hands;
Or spite of all our efforts, is a foul,
And we're caught out!

We ever start to play
The short nine innings of our little lives
With visions of great ball—of many flies
Lost in the ether blue of sunny skies,
And wake to see—a daisy-cutter jump
Low toward the waiting fielder. Circumstance!
Oftimes the bat's too heavy for our hands,
Or far too light for our great, zealous strength;
And though the diamond lures us ever on
The dust we make in scrambling for each base
Fills our poor eyes and blinds us to our fate.
And when we stand erect and see again
The Grand Stand of this vast, terrestrial sphere,
Lo! one fine ball is safe within the hands
Of stern Foreordination at our backs,
And our grim umpire, Fate, calls loudly—
"Out!"

A GREAT ELEPHANT.

A Chapter in the History of Tippo Sahib, the Man Killer.

He Takes a Round or Two Out of a Big Raft Just to Show How Stubborn and Ugly He Can Be—His End.

"READING the stories about elephants in the Sun," said Billy Manson, an old circus man, "put me in mind of an exciting and funny experience we had once with famous old Tippo Sahib, one of the biggest and ugliest elephants ever exhibited in this county. At the time I speak of this elephant was traveling with the Van Amburgh show, which was a celebrated one fifteen or twenty years ago. Old Tip, as we called him, was a chronic kicker, and stood no fooling from any one. His trainer had to be constantly on his guard, for the elephant had disposed of one or two gentlemen whose confidence in their pluck and ability to handle Tippo had led them to take charge of him, and he was plainly keeping his eye out for an opportunity to add another one to his score. Old Tip never passed a day without doing something to keep up his record as a pachyderm of strong individuality of character, and the incident I am going to relate was one sufficient in itself alone to mark this elephant as a beast with ideas of his own and a will mighty enough to carry them into execution, no matter what the consequences might be to himself or to others.

"We had been giving a day and night's show at Port Jervis, and the next day were to astonish the natives of Pike County, Pa., by pitching our tents at Milford, the county seat, seven miles below Port Jervis. To get to Milford we had to cross the Delaware river at Port Jervis. At that time the bridge across the stream there was reported to be in a decidedly shaky and dangerous condition; in fact, it fell down two or three days after we were in Port Jervis, and the managers of the show concluded not to trust ponderous Old Tip on the structure. The river was fordable a quarter of a mile or so below the bridge, and the elephant was taken to that spot to wade across. The time was early in the morning, and when Tippo Sahib got to the river bank he made the grand kick of his life and refused to go any further. He swung his trunk around viciously and threateningly, flapped his big ears, kinked his tail and roared and worked himself into a first-class rage. His keeper coaxed and prodded and prodded and coaxed the old man killer for more than an hour without succeeding in inducing him to advance a step, and then concluded to risk the bridge. Tippo seemed to divine his keeper's intention, and then his contrary spirit came uppermost. He immediately made a rush for the river and started for the Pennsylvania shore at such a rate that he almost drowned the keeper with the water he splashed upon him. He was mad all through. The bottom of the river was rough and stony and the uncertain footing added to Old Tip's fury. The river was at what they called a rafting freshet. The elephant had got about half way across the stream, trumpeting savagely and deluging himself and all around him with showers of water, when suddenly a raft hove in sight above the ford. It bore immediately down with its unsuspecting crew toward Tippo Sahib and his mounted escort. The ugly brute saw the strange-looking object approaching and he stopped and gazed at it with angry surprise. Tippo had traveled a bit in his day and seen a great many curious things, but he had never seen a raft before. He was in a fighting mood and seemed to think that a raft of logs was about the thing for him to tackle just then. Waving his trunk and giving a trumpet blast that made the hills around there more than echo, he turned his enormous front upstream and awaited the charge of the raft. Tippo's keeper was in a canoe, which a local oarsman was piloting across for him, and he sank his prod in the big beast with all his might and at every vulnerable spot he could reach in efforts to start the belligerent elephant ahead and out of the rafting channel. The only result was to increase Old Tip's fury, if that were possible, and to fix him in his determination to have a round with the audacious raft.

"Before the men on the raft discovered and understood the situation the raft had made half the distance between the bridge and the ford. As soon as the nature of this most unusual obstruction in the channel became apparent to them they were terror stricken. There wasn't a man among them, from all accounts, who hadn't had more than one hand-to-hand fight with bear in the lumber woods, and looked upon that as child's play; but they drew the line at elephants, and each man bent himself to his oar and pulled as he had never pulled before to steer the raft away from its direct course in the channel, and avoid the dreaded collision that was otherwise inevitable. But it was too late, and all their work was in vain. When the crew saw that they were sure to bring up against the big, mad, roaring elephant, every one of them, from the pilot down, gave up the ship, jumped into the river, and struck out in a wild and helter-skelter race for the New York shore. The deserted raft rushed helplessly on. Old Tip never moved from his tracks. His fury was a sight to see.

"The raft was made of hemlock logs, and was at least one hundred feet long and forty wide. The water was swift, and so deep where Tip stood that it reached above his belly. Although it was early in the morning, crowds of people had gathered on both sides of the river to witness the novel sight of an elephant fording the stream. When they saw Old Tip stop in the deepest part and wait for the raft, and resist all efforts to get him out of the way, the people grew wild with excitement. Every one, including the circus people, expected to see the elephant, enormous as he was, carried away, and done up in great shape by the raft, and his owner couldn't have insured Old Tip's life just then for five dollars. But the ugly old brute came out strong. If he had had a sure footing on the river bottom, there is no telling what he wouldn't have done with the raft.

"But as it was when the shock came the raft trembled and snapped, and its speed was greatly diminished. The big elephant couldn't hold its footing on the slippery stones, and the heavy raft in the swift current carried him with it down stream. Old Tip didn't move down as if he had to, but as if he was feeling for a secure foothold, so that he could get his work in on his assailant and wreck it to pieces, there and then. He did get a foothold now and then, but only a temporary one. Every time he stopped, though, he lessened the speed of the raft until its momentum was so much overcome that the hind end of the raft began to swing with the force of the current. When this began the swift water soon carried the hind end around until it had become the front end, and the raft ran away from Tippo diagonally toward the New York shore. The elephant gazed after it as if in triumph, and raised his trunk and trumpeted loudly. Once he seemed to have made up his mind to pursue his defeated foe, and took a few steps forward. But he evidently reconsidered that motion, and, stopping in the middle of the rapids, stood there trumpeting and throwing water around like a whole fire department.

"The raft, thrown as it was out of the rafting channel, ran perhaps a hundred yards, where it was cast upon a rocky reef that formed the river bed in part of the channel. The logs flew in all directions, and the raft was made about as complete a wreck as one would care to see. At sight of that Old Tip gave a roar that a deaf man might have heard a mile away. The boatman who had charge of Tippo's keeper had rowed wildly to the Pennsylvania shore with the keeper, in spite of the latter's protests, the moment the collision between the raft and the elephant had become a sure thing. When the raft ran on the rocks the keeper induced the native to row him back to where the elephant stood, sounding blasts of victory in his trumpet. Old Tip seemed to be entirely satisfied. He had spent his fury on the raft and felt better. He turned obediently at his keeper's order and resumed his march to Pennsylvania as docile as if nothing had occurred that morning to disturb his temper in the least.

"On reaching the shore the keeper made a halt to see whether the old terror had received any injury in the combat. There wasn't the sign of even a scratch upon him. While they stood on the bank, however, another raft was seen coming down just below the bridge. The men on that raft had seen the latter part of the misunderstanding between Old Tip and the raft ahead of them, and had been pulling with all their might to run their raft to the New York shore. When the elephant went out of the water so meekly, though, they had concluded that the danger was over, and they rested on their oars, content to pass on. Tippo did not see this raft until it had run down to a point almost even with the spot where he was standing. Then he caught sight of it. He gazed at it for a second or two in amazement. It was as if he were saying:

"'What! Another one want some o' me?'

"Then he raised his trunk, gave a bellow that made every thing rattle, and charged down the bank for the river again. The men on the raft didn't wait for subsequent proceedings, but jumped into the water and never looked back until they were safely landed high and dry on the New York shore. The deserted raft sped on. Tippo's keeper flew around like a crazy man to stop the charge of the elephant, so suddenly enraged again, but if Old Tip hadn't apparently made up his mind, after reaching the water's edge, that the raft was too big a coward for him to bother with, and that he could give vent to his feelings sufficiently by hurling defiant and derisive roars at it, the keeper couldn't have kept him back any more than he could have stopped a cyclone.

"The second raft ran on the rocks some distance below and was wrecked, and Tippo didn't raise another objection to proceeding on his journey. In fact, he was in rather a jolly mood all the way to Milford, and so thoroughly was he pleased with his work that day that his keeper had no trouble with him for a week afterward. All that season when Old Tip got on his ear and wanted to smash things, his keeper would say:

HE RAISED HIS TRUNK.

"'I wish we could run the old man into a river somewhere and give him another round or two with a raft.'

"But the proprietors of the show didn't wish for any thing of that kind. It took all the profits of the show for a town or two to pay for Old Tip's wrecking of the two rafts, and I don't know how much for damage claimed by the panic-stricken crew. I left the show that season, but, if I remember correctly, Old Tip subsequently succeeded in killing that same keeper, and then was killed himself. But he was a great old elephant, all the same."—N. COMPLETE SELF-CONTROL.

One of the Fundamental Qualities in Any Large and High Success.

There are few qualities which lie so directly within the reach of every man and woman, because so immediately the result of education, as self-control; and yet there are few qualities which are so generally lacking. Everybody has a certain amount of self-control, but there are many people who compensate themselves for the repression of their energies on one side by giving them full play on another. Self-control means the entire mastery of one's nature; means always having in hand all one's powers; means sitting on the box and driving instead of being driven. The absence of self-control is seen in many small ways: In the unconscious rising of the tones of voice in earnest talking; in purely nervous gesticulation and restlessness; in the inability to drop a subject when we have gotten through with it; in irritability, and that subdued violence shown, not in outbursts of temper, but in little gusts of passion escaping here and there. These are small things in themselves, but many of them are exceedingly irritating and disagreeable, and they all involve a really serious result—a loss of nervous force. The heightened tone of the voice, the incessant gesticulation, the physical restlessness, are not only unpleasant, but they involve just so much needless expenditure of a force of which few of us possess a superabundance. Complete self-control is one of the fundamental qualities in any large and high success; for complete self-control means that one has one's self completely in hand and is able to address one's self exclusively to whatever is necessary to be done at the moment. It is a great mistake to infer power from any kind of violence or restlessness. True power is allied with composure, with calmness, with self-restraint; and real power is manifested in restraint and composure and not in violence of speech or action. A man of nervous organization recently said that he had gained immense benefit by simply watching the modulations of his voice and persistently resisting the inclination to run into high tones. He had found not only relief for the vocal chords, but a steadiness and calmness of thought and feeling which made him conscious of the great blunder of wasting nervous strength by suffering the vocal chords to sympathize with an excited condition rather than keeping them under steady control. This is one illustration of the possibility of overcoming the common forms of nervousness. To "let one's self go" is not only to lose force at a particular point, but to invite a reaction along the whole line of physical expression, and so to continually stir up and agitate, instead of continually restraining and calming. There are a great many people who lay these minor faults on the shoulders of a nervous temperament, and who do not know that a nervous temperament, under control, is a tremendous force, and that it is just as susceptible of being governed by the will as the grosser appetites or passions.

—In mailing the first half of his manuscript of "Darkest Africa" from Cairo to the Scribners, Stanley wrote: "When it is done, not Vanderbilt's wealth would induce me to write upon the subject at length again.

—The literary production of Mexico is quite wonderful. One of her latest bibliographical lists mentions no less than 12,000 volumns by 3,000 native Mexican authors. The first book printed on this continent was published in Mexico.

—Count Muster, the present German Ambassador at Paris, is the author of one of the best cook books of the day. A sarcastic colleague once said of him: "He is the best cook among the diplomatists, and the best diplomatist among the cooks."

—It is reported in Boston that Edward Bellamy wrote "Looking Backward" as a satire on Socialism, and was the most astonished man in the country when thousands of people took it seriously and set him up on a pedestal as the prophet of a new era.

—Rose Hartwick Thorpe says that her earliest recollections are of writing little rhymes on scraps of ribbon paper. When she was a little older she hoarded every penny in order to buy sheets of foolscap, on which to write her effusions.

—Miss May Rogers, of Dubuque, Ia., is the author of a "Waverly Dictionary," in which the 1,300 or more characters in Sir Walter Scott's novels are are all described, with illustrative extracts from the text. The book is said to be a complete key to Scott's works.

—The only unmutilated copy of the Century that gets into Russia is the one the Czar personally reads each month. In all others Kennan's articles are smeared over by the Russian postal authorities with some black stuff of a very penetrating nature which it is quite impossible to remove, even through a chemical process, without destroying the printing. Even where only Kennan's name appears the same smearing tactics are applied.

A SUFFERER RELIEVED AFTER DOCTORING FOR TEN YEARS.—FACTS CONVINCE THE PUBLIC.

MARCH 8th, 1890.

Manufacturers of the Great Sierra Kidney and Liver Cure:

GENTLEMEN:—The gratitude I feel towards you I cannot express in these few words. I have been troubled in the past ten years with kidney disorders. I did not know in that time what it was to enjoy a full night's rest. I started in to try your Great Sierra Kidney and Liver Cure. I have given it a fair trial, my rest has returned, I am much improved in every way. Your remedy is just as you represent it a delightful and effective one.

Very truly yours,
C. H. NORTON,
Carpenter and Builder,
616 California St., San Francisco, Cala.

Let others see Christ in you, moving, doing, speaking and thinking. Your actions will speak of him if he be in you.

TAKE CARE! THERE IS DANGER

In allowing inactivity of the kidneys to grow through neglect. The deadly shoals of Bright's disease and diabetes will wreck the goodly bark of health if it is allowed to drift rudderless upon them. The bladder, too, if inactive, and judicious medication does not speedily direct the helm toward the port of safety, will be whelmed by the quicksand of disease. In selecting a diuretic, let your choice fall upon Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, which stimulates the renal organs without irritating and exciting them, two effects to be apprehended from the unmedicated stimuli largely resorted to. These have a tendency to react prejudicially. The Bitters invigorate the kidneys and bladder, in common with the nerves and the digestive organs, and so afford lasting aid. It also affords dual assistance in preventing and curing intermittent and remittant fever. Biliousness, constipation and rheumatism it also subjugates.

Representative Hermann says Superintendent Porter gave the population of Oregon to him as 305,000, instead of 262,000, as stated in the press dispatches. With the population at 305,000 the increase would be 72 per cent.

The mill men at Fall River, Mass., believe that one week's shut-down will be insufficient to relieve the overloaded cloth market, and that two or three may be necessary to accomplish the results desired. It is understood that eighteen factories will close next Saturday.

MR. HUGGARD'S STROKE OF FORTUNE.

The prosperity which recently came to Joseph Huggard in the shape of a $5,000 prize in the Louisiana State Lottery has not in the slightest degree turned the fortunate recipient's head. He still carries on his peddling in the little shop at No. 51 John Street, which he has conducted all alone for several years and proposes to keep right along as formerly instead of giving up his old occupation or attempting to splurge in any direction. He was busily employed about his work when the writer called upon him to day. "There isn't much of a story to tell," said he when asked about his stroke of good luck. "My ticket was a one fortieth of No. 59 881 which won the $5,000 prize in the last drawing and my share was $150.00. I forwarded the ticket to New Orleans for collection by the Adams Express Company, and a check for the amount came back promptly. It makes me comfortably well off and I am satisfied and rejoiced, although I have no idea of allowing my good luck to run away with my senses."

Mr. Huggard said the lucky ticket was the twelfth he had bought, having begun an investment of a dollar monthly in a lottery at the suggestion of a friend who put in the same amount. It was agreed that they should share whatever winnings came to either, but after keeping up the arrangement for eleven months the friend weakened and declined to go in the twelfth. "This turned out so much the better for me," continued Mr. Huggard. "I am still investing $1 a month in the lottery, and will keep on doing so as it certainly won't break me even if I win nothing more. I have never gambled previously, nor previously indulged in any speculation in my life."—Bridgeport (Conn.) Farmer, July 11.

SYMPTOMS OF CONSUMPTION.

WILLIAM J. SHARPLES, PORT ORAM, MORRIS CO., N. J., writes:

"My business is that of sharpening mine drills and I am much exposed to smoke and gas. About three years ago I began to have a bad cough, with considerable indigestion and pains in my chest. My physician told me I had symptoms of consumption. By the advice of my father, an old friend of BRANDRETH'S PILLS, I commenced using that valuable remedy. By the time I had got through the second box I began to pass a very disagreeable humor or pus. I began to improve very rapidly after this, and grew stronger and better every day. My cough is now well. I sleep well at night and have no more indigestion.

Right On To Him.

"Brakeman!" roared the fat passenger, "can't you open this infernal window?"

"I can raise the sash, if that is what you mean, sir," replied the brakeman, frigidly.

"Do so," begged the fat passenger in growling tones, "and I will translate for you that exquisite passage from Browning, beginning:

"Not twice more deeper than the higher hoists
Its deepest height;
Yet here, nor there, nor here, nor there, nor anywhere else."

—Burdette in Brooklyn Eagle.

A Cruel Request.

Mr. Dering (presuming on an ephemeral acquaintance)—May I have the pleasure of the next waltz?

Miss Grandkannon—You certainly may, Mr. Dering, but as I've got my fan and vinaigrette to carry, won't you run out and put on a shawl strap, please?—Tid Bits.

Not Such a Hard Bargain.

Not long since a party of young men went from Boston to a country town down in Maine for a few days' fishing. They had a full outfit of "tackle" and "gear," and upon arrival at their destination stood in need of but one thing—bait. After consulting their local adviser they secured the services of an ancient resident, who started out to dig the needed worms. He was gone three or four hours, but to good purpose, for when he returned he had a water bucket even full of a wriggling mass of earthworms. Now this was more than the boys had bargained for, and thoughts of what such an unheard of wealth of bait would cost began to trouble them. To end their suspense they appointed one of their number spokesman, with plenary powers, but with instructions to make the best bargain possible. "How much do we owe you?" he asked, approaching the venerable bait digger and taking out his wallet. "Well, I don't rightly know," rejoined the old man, "the ground is kinder solid and the worms is fur down, and it's been hard on my back to dig 'em. But I've half a notion to go fishin' myself to-morrow, and if you'll give me half the bait we'll call it square."—Boston Herald.

He Was No Fool.

Jepson—I notice that you always speak well of me to my face, Jobson, and while I have no reason to believe that you do otherwise behind my back I think it does not harm a man to be criticised by his friends, to be told his little faults. I know I'm not perfect and I would be glad to have you remind me of the fact sometimes.

Jobson—Tell you of your faults?

Jep.—Yes, criticise me, tell me what your honest private opinion of me is. That's what I want.

Job.—Jepson, you are six feet two and I am five feet four, and you want me to give you my honest private opinion of you? No siree. Jobson, my boy, I'm no fool.—Boston Courier.

Couldn't Hurt It Much.

He went to a Richmond hotel and modestly called for beefsteak. When it came he tinkered at it for ten minutes, and then he said:

"Waiter."

"Sah?"

"What is this?"

"Beefsteak, sah."

"Thank you. Do guests usually try to cut them?"

"Reckon dey do, sah, unless dey got right smart moufs."

"Yes. Well, I haven't. I'm from New York. You take that steak back to the cook, waiter, and tell him I haven't hurt it any. I've only bent it a little."—Chicago Tribune.

His Destiny.

"Quimby, your boy is a remarkable runner. I saw him beat some of the fastest men in town yesterday. Are you having him trained?"

"Yes."

"Going to make a professional of him, eh?"

"That's what my intention is."

"Well, he'll make a record as a sprinter yet."

"Not if I know it."

"Why not?"

"I'm educating him to be a prize fighter."—Nebraska State Journal.

Family Pride.

Grocer—You say that your wife, Uncle Rastus, supports the family by taking in washing?

Uncle Rastus—Yes, sah.

Grocer—Well, don't you feel a little ashamed at times?

Uncle Rastus—'Shamed? No, sah; dere's nothin' degradin' 'bout takin' in washin'. I se proud ob de ole 'ooman.—New York Sun.

Shop Keeping in Paris.

French Girl—Papa, a man who looks like an American is observing those gloves in the window. What shall I ask for them?

Shopkeeper—Twenty dollars.

Man (entering)—How much?

Girl—Twenty dollars.

Man—Sac-r-r-r!

Shopkeeper—Forty cents, M'sieur.—Omaha World.

A Humiliating Position.

Visitor (to convict)—What are you in for, my friend?

Convict—Bank burglary, sir.

Visitor—I suppose you must find your present position very humiliating.

Convict—Yes, very. When we march to meals, sir, I'm always sandwiched in between two aldermen boodlers.—The Epoch.

More Interesting Matter.

Subscriber (to editor)—I don't see anything in your paper today about the heroic act of Smith, who saved the life of Brown at the risk of his own.

Editor—No; it was crowded out to make room for an account of the cowardly manner in which Jones took the life of Robinson.—Life.

An Unkind Cut.

Minister's Wife (Sunday morning)—Is it possible, my dear, that after all you have said about Sunday newspapers, you are reading one?

Minister (very much hurt)—You ought to know me better than that, Maria; this is last evening's paper.—The Epoch.

THE MOT-MOT'S TAIL.

A Noticeable Feature in the Make-Up of a Very Queer Bird.

At the present time a bird of more than ordinary interest is to be seen in this house, which, though not "new to the collection," will certainly be new to a very large majority of the present visitors to the Zoo, as it is a very long time—how long we can not say with certainty, but at least twenty years—since the last specimen died there. The bird in question is a mot-mot, presented about a week since, and is to be seen in the large cage nearest to the keeper's room. It has not yet been labeled, but is, we believe, Momotus brasiliensis. It is an extremely striking though not very brilliantly colored bird, about the size of a jay, with a long tail; its brightest color, a most beautiful blue, forms a band round the crown of its head, which is black, and there are smaller patches on its cheeks; it has a bold, bright eye, the iris of which is red. Its tail, however, is without doubt its most noticeable feature, not so much from its length and color as from the extraordinary habit the bird possesses, especially, it would seem, when excited, of swinging it from side to side after the manner and with the regularity of the pendulum of a clock, occasionally varying the monotony of the proceeding by jerking it straight up over its back—an odd habit, calculated to attract the attention of the least observant.

The mot-mot's tail has the further peculiarity that the two middle feathers, which are longer than the other's, are racket-shaped at the end—that is to say, that for about an inch the feather is perfect, and then for another inch, or rather more, the shaft is entirely denuded of web. This peculiarity has given rise to some controversy, one side contending that it is natural, while the other avers that it is artificial, being caused by the bird itself. Waterton first drew attention to the fact that the bird acted as its own barber, and described the process as follows: "This bird (the mot-mot, or houtou as he called it) seems to suppose that its beauty can be increased by trimming the tail, which undergoes the same operation as one's hair in a barber's shop, only with this difference, that it uses its own beak, which is serrated, in lieu of a pair of scissors. As soon as its tail is full grown it begins about an inch from the extremity of the two longest feathers in it, making a gap about an inch long. Both male and female adonise their tails in this manner, which gives them a remarkable appearance among other birds. While we consider the tail of the houtou blemished and defective, were he to come among us he would probably consider our heads, cropped and bald, in no better light."—Saturday Review.

SHOOTING TIGERS.

Twenty-three Man-Eaters Killed By Three Men Within Three Weeks.

It was my good fortune to be able to shoot many tigers in Eastern Bengal, sometimes single handed, but preferably with one or more companions. I never came to grief, or had any native with me injured by a tiger, but there is always the chance of an accident when playing with edge-tools. I was almost invariably in company with experienced men and good shots. But some men are excitable, however experienced. One day, as we were starting after a notorious tiger, the wife of my companion implored me not to let her husband get off his elephant till the tiger was dead. I thought little of her words at the moment; but, by and by, after rather a scrimmage, I had stopped the tiger with a shot through his back that paralyzed him so that he could not rise. As he lay glaring at me with his terrible big green eyes I was horrified to see my companion running up to the tiger on foot, for he had jumped down from his elephant on seeing the tiger fall. Luckily I had a spare barrel, with which I put a bullet through the tiger's head at once, and his eyes ceased to glare.

It was my good luck with two friends to get twenty-three tigers in one expedition of three weeks on the Berhampooter churs, but we had to work very hard indeed for it. I merely mention this to justify myself in writing about the wild tiger. From the security of the howdah I have seen him in almost every position, usually sneaking off, trying to hide himself, but sometimes charging and fighting for his life. The pictures of sporting incidents are often exaggerated, and so are the descriptions of them. The tiger is usually an unwilling combatant and seldom fights except in despair. On more than one occasion it seemed as if the tiger thought the elephants were only big cows, and that they could be easily frightened or killed. In Eastern Bengal a man-eating tiger is seldom found. But if a tiger has once, by chance or intention, killed a human being he finds the human neck so fragile and the human being so incapable of resistance that he is less disposed to take the trouble to kill the deer or cattle, who in their death struggles may hurt him with their sharp horns and hoofs. Nor is a man-eating tiger always old and mangy, as some writers have said. The finest and cleanest tigress that I ever shot had been killing human beings for some little time before the news of her ravages reached me.—Longman's Magazine.

Not True That He Never Worked.

Lady (giving tramp a luncheon)—I ought not to give you this. I suppose you never work.

Tramp—You are mistaken, madam. I work hard every day.

Lady—What do you do?

Tramp—It's hard work getting meals for nothing, I tell you.—Lippincott's.

ELEVATOR ETIQUETTE.

Human Hogs Who Seem to Be Without the Pale of the Law.

The manners displayed by people on our elevators are so striking that I should like to discourse of them. I should like to discourse of them very much, indeed. But the lack of manners is so much more striking as to demand exclusive attention.

Those weak-minded men, who bring cigarettes or assafœtida into elevator cars, are certainly without the pale of the law.

Milder offenders are those who bring in an odor of chronic alcoholism. Apparently there are some men so unfortunate that they can not drink any thing without its going straight to their breath. These men deserve our pity; but they ought to be made to enter buildings by the fire-escape.

There are imbecile people, though I do not know that their intentions are evil, who get off excitedly at every landing where the door is opened, and look about like startled fawns. The elevator-boy has to win them back into the lift with gentle words. After they have arrived at the top, ingenious and kindly questioning usually discovers the fact that they are in the wrong building.

Business men—those men so fortunate as to have not only intelligence but opportunity for using it—are seldom so lacking in charity to their inferiors as to demand that dudes shall not ride in an elevator with them. But they certainly have just cause to complain to the owner of the building when the dude is one who turns to the mirror, and affects to regard his image with favor.

When there is a crowd waiting to take the elevator, a woman comes to the door, and advises with the elevator-boy confidentially, critically and in detail concerning a number of matters foreign to the affairs of the impatient crowd. In general, she uses an easy, ambling voice, but occasionally she takes the elevator-boy up very shortly. She places her arms across the elevator door in order that she may not be unwarrantably disturbed by people entering the car. When she has completed her inquiries several times, she observes:

"Ah, as I supposed."

There are some capitalists worth $400, who have become so used to regarding people as their slaves that they make nothing of keeping a car of serfs waiting, while they complete some momentous commercial conversation. When finally they enter, they seem to say:

"I am now ready; you may proceed."

But the prime offender is still another. There is a tendency of apoplexy in my family, and I can speak of him only with the greatest caution. He is the genial, whole-souled gentleman, usually a corpulent brute, who, having entered a car, persists in remaining near the door where all who come in must crush by him. This erring person is going to the top to see some obscure tenant under the back rafters, and the hideous malefactor takes a venomous satisfaction—a foolish but innocent delight—in knowing that all who crush by him coming in must also crush by him going out—the poisonous, hunch-backed toad.

But the variety of clowns and felons whom I could mention is endless. I once started in to make a catalogue of all the ill-mannered people of this city who ride on elevators, but I learned with keen relief that the city directory was engaged in getting the same names.

If it were only the small, spiritless men who transgress against good manners, I could advise forthwith how to remedy the evil. But when I see how many "tall, disagreeable scoundrels" there are who offend, I am the first to admit that the subject is one demanding mature thought.

There is no reason, however, why we should not begin at once with the little men. They should be forcibly and fearlessly taught a salutary lesson in etiquette. May be the large men, when they had seen how we regard bad manners, would feel ashamed of themselves.—Williston Fish, in Puck.

THE HUMAN FAMILY.

One-Fourth of Its Members Die Before Reaching the Age of Fifteen.

There are about 1,500,000,000 inhabitants on the globe. Of these 33,033,033 die every year. There are 3,064 languages and over 1,000 religions professed by the people. The number of males and females is about equal and their average life is about 33 years; one-fourth of the inhabitants die before they reach their fifteenth year. Rarely one reaches the age of 100 years; to every 100 only six reach the age of 65 and not more than one in 500 lives to see the eightieth year; 33,033,033 dying every year makes a grand total of 91,824 per day, 3,730 per hour, 60 a minute or one every time the clock ticks! Married persons live longer than single ones, and the tall have a better chance for long life than those short of stature. Women have more chances of life in their favor previous to 50 years of age than men have, but fewer afterwards. The number of marriages is in proportion of 75 to every 1,000 individuals born; the time when the greatest number of marriages take place is in June and December—about the time of the summer and winter solstices. Dark-haired persons have a better chance in the great struggle for existance than those of the opposite complexion, except in contagious diseases, where blondes are comparatively exempt. A person born in hot weather stands the heat a great deal better than one born in the cold months of winter; of course the rule works vice versa. Those born in the spring are usually of a more robust constitution than if born at any other time of the year. Births are more frequent by night than by day, also deaths.—St. Louis Republic.

—At Fort Madison, Iowa, reside probably the oldest twins in the United States—Mrs. Elizabeth Grescom Campton and Mrs. Sophia B. Hildebrandt. They were born in Baltimore, January, 1806, and they are consequently over eighty-four years of age. They are very spry old ladies, and still very skillful at fine needle work. Their grandmother, Mrs. Betty Rose, made the first American flag.

FASHION PROPHECIES.

Novelties in Dress Goods and Colors For Autumn and Winter.

One color cheviots and cloths will be worn in combination with suitable colored velvet, the latter being used for the waist, the sleeves or for a trimming. All the fashionable winter colors will be represented in these combinations. Dark myrtle green cactus, scarabee brown with reddish reflex, brown mastic which resembles golden brown, chocolate brown and hazelnut brown are the leading colors. The more showy colors among the favorites are amaranth red, violet red, dahlia and the blues, which will be leaders next winter and which includes the purely hussar blue, turquoise blue and gray blue. Violets are not missing, but these shades are more appropriate for the drawing room than for the street. These colors are all combined with a suitable color of velvet.

Cheviots are seen in all the shades named, and one color fabrics will be favorites, although fancies will have many friends. Fancy Scotch cheviots are seen in black, gray and white, red, drap and white; heliotrope, brown and drap; gobelin blue, white and red, etc. Large squares on a small square ground are also seen. Squares, however, are far from monopolizing all attention and other novelties are also attracting notice. The new, rough, half finish cloths are among these, color mixtures being seen on light and dark ground, the color mixture rendered airy-looking by means of a network of white wool threads which cover the colored ground, giving a very pleasing effect. The same style is seen covered with stripes or large blocks in silk, while Knickerbocker stripes will be one of the features next fall, and will be seen on all kind of wool dress goods.

Other favored styles in the fall and winter samples are the woven Eiffel lace stripes, which are seen in black or white on plain one color grounds of rose, gray, green or light brown. For more stylish dresses is shown a one color wool stuff with suitable panels and corners in silk, the latticed border being the favorite. This net-like border is darker than the ground color, such as red on old rose, dark blue on light blue. On violet and other dark grounds the netting is made in the same color, the effect being obtained by the brilliancy of the silk.

Among plain goods vigognes deserves mention. These are like Indian cachemires, but do not have the hairy look of the latter. These real Indian cachemires have fine stripes in the color of the ground. Other vigognes goods which have a more woolly finish will be also extensively worn.

Foulard silks, pongees and silk batistes are now having a good run. The simple but tasty foulard styles show plain or fancy stripes, under which the small atlas-like woven white stripes on bluish gray, lilac or old rose ground look well. The large design foulards are more elegant, but not so dressy; the designs reproduce flowers and small fruits on violet, green, grayish-red or blue grounds, a very pretty sample showing on a marine blue ground flower stripes of cherry flowers, between which are stripes with ripe cherries still attached to the tree.—Dry Goods Economist.

IRISH COUNTRY LIFE.

The Most Enjoyable Existence a Man of Leisure Can Lead.

On the whole, the Scotch and Irish are more pleasant, particularly to a sportsman; the English more dignified, or, I might say, magnificent, on account of the size and appointments of the mansions, and the old historical surroundings. A great Irish house is more homely and genial. The host and hostess generally talk better; they put more stress upon their out-of-door appointments; they have better, or rather more interesting, gardens; better-bred horses, and are readier to put them at your disposal. The Irish country house is more natural. If you have not had early breakfast ordered, and arranged overnight for an early start, you come down to breakfast any hour you like within reasonable limits (9-10:30). You will generally find two or three little tables ready, various hot things at the fire, cold things on the sideboard. You will find three or four people at breakfast, others gone, some not down. The servants only come when summoned. Every body walks round and helps himself. You are asked at breakfast what you would like to do. Will you fish, or shoot, or hunt, or drive, according to the season, and the professed object of your visit? You are asked what shall be sent out with you for lunch. You will be sent in a dog cart or other carriage, and some of the guests, or the host, will accompany you. If you are a real sportsman, you will work as hard all day as if you depended upon it for your dinner, and, indeed, in one sense you do, for you will gain an appetite worth a dinner by itself. You bring your own guns, rods, horses, etc., if you come for the purpose of sport; if you are a fashionable man, you bring your own servant. But if any sudden chance arises, if you happen to come unprepared, there is always some means of fixing you up for a day's enjoyment. In this way you come to know the neighborhood as only sportsmen can know it; you will study the hills, the woods, the pools in the river with a deeper interest than mere curiosity, when you know that your success depends upon understanding these things.—J. P. Mahaffy, M. A., in Chautauquan.

—We would not seem to imply that all who make speeches are thereunto impelled by the fatal gift of gab; not a few are unwilling victims to the popular delusion that life without speech-making is not worth living. But the evil lies in making this habit or custom a National institution, as much a part of our existence as the food we eat and the fluid we absorb. The evil has become a serious one. Private talk or conversation need not be objectionable. If a man does not like it he can go home. But a guest at a public banquet, a semi-public reception, or a private dinner can not decently clap on his hat and run when the vials of oratory are uncorked. He must stay and squirm. STRUCK BY LIGHTNING.

A Funny Incident Recalled by an Old Yankee Schoolmaster.

The present talk about electricity recalls to an old school-teacher an experience which he once had in a village in New England, in the days before village academies had given place to high schools. His pupils, without being in the least vicious, were often full of spirits, and sometimes rather unruly. He did all sorts of things to arouse their interest, and it chanced that just as Fourth of July came round he had managed to get an electric machine of considerable power, with which he intended to illustrate the lessons of the first class.

Much interest was taken by the boys in this machine. None of them had ever seen one, and they were all curious to try a shock.

There had long been an annual struggle between the boys and the town authorities as to whether the academy bell should be rung all night before the Fourth, and it came into the head of the schoolmaster, who loved a joke as well as any of his pupils, that this year he would take a hand in the controversy.

He went to the academy in the dusk of the eve of the National holiday, and laid upon the floor of the belfry a series of strips of zinc, which he connected with a wire leading down into the little chamber below. Another wire was connected with the bell, from which he removed the rope. Then he connected the poles of his machine with the wires from the belfry and awaited developments.

As soon as it was fairly dark the boys began to assemble about the academy, and it was not long before the boldest and most agile of the invaders were climbing up the lightning-rod, their usual road to the belfry. The teacher heard them remarking that if he thought he could fool them by taking the rope off the bell he was mistaken.

"Catch hold of the bell," the leader said, and from the wild howl of surprise and fright which immediately followed, it was evident that the order had been obeyed. Standing upon the strips of zinc and taking hold of the bell, the boys had completed the circuit, and had in consequence received a shock, which, of course, was not dangerous, but which they did not find pleasant.

Two or three times the boys tried to ring the bell without getting "struck by lightning," as they called it, for they were not long in deciding what the trouble was; then they abandoned the enterprise, and for the first time in many years the townspeople were able to sleep on the night before the Fourth.

The next afternoon the master announced that his machine was ready, and that the boys who had been so anxious to know what an electric shock was like could have one if they would come forward. Nobody stirred, except to shake the head knowingly.

"Oh, if you have tried it already," the teacher said, significantly, "of course it is no matter."

The boys looked at each other, realizing that to hold back would be equivalent to owning that they had been beaten on the evening before; then they set their teeth together, and all walked out to take the strongest shock the master thought it wise to give them.—Youth's Companion.

THE ARAUCANIANS.

A Wedding Amid Barbarians and the Ceremonies Preceding It.

The Araucanian people, inhabiting the northern part of Patagonia, are of medium height and great strength, the principal peculiarity of formation being in the narrowness of the front of the head and the size of the foot. Their marriage is an odd mixture of ceremonies. Theoretically, the bridegroom is supposed to steal his bride against her will, and in opposition to the wishes of her parents; practically, he buys her. Strange to say, the match is generally one of affection. As in Spain, music is the method of expressing feeling, but, alas for sentimental ideas of civilization, the instrument is a jew's-harp, without which no lover is ever seen. It hangs around his neck. He seats himself near the object of his choice and produces a series of dreadful sounds, and after a few days of this infliction he proceeds to the marriage preliminaries. If wealthy, there is no difficulty, but if poor he goes among his friends and borrows an ox, a horse, a pair of silver spurs, until there is enough. It is a point of honor to so oblige a friend, and repayment is frequently deferred until a girl-child is born and grown old enough to be sold. Then he and all his friends, mounted on horseback, visit the father, when six of the best speakers dismount and in turn praise the groom and the marriage. Then the father gravely responds. In the meantime the lover is hunting for his girl among the houses, and the speeches are prolonged until he finds her. He seizes her by the hair, feet or any available hold, throws her across his horse, and, like young Lochinvar, speeds away. She screams, and a general fight ensues between the friends of the groom and those of the girl, the latter being prevented from following until the pair escape into the surrounding woods. Deep in some glade a hut has been prepared, and they remain for two days after the abduction, when the marriage is considered consummated. In the meantime the presents have been brought to the parents, and a cow horn is blown and the wedded pair return. But now the mother is dissatisfied. It is a point of honor for her to be highly outraged, and she will neither speak or look at the husband, but sits with her back to him. Here is a difficult point. In hospitality she is bound to entertain him, and as the son-in-law is the honored guest he has to be consulted first. So she says: "Daughter, ask your husband if he is hungry," and carries on a conversation in this way until at last she gives an entertainment which exhausts her culinary knowledge. But not until the birth of the first child does she ever speak to the son-in-law except through a third person.—Ladies' Home Journal.

WIDOWHOOD A CRIME.

How the Hindoos Treat Women Who Have Lost Their Husbands.

The practice of treating widows as quasi-criminals, outcasts or slaves is among Hindoos of high antiquity. It is probably a substitute for a still older custom, once universal among the conquering tribes of the Asiatic world of slaying the wives of chieftains on the burial places of their lords. As manners grew milder and men less desperate, and new religious ideas were born, that practice was abolished, and widows were permitted to live, but only as persons whose right to survive must be regarded as imperfect. Their position became that as household slaves, or rather family outcasts, entitled to no honor, bound to servile offices, dressed in the meanest clothes, fed with the cheapest food, and regarded by all around them as persons who ought to consider themselves incurably degraded. Had not the very gods themselves, or the fates, pronounced them deserving of heavy suffering?

It is the rooted belief of every convinced Hindoo that unexpected or severe misfortune brought about without human hands is evidence that the sufferer has in some former state of being deservedly incurred the displeasure of the higher powers, and is justly expiating by his own misery his own actual though forgotten guilt. They think this even about themselves, and we have known a respectable Hindoo, full of life and energy, and by no means specially bigoted, upon the death of an only son suddenly to renounce the world and thenceforward to live, covered with ashes and repeating only prayers, the painful expiatory life of the Sunyasee, or Hindoo hermit. What he believed about himself, his friends were more ready to believe about him, and, as the death of a husband is the highest misfortune his wife can endure those who insult or degrade his widow, even if her own closest connections, do but carry out the visible will of the Divine. The widow is therefore, in theory, at all events, abandoned to her fate. Of course, natural laws are not wholly suspended even by superstition, and thousands of widows protected by personal affection, or by their own abilities, or by their wealth—for widowhood does not cancel rights of property—lead decently happy and contented lives. The majority, however, suffer under the ban typified by the shaving of their heads—that is, they are regarded till death as fallen from all title to respect, and are treated with a habitual indignity which, even when they are exempt from actual oppression, makes the position of millions of unoffending women no better than that of slaves or convicts. So severe is their lot that it excites pity even among those who believe that it is sanctioned by religion, and it would probably have been ameliorated long since but that it fits in with one of the principal Hindoo social arrangements—that of early marriage.—Spectator.

THE MINNOW AT HOME.

It Is a Social Fish, and Invariably Swims in Shoals.

The minnow haunts like spots to those which trout love, and is fond of fresh, running water. Bright, pebbly bottoms it prefers to sediment, and being essentially a social fish, it invariably swims in shoals. If you approach stealthily from the meadow bank into "Minnow bay," you may see the pink "at home," and of all little fishes, he is the most sprightly and interesting. Watch the silvery shoal in its graceful evolutions, and you will know well what is meant by the poetry of motion. The only fit parallel to a school of silvery minnows in the water is a flock of burnished starlings in the air. There is no apparent guiding spirit, yet the fifty move like one. They progress as by some hidden force; the water divides before them, and they wave through its liquidness. Minnows have a power common to most fishes, and rapidly assimilate to the changing color of the stream. They change from brown to gold, from gold to brown. To be seen, the minnow school must be sought for; it is not apparent to the sightless seer. When once caught, however, it is not difficult to keep in view; for the tiny green-brown things are ever active, and the even tenor of their movements is only at intervals broken by throwing up their silvery bellies and displaying their bright colors to the sun. As soon as the minnows eye an intruder, they move off a foot from the shore, flicking their tiny dorsal fins the while, and causing quite a minnow commotion. When quiet is restored they are quick to return, and to watch them you climb into an overhanging alder bough. As luck would have it, you have chosen well your time, and are treated to quite a charming and unexpected sight, for another shoal of minnows has attracted one of the presiding spirits of the stream. Over there is a stunted, leafless bough, and a kingfisher has just alighted upon it. At first his form is motionless; soon it assumes more animation; now is all eye and ear. Then it darts, hangs for a moment in the air like a kestrel, and returns to its perch. Again it darts with unerring aim and secures something. This is tossed, beaten and broken with its formidable beak, and then swallowed head foremost. The process is again and again repeated, and you find that the prey is small fish. From watching an hour, you are entranced at the beauty of the fluttering, quivering thing as the sun shines upon its green and gold vibrations in mid-air. You gain some estimation, too, of the amount of immature fish a pair of kingfishers and their young must destroy in a single season.—From "British Sporting Fishes," by John Watson.

Rural Methods.

"Whenever we have a fire in the country we first ring for the firemen, and an hour later for the police."

"What for?"

"The firemen to put the fire out, and the police to put the firemen out."—Life.

Toll and Meat.

"What did you want?" exclaimed the woman of the house angrily, as she faced the tramp at the kitchen door. "Breakfast or work?" "Both, ma'am," said the hungry wayfarer, timidly. "Eat that," said the woman, sternly, placing a biscuit and a piece of steak before him, "and you will have both." The cheery meal of incense breathing morn had been prepared by her daughter, who was teaching a cooking school in the city.—Burdette in Brooklyn Eagle.

Disappointed in Him.

Miss Waldo (discussing books)—You are familiar with Dickens' works, of course, Mr. Wabash?

Mr. Wabash—Well-er—no, I've never read Dickens, but I heard him lecture, not long ago, in Chicago. I don't think much of him.—Epoch.

It All Came Back.

"Some clothes to-day?" he asked, as a young man halted before his place on Jefferson avenue and began stroking the right hand leg of a pair of pants.

"Do you remember me?" was asked in reply.

"Vhas dere sometings wrong, my frendt?"

"Don't you remember? I was here and bought a coat of you last fall?"

"Last fall. Vhas dot coat all right?"

"You asked $6 for it and I gave you $5. It was a Prince Albert. You remember, don't you?"

"Vhas dere some moths in it? Did it fade out?"

"I asked you if you remember me? While we were talking the fire engines went by."

"Did somepody say dot coat vhas not wort tree dollars?"

"Do you remember or don't you?"

"My frendt, did some crock come off on your hands in a wet day?"

"No, sir. The coat was all right and worth the money, and now I want a pair of"——

"Vhas it all right? Rememper you! Certainly I do! Dose fire engines vhas going py, und I gif you shange for ten dollar, und you ask me where to buy a refolver, und you almost buys a sachel of me. Rememper you! Vhell, I shall shmile if I don't! How you vhas? Come inside. I vhas shust wondering oafer you, and it pleases me dot you vhas in good health. How odd dot I don't shake hands mit you a hull block avhay."—Detroit Free Press.

Paid for His Breakfast.

Woman (to tramp)—Now that you have been given a good breakfast, can't you do something to pay for it?

Tramp—Madame, you shouldn't say "you have been given a good breakfast." You didn't give me to any breakfast. You gave the breakfast to me. That is a bit of rhetorical information that is cheap at a week's board.—New York Sun.

Lumping It.

Brown is too throughly an American man of business to give in to the French fashion of serving meals in courses.

"What shall I bring, monsieur?" asked the polite waiter during Brown's last visit to Paris.

"You may hustle on three boiled eggs, a beefsteak, some cheese, a bottle of claret, and the bill," replied Brown in a single breath.—Judge.

On the Road to Fame.

Friend (to young physician)—How are you getting on professionally, doctor?

Young Physician—Famously. Since I was fortunate enough to be called in the case of old Mr. Trillion, of Fifth avenue, my reputation has rapidly extended; another case like that and my fortune is made.

Friend—But Mr. Trillion died.

Young Physician—That doesn't matter.

Society in Gotham.

Young Man (to tailor)—I must have that suit at 8 o'clock to-night sure, Snipper, for the Twillingham ball; no mistake.

Snipper—All right, sir.

Young Man—And what if it shouldn't fit?

Snipper—I'm to be a guest at the Twillingham ball myself, sir, and should the suit need any little alterations I can make them there.—New York Sun.

A Mortifying Blunder.

"Another pat of butter please?" said a guest in an up town restaurant.

"Sir?" said the gentleman addressed, with dignity.

"Oh, I beg pardon," said the guest, very much abashed, "I thought you were a waiter."

"Sir, I am the head waiter."—The Epoch.

A Heavy Loss.

Mrs. Carlton (to caller)—I am feeling so blue today, Mrs. Pompon. You have heard me speak of Marie, my French maid, who has proved such a treasure?

Mrs. Pompon—Yes.

Mrs. Carlton—She was taken suddenly ill in the night, and Dr. Montague says she cannot recover.

Mrs. Pompon—Oh, my poor Mrs. Carlton, I feel so sorry for you!—Epoch.

All entries to be made with the Secretary on or before 12 o'clock m. of the day preceding the race.

California State Agricultural Society Rules to govern running races. National Trotting Association Rules to govern trotting races.

In all exhibits of animals for premiums, other things being equal, blooded stock will be preferred.

All articles included in the above list, except the first department, to be on exhibition at the Pavilion on second day and remain during the Fair.

Special premiums will be allowed for articles exhibited not included in above list

If you have entries to make, attend to it at once, and when your entries are made, see to it that they are on time and at place for examination by the committee.

Accept no rumors in regard to the business of the exhibition. If you do not know what to do, inquire of the officers whose duty it is to tell you. One half of the trouble and disappointment at the Fair is caused by relying on hearsay. Attend to your business yourself. If it is done wrong you know where the blame lies.

Read the rules, and, by example, at least, assist in enforcing them; but don't forget that mistakes will occur where many people are congregated. The Board endeavors to do justice to all.

If the Superintendents and Committeemen are not always ready at the appointed hour, keep your stock and articles where you can command them at any time. Remember that we have but little time to do much business; patience, with a little system, will overcome many obstacles.

The Board will give the same special attention to details that has contributed to success in the past. It remains for the exhibitors to achieve still better results for the Fair of 1890.

SPRATT—BELL—At Big Pine, September 23, 1890, Mr. Samuel Spratt and Miss Ella Bell. Rev. Andrew Clark officiated.

Many and happy years to Mr. and Mrs. S. Spratt, and troops of friends join heartily in the wish.

DIED.

THOMPSON—At Independence, September 20th, 1890, Verres G. Thompson, aged 63 years.

His death was caused by apoplexy. He was found lying on the street in an insensible condition about 6 o'clock p. m., on Friday, was taken to his home and died about one hour after midnight. He remained unconscious till the end. Mr. Thompson was a native of Buckfield, Maine, he came to California in 1861, and in 1872 took possession of the Blaney House at Independence, and conducted that house for ten years. Seven years ago he left Independence and engaged in business at Mojave, he returned here eighteen months ago. He was widely known and had very many friends, a large number of whom followed his remains to the grave at Odd Fellows cemetery last Sunday.

THEDE—At Bishop, September 19th, 1890, Gustave Thede, a native of Germany, aged 65 years

The deceased came to Inyo County about seven years ago and engaged in the hotel business at Laws. He was a man of very warm heart and generous feeling. Devoted friends mourn his loss. A childless widow mourns the death of a kind husband.

Mr. and Mrs. A. W. Ebeshutz got back from San Francisco last Friday.

Mrs. H. Levy got back last Monday from a visit of several weeks at San Francisco.

An increase of fourteen men has just been added to the force at the marble quarry.

John Keegan is a candidate for Road Overseer, subject to the voters of Independence Road District.

Governor Charles C. Stevenson, of Nevada, died at Carson last Saturday night. He was aged 61 years.

The school at Camp Independence will open for the term next Monday. Mr. Samuel Cornell, late of Alameda County, will teach.

Highly Creditable.

The following letter from a prominent citizen of Big Pine is highly creditable to a very worthy girl, who is nobly working for the elevation of the Indians.

BIG PINE, Sept. 20, 1890.

Inyo Independent:—Miss Josie Turner has this day closed her Indian school and I can certify that the school has been maintained during the past four months entirely by Indians. A more attentive set of children, obedient to their teacher and diligent in studies, I never saw. They can nearly all read and write, and I deem it appropriate to publish the facts for the benefit of Miss Turner as well as for the Indians.

Respectfully yours,
J. C. CROCKER.

Races.

The first race of the Fair was on Tuesday; it was a half mile dash for untried horses. I. H. Mulholland entered the three-year-old filly, Dream; R. Carrasco entered Cupid. The race was closely contested and was won by Dream by half a length.

The second race was trotting by 2-year-olds, half mile and repeat. E. H. Sterling entered Keepsake; Jacob Vogt entered Bismark Jr. and I. H. Mulholland entered Patsy Albenton. The first heat was taken by Keepsake; Bismark second, Patsy third.

The second heat was taken by Patsy; Bismark second, Keepsake third. The third heat, and race, was taken by Patsy, the others distanced. Time, 1:51. Patsy Albenton is a standard bred trotter and gives promise of having all the good qualities of the Albenton stock. He is owned by Norman E. Conklin.

WEDNESDAY.

The first race was for stallions, trotting, mile heats. Andy Allen entered Andy; S. P. Smith entered Autare and J. M. Horton entered Kingsley. Andy took the first heat and race, both the others being distanced, Kingsley for running.

The second race was running, one-half mile heats. There were four starters. J. M. Horton entered Brown Frank; Walter James, Butcher Boy; Marshall Naylor, Buckskin, and El Rose Fandango. Frank took both heats and race, time 55.

THURSDAY.

S. P. Smith entered Pickpocket for a running race, mile heats, best 2 in 3. Marshal Naylor entered Hayseed. Joe McNally rode Pickpocket and El Rose rode Hayseed. The latter had the inside and was about two lengths ahead at the start. The heat was very closely contested and was taken by Hayseed by a very close scratch.

The second heat caused trouble that is not yet over. R. W. Scott, of Bishop, was the starter. On approaching the wire Hayseed was in the lead, and when just under the wire, McNally, supposing it was not a "go" pulled up Pickpocket till the horse was on his haunches. Hayseed was then under full headway and far in the lead. Apparently by impulse Mr. Scott struck the bell, and before McNally could rally his horse and get him under headway the other was out of reach. Hayseed came in fully as much in the lead as he had got the advantage at the start. The judges awarded the heat and race to Hayseed. Pickpocket was so much the favorite that everybody regarded the race as merely a walk-over for him. Mr. Smith gave notice of a protest against the decision of the judges.

The next race was double team trot, mile heats. R. W. Scott, of Bishop, had a walkover in two heats for his team Foxy and Queen.

THE FAIR.

Again it is most gratifying to record that in every department of exhibits there is marked improvement over former years. In agricultural products the exhibits are better than any we have yet had. C. A. Walter, E. Robinson, John Baxter, Fred Schabbell, John S. Gorman, John Glader, W. L. Hunter and others made displays of grain, roots and vegetables that give ample proof of the fertility of the soil of Owens Valley. Mr. J. V. Skinner made a display that is especially worthy of notice as being the first crop raised on land irrigated by the Stevens ditch. Corn ripened in ninety days from planting, potatoes, tomatoes, pumpkins, squash and other products of great excellence. This exhibit demonstrates the fertility of the great body of land under the Stevens canal.

FRUITS.

Here, as would be expected, the displays far exceed all our other productions. E. Robinson, John Baxter, John Kispert, A. N. Bell, C. A. Walter, S. A. Densmore and others showed such fruit as is making Owens Valley famous. The apples, pears, peaches, quinces and prunes are all beautiful fruit. Mr. Kispert is admitted to excel in grapes; his display of wine, raisin and table grapes shows all the best varieties and of the highest excellence. These various products of the soil need only to be seen to attract the best class of settlers to the fertile and cheap lands of Owens Valley, and tens of thousands of acres that will produce equal to any seen in these exhibits have never yet been touched by a plow.

EVIDENCE OF IMPROVING TASTE.

In all kinds of embroidery and needle work the displays far exceed anything shown before. Mrs. Ebeshutz has a large collection of laces of different kinds, and each piece is worthy of being called a work of art. Mrs. Wright, of Bishop, has a large collection of lace, fancy quilting and other varieties of needle work. The collection is very beautiful in rich colors as well as fine work. Miss Lena Thomsen and Miss Annie Thomsen show another very large display of lace, embroidery and different kinds of needle work. During the past three years just as soon as one Fair ended these young ladies began to prepare for the next. This accounts for the large and beautiful displays they succeed in making. Miss Maggie Conklin has a display of beautiful lace and embroidery. This includes many pieces and different varieties. Miss Addie Lewis has a fine display of embroidery. She has also a beautiful exhibit of fine dressmaking. Mrs. Nettie Webb has a unique exhibit of darned net, including many pieces. Miss Carrie Stoutenborough, of Bishop, has a handsome display of embroidery and crochet work. Miss Jessie Parsons has a display of needle work that gives proof that the elegant art is not neglected in Round Valley. Miss Carmelita Gonzales sent up from Lone Pine a display of the peculiar and beatiful Spanish drawn needlework. This work requires the utmost patience and skill and is proportionately valuable. Mrs. J. Baxter has on exhibition some fine samples of skillful dressmaking. This display, taken as a whole, is by far the best ever before seen in the District; the work was all done within the District and is most creditable to the ladies.

PAINTING.

In this department the display is most remarkable. It would not be expected that such proofs of artistic talent would be found among an isolated people as we are. The works are not glaring daubs, but show a delicacy of taste, a correctness of judgment and skill that would be looked for only where art has been long cultivated, and where there are collections of first class works to study and to form the taste. Miss Lillian O'Hara has a beautiful collection of her own works including pieces in pastel, oil, water color, crayon, poker drawing and pencil drawing. Miss Jessie Parsons has a fine collection of pieces hand-painted on different material. The pupils of Miss Marcia Stevens, of Lone Pine, have an exhibit of various works that merit very high praise. Figures in pastel and crayon, the features expressive and beautifully drawn; landscapes true to nature and executed with high skill. While much of the credit is due to the teacher it must be that the grand scenery the young artists have looked on all their lives has created in them a native love for the beautiful in nature and a disposition to imitate her works. Miss Maggie Conklin has several pieces of her own work in the collection and all most creditable to the artist.

MARBLE.

From the quarry of the Inyo Marble Company Mr. A. Staudinger sent up a display of fancy marbles. These are worked into various forms, and each piece is a gem of beauty. It is not possible to appreciate the value of these samples or to imagine their beauty without being seen. The most delicate fern like figures run through the marble and these are interspered with flower and leaf figures that look as of inlaid gold. Future cathedrals and palaces in far distant lands will be adorned with this beautiful marble.

MISCELLANEOUS EXHIBITS.

No part of the whole exhibits is more interesting than the apiary display of Mr. W. Muth-Rasmussen. This includes combs in all stages of progress, from the foundation to the finished pound sections, ready for market. Bee-keepers tools and implements of all kinds are shown. There is also a fruit drying tray, the invention of the exhibitor, this protects the fruit from insects and is much easier to handle than any other tray in use.

Miss Rachel Bell has a beautiful display of live flowers that is a very pleasing feature of the show.

Alexander Clark shows corn with eight ears on a stock, and one of the ears measures two feet four inches in length. This corn was grown on grass land, without irrigation.

Mr. A. N. Bell shows walnuts, English and native; these are fine nuts. He also makes a fine display of flour of his own manufacture. Mr. E. Robinson shows the best sweet potatoes ever seen here before. Mr. C. A. Walter has a fine exhibit of home made hams and bacon. It is strange that we should import hams and bacon when so good can be made at home.

Mr. W. L. Hunter has a very large and choice collection of the mineral products of Inyo, including gold, silver, lead, bismuth, antimony and other ores. Mr. J. S. Gorman makes a very fine display of our silver ores, this idcludes all the mining districts of the county. Mr. W. P. Young shows a very fine exhibit of crude borax from the Death Valley country.

Rev. Edward McEvers has been ordered by his Bishop to go to Goldendale, county seat of Clickitat county, Washington. He expects to leave Bishop with his family next week. Mr. McEvers has been two years among us, and in that time has won hosts of friends who part from him with regret.

Mr. Nathan Rhine got back to Independence last Friday after an absence of about three months. He is much benefited in health by his vacation and travel.

A Delighted Audience.

The performance of "The Mikado" last night was highly successful. There was but one drawback; the hall was much too small to afford room for all who wanted admission. Everybody very good naturedly crowded up into the smallest space possible to occupy, but still many who wanted to see the play had to be refused admission. From beginning to end the play was rendered well in every part. The players have reason to be very highly gratified with the hearty applause given them in every scene. Where all did so well it would be unjust to make special mention of any; but all the players agree that the success of the performance is largely due to the excellent management and tireless efforts of Miss Maggie Conklin. Miss Carrie Stoutenborough was called from Bishop by telegram to play the accompaniment. She came, and without time to practice the music rendered it in a way that won hearty applause. "The Mikado" is the most successful entertainment of the kind ever given here.

Notice of Quarterly Apportionment.

SEPT. 20, 1890.

C. MULHOLLAND:—I have this day apportioned the following money to Independence District:

State Fund $109 34
Library Fund 11 52

Trustees will please keep an accurate account of fund apportioned, and in drawing orders do not fail to state specifically the number of the order, the fund from which it is to be paid, for what purpose drawn, and if for teacher's salary, the time for which such salary is paid.

Do not draw orders on any fund in excess of the apportionment.

J. H. SHANNON,
School Superintendent for Inyo County.

For Sale.

The ranch known as the "Rittgers place" near Lone Pine is offered for sale together with the the farming implements and stock. The ranch contains 320 acres of excellent land. The stock consists of thirty head of cattle and twelve brood mares. There is now sixty tons of hay on the place and feed enough to winter 200 head of stock. The winter pasture is rented for five years at $300 a year. The soil is a rich loam and excellently adapted to vegetable raising. There is plenty of outside range, making it a good stock ranch. For further particulars address

U. S. SENATE PAGES.

A Bright Lot of Boys, One the Son of a Senator.

They Can Only Serve Between the Ages of Twelve and Sixteen—What They Think of Leading Senators—Well Paid and Very Ambitious.

[COPYRIGHT, 1890.]

"WHAT if the Senate pages should strike?"

The question was once asked by a gentleman who sat beside me in the United States Senate gallery and noted how heavily the Senators lean on the fourteen little fellows who perform errands for them. It seemed to him, he said, that such a strike would stop the wheels of Government; and so it might if there were no means of filling the places of the strikers, for presumably very few of the Senators would know where to go or what to do to procure the documents, etc., for which they keep the pages running. But about the Capitol and in the several departments of public life in Washington there are enough men of National renown who began their political careers as pages to fill the places of all these boys; so—

What if the Senate pages should strike?

The number of famous men who once were pages seems to warrant the presumption that embryonic greatness is now scampering about the Capitol in knickerbockers, running errands, perhaps, for men not fit to bear its shoes. Surely this is excuse enough for devoting a little consideration to the pages of the Senate.

Four years is the longest term a boy may serve as page, since he is eligible to the office only between the ages of twelve and sixteen. In the Senate there are fourteen of these boys, under the immediate direction of Alonzo H. Stewart, a young man of nearly twenty years, who four years ago closed his career as a page and is now attached to the Sergeant-at-Arms under the title of Messenger on the Floor of the Senate. But this chief page and all his assistants are under the supervision of Captain Isaac Bassett, the venerable assistant door-keeper, who has served continuously as an attache of the Senate since he was appointed a page, fifty-seven years ago, by Daniel Webster's request. Captain Bassett, with his long white hair and beard, is the most striking figure on the Senate floor, and if any man is indispensable there it is he. In the matter of ceremonials he is the authority on whom Vice-President, Presidents pro tempore of the Senate and all the officers and members of that august body have to rely. For more than half a century he has kept a memorandum book at hand and made entries of all those acts which were likely to be useful as precedents. When death strikes a Senator down, or any thing else of an unusual character happens, the presiding officer of the Senate turns to Captain Bassett, who sits on his left, and is informed as to what is the conventional mode of procedure under the circumstances. It is said that Captain Bassett has, during all these years of service in the Senate, kept close memoranda of such speeches and acts as have marked events in our country's history. He can tell the precise spot where Webster stood when he made any one of his famous arguments; where Sumner sat when he received the blow which helped the cause of emancipation along; where every word was said and every act performed which has had direct bearing on the great events of this last half century. But he is as uncommunicative as the Sphinx, and as for his memorandum books, he would no more let a newspaper correspondent look at one of them than he would willingly sever his connection with the Senate.

The fourteen Senate pages are all bright, interesting lads. Harry Long, McKee Cochrane and Albert Mackey are the seniors. They have served three years. And Warner Moody and Fred Kappeler are the juniors. Warner Moody is the son of Senator Moody, of

THE INTERVIEW ACCORDED.

South Dakota, and is a peculiarly interesting, not to say charming, little fellow. He is a quaint, fair-haired child, whose delicate physique and sweet, gentle manners bring Oliver Twist constantly to mind. His appearance is that of a boy—I had almost said a girl—of seven or eight years, but his precision of speech and his quiet old-fashioned ways together with his precocious judgment make him seem more than a child. He is the sort of lad that mothers can not meet without having an irresistible impulse to snatch him up and kiss him. With as much solemnity as any Senator in the chamber he acknowledges the fitness of the sobriquet which the older pages have fastened to him—the Little Lady from Dakota—and without a trace of offense accepts the title as his own.

Fred Kappeler is also a diminutive lad of thirteen, but is a more rugged, boyish chap. He acknowledges Robert Porter, the superintendent of census, as his patron saint. Fred was born in Switzerland, but in the seven years of his residence in America all traces of his mother tongue have been obliterated from his English speech. He is well aware that it would take an amendment of the constitution to make him eligible to the Presidency, but he very contentedly asserts that there is nothing to hinder him from becoming a Senator, and so far as his observation goes a Senator is more to be envied than a President, for all a Senator has to do is to "spat his hands and the pages do all the work for him." Fred answers to the name of Swipes and says he is sure it will never offend his dignity, not even when he becomes a Senator, to be known by that pseudonym.

In the bestowal of nicknames the pages seem to delight in contrariety. For example, McKee Cochrane, who is of an extreme blonde type, is called Ethiope, and Albert Mackey, whose exceeding generosity has made him the favorite of the group, is called Shylock. Events in the careers of the boys also determine their nicknames, as in the case of Logan Harris, a handsome little fellow with bright, twinkling eyes, who is called Pie because when he was being initiated to the secrets of page etiquette he was informed, and he believed, that it was his conventional duty to buy a round of pie at the Senate restaurant for all of the other pages. He bought, along with this experience, the name which will not leave him, at least until he quits the atmosphere of the Senate.

To "interview" a Senator who has nothing to say has been adjudged by newspaper men a pretty difficult thing to do. But compared with interviewing fourteen Senate pages who have every thing to say and are eager to say it all at once it is as easy as rolling off the traditional log. I met the boys altogether a few moments before the Senate was called to order. When they learned that I wanted their opinions concerning Senators they began to push and crowd and chatter all at once. The atmosphere was full of opinions. Had I been fourteen stenographers with a full complement of ears I could not have heard and preserved all that they told me. Every one of them talked louder and faster than all the rest and each tugged at some portion of my apparel to attract my attention to what he had to say. The frankness of these boys, their willingness to declare an honest eagerness to "talk for publication," set the unaffected little fellows far above some men of note whom I have known—men who, while manifestly no less eager, surround themselves with sham barriers and sit behind them sorely disappointed if the interviewer does not see the sham and knock the barriers down—pantalooned Poloniuses who can not play upon the pipe, yet seek to play upon the journalist.

Out of the clamor I managed to snatch a few facts—first, the general fact that good feeling prevails between the Senators and their pages, and then some specifications as to individuals. Senator Stanford was unanimously declared to be an able statesman and a great man because each year he gives them all an entertainment at his house, where he distributes presents, and then because he gives a bright crisp $5 bill to each page every year. But as the chatter went on this was found to be a complimentary ballot. Senators Manderson, Vance, Reagan, Gorman and Davis seemed really to be the most general favorites of the boys, and Senators Ransom, Dixon, Moody, Butler and Manderson were declared to be the handsomest men in the Senate. They give also to Senator Butler the credit of being the most polite and elegant gentleman in the chamber. Senator Gorman is liked because he once was a page himself and has not forgotten it.

"He is always good natured," said one of the little fellows, "and often tells us stories about what he used to do when he was a page. I guess he was a ripper, too." This last remark was intended to be a sort of cap for a climax of compliment.

Senator Vest is not generally a favorite with the boys. Indeed, the youngsters passed unmistakable censure upon the very vigorous language he sometimes uses toward them, and they assert openly that they would rather be doing something else when he snaps his fingers for a page. One of the boys, however, thinks Senator Vest is a pretty good sort of a man. McKee Cochrane was one day rushing at breakneck speed to do the bidding of some other Senator, when, darting out of the chamber, he plumped squarely into Senator Vest and knocked breath enough out of him to make raw material for half a dozen Fourth of July orations. The Senator saved just enough to supply the surrounding audience with a deep blue tint and an odor of sulphur. The boy, who thought his hour had come "for surely" this time, slunk back under Captain Bassett's protecting arm and tremblingly awaited to hear his doom pronounced. Instead of declaring war, however, Senator Vest at once began to manifest a decided interest in young Cochrane, and sometime afterward, when the youngster fell into a fight with one of his colleagues—an offense which is punishable by two months' suspension—Senator Vest pleaded for him and procured a reduction of the suspension to two weeks.

Young Harry Long never tires of telling what a kindly man Senator Farwell is. The Senator entertained the boy at his elegant home in Chicago during the Republican National convention in 1888 and opened the eyes of the youthful Pennsylvanian to the glories of the Western metropolis, and procured for him a seat in the convention to boot.

"Why," said the boy, all aglow with gratitude, "he not only invited me to his house, but he paid all my expenses."

Senator Vance is voted the jolliest of all the Senators, and Senator Reagan has gained the eternal friendship of the boys by making paper caps and giving them around.

Senator Cockrell is more dreaded than any other member of the body. "He is always wanting something," said one of the lads.

"Yes; and it's always something outside of the chamber," said another. "I've worn a path running to the document room for him."

"You bet, when Senator Cockrell claps his hands," said a third, "we all try to find something else to do. He ought to have a page all to himself."

Senator Jones, of Arkansas, is another one who needs a great deal of waiting on.

"He's a good enough man," said one little fellow, "but he's awful on us."

"What kind of a man is Senator Ingalls?" I asked.

"Oh! he never notices us," answered one.

"No," piped a wee chap, "he ain't sociable."

Senator Hiscock is not very popular among the pages. They say he seems "sort o' tired of every thing and everybody."

Some time ago the pages formed a senate of their own. For some reason they excluded Masters Moody, Long and Harris, whereupon these three organized themselves into a reportorial corps and broke into so many secret sessions that the judiciary officer of the body concluded it was time to adjourn sine die; so he decamped with the twenty-five cents in the treasury and six sheets of paper belonging to the organization. The pages' senate then collapsed.

These boys get $75 a month in salary and numerous small sums from generous Senators. They also have a trick of picking up all the printed speeches of certain Senators, and, after having them nicely bound, sell the volume to the Senators.

"Does anybody but the Senators buy these speeches?" I asked.

"Oh! no; only the Senator who has made the speeches," was the innocent answer.

One little fellow—Harry Long—told me he had made $75 in the last year by selling speeches to the Senators who made them.

"What would you do if you were a Senator?" I asked one of the small boys. I was rather set back by his answer.

"I'd call up the Blair education bill and have it passed," he said.

"Yes, sirce!" chimed in half a dozen more; "we all wanted that bill to pass."

I learned afterwards, however, that they did not care a fig for the merits of the bill. They had seen Senator Blair's earnestness in the matter and his repeated disappointments over its failure, and they were sincerely sorry for him.

When asked whether they would rather be pages or Senators, all but one agreed that generally they would prefer to be pages, "because we pages have a heap more fun than the Senators do." Little flaxen-haired, blue-eyed Warner Moody, however, looked up and spoke with a quaint dignity and thoughtful deliberation:

"I would rather be a Senator, of course."

Page etiquette demands that each lad shall be permitted to wait on his own patron Senator—that is, the Senator who procured his place for him; and it is inexcusable rudeness for one page to respond to the call of another's Senator unless the other is so engaged that he can not attend to it.

The pages are ostensibly Republicans, but they do not mind saying that there are a good many things about the Democratic side that are attractive to them, prominent among which is the fact that most of the motions to adjourn come from the Democratic side; and since the boys report for duty at 9 o'clock in the morning and remain until adjournment, this is no unimportant matter to them.

The Democratic side of the chamber, however, is what the boys call "the penitentiary," since whenever one of them is refractory Captain Bassett relegates him to duty on that side. This is an old-time custom, and pages soon learn that it is in the nature of reward of merit to be permitted to serve on the majority side of the chamber. There are seven boys for each side, but those on the majority side always feel a little more favored.

"I got to larking the other day," said Master Long, "and Captain Bassett sent me over on the Democratic side."

As I turned to leave the group one little fellow followed me, saying:

"Don't forget to put in something about Noddy Boffin (Master George Mann, of Michigan) and Rev. Dr. Edward Bailey, of Georgia, the boy who says 'fo'teen' and 'deed I did,' and 'tote' for carry; and don't forget Hadji Hassein Ghooly Khan (Master Will Aulick, of Illinois) and Ike Bassett, Jr., the grandson of Captain Bassett, the boy that ate the shoe-blacking when he was told it was pate de fo'e gras."

"And say," he added, "you ain't goin' to interview the House pages, are you?"

"Why not?"

"Well, they ain't in our class, you know."

There is as much distinction among boys between a Senate page and a House page as there is among men between a Senator and a member of the lower House. WILLIS B. HAWKINS.

FORTUNATE BOSTONIANS.

Windfalls of Wealth Come Suddenly to Two Lucky Persons.

The fickle goddess of fortune, who is supposed to preside at and distribute the wealth provided at the monthly drawings of the Louisiana State Lottery Company, must be somewhat warmly inclined toward residents of Boston, for scarcely a month passes but the hearts of deserving people in this city are gladdened by windfalls of wealth, which, although hoped for, as a rule come unexpectedly, but are none the less welcome. The June drawing, which has just occurred, proved no exception.

Among the many who were favored were Mr. Wilson C. Rich and Mr. W. O. Covert. Mr. Rich is employed at 9 T wharf. He had not bought many tickets previous to the good luck which has befallen him. He held one fortieth ($15,000) of ticket 56,848, which drew the first capital prize of $600,000. He bears the reputation of being sober and industrious, and will take good care of the fortune which he has so suddenly acquired.

Mr. Covert is in business at 22 Central wharf, and held a one-fortieth part of ticket 90,267, which drew the third capital prize of $100,000. Mr. Covert has bought tickets very often, and will probably continue, hoping that, in his case, at least, the lightning of fortune will strike again in the same place.

Neither of the gentlemen had the least trouble in obtaining their money. As soon as the results of the drawing were made known they sent their tickets to the New Orleans office by the Adams Express Company. With very little delay the tickets were cashed and the money was forwarded to them. Both gentlemen speak in the highest terms of the prompt manner in which they were treated by the company.—Boston (Mass.) Herald, July 1.

I never intend to be without them as long as they are made.

Please send me another dozen, as the last are all gone but one. I gave several of them away, but they all did good in every case, so far as I could learn."

TAKE CARE! THERE IS DANGER

In allowing inactivity of the kidneys to grow through neglect. The deadly shoals of Bright's disease and diabetes will wreck the goodly bark of health if it is allowed to drift rudderless upon them. The bladder, too, if inactive, and judicious medication does not speedily direct the helm toward the port of safety, will be whelmed by the quicksand of disease. In selecting a diuretic, let your choice fall upon Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, which stimulates the renal organs without irritating and exciting them, two effects to be apprehended from the unmedicated stimuli largely resorted to. These have a tendency to react prejudicially. The Bitters invigorate the kidneys and bladder, in common with the nerves and the digestive organs, and so afford lasting aid. It also affords dual assistance in preventing and curing intermittent and remittant fever. Biliousness, constipation and rheumatism it also subjugates.

Competency is a sort of financial horizon which recedes as we advance. The word always signifies a little more than we possess.

P. HINKLE'S PATENT CENTRIFUGAL ROLLER QUARTZ MILL

THIS cut shows the New Hinkle Centrifugal Quartz Mill, with plates and Slummer. This is the only mill made that needs no oil for the inside working parts, as it is thoroughly lubricated with water, supplied from a circular tank, which is connected to the roller spindles, slides and drips by rubber hose. By this means oil cannot interfere with perfect amalgamation. Other features of superiority are: Simplicity of construction; the free discharge of pulp; the wearing parts are easily replaced at a small cost. The small amount of power required to run the mill will recommend it to all practical mill men, as well as the small cost of erection and transportation of mill to the mine. A 5-foot mill weighs 9,000 lbs.; pulverizers 38 in. diam.; run, 80 to 90 rev. per minute, with a capacity of 20 tons per day. This size mill costs $1,500. With Silver Plates, Slummer and Ore Feeder, $1,800.

P. HINKLE'S PATENT ORE FEEDER.

Positive Feed and Ready Adjustment.

IN this Improved Ore Feeder the falling tappet of the mill causes a backward movement of the feeding tray. As the ore comes from the hopper on to the tray, a transverse bar prevents the ore moving backward, and a small portion of the ore is thus forced off the front edge of the feeding-tray into the battery. The amount of movement of the feeding tray may be regulated, thus regulating the feed of ore. This feeder can be arranged for roller mill or stamps. It is strong and durable, and feeds wet or dry ore in regular quantities.

RAT EXTERMINATION.

A Simple Method for Destroying Large Colonies of the Rodents.

The best course to take, when the extermination of a colony of rats becomes a necessity, is to make them help to destroy one another in the following manner: A number of tubs, proportionate to the quantity of rats in the place which it is desired to rid of them, should be placed about the middle of each occupied by a brick standing on end. The bottom of these tubs should be covered with water to such a depth that about an inch of the brick projects above it. The top of the tub should be covered with stout brown paper, upon which a dainty meal of bacon rind and other scraps dear to the rat palate figures—a sloping board giving the rodents facilities for partaking of it. The feast should be renewed for several nights, so that all the rats in the neighboorhood may get to know of the good food which is placed within such easy reach. When it is judged that this policy has been pursued long enough, the center of the brown paper should be cut in such a manner that any rat venturing upon it will be precipitated into the cold water. It might be thought that the result of this would be to capture a rat, or at the most two, for every tub prepared; but no such meager reward for the trouble that has been taken need be feared.

The first rat to find his trust abused and himself struggling in the water at the bottom of a tub soon recovers sufficently from the shock to ascertain that there is a little island of refuge, on to which he clambers and squeals his loudest for help. Now, the squeal of a rat in trouble attracts every one of his kind within hearing, and very few moments will elapse before the victim of misplaced confidence is joined by one of his friends. The new-comer is as quick to discover the chance of escape from a watery grave that the brick offers as was the original victim, but when he attempts to avail himself of its presence it becomes apparent that there is not room for more than one upon it. The first comer resists with tooth and nail the efforts of his companion in trouble to dispossess him of his coign of vantage, and the squeals which form an accompaniment to the fight for a footing upon the brick attracts more rats to the scene of the tragedy. The conflict waxes more and more furious as rat after rat topples into the water, and by morning bedraggled corpses in plenty will gladden the eyes of the man whose losses at the teeth of rats have induced him to adopt this means of thinning their numbers. Some years ago the plan described above was tried in a city warehouse, with the result that more than three thousand rats were destroyed in a siugle night.—Cornhill Magazine.

NEWSPAPER GOSSIP.

Reasons Why Personalities Are so Important Nowadays.

As long as gossip was oral it spread, as regarded any one individual, over a very small area, and was confined to the immediate circle of his acquaintances. It did not reach, or but rarely reached, those who knew nothing of him. It did not make his name, or his walk, or his conversation familiar to strangers. And, what is more to the purpose, it spared him the pain or mortification of knowing that he was gossiped about. A man seldom heard of oral gossip about him which simply made him ridiculous, or trespassed on his lawful privacy, but made no positive attack on his reputation. His peace and comfort were, therefore, but slightly affected by it.

In all this the advent of the newspapers, or rather of a particular class of newspapers, has made a great change. It has converted curiosity into what economists call an effectual demand, and gossip into a marketable commodity. The old Paul Fry, whom our fathers despised and caricatured, and who was roundly kicked and cuffed on the stage for his indiscretions, has become a great wholesale dealer in an article of merchandise for which he finds a ready sale, and by which he frequently makes a fortune. In other words, gossip about private individuals is now printed, and makes its victim, with all his imperfections on his head, known hundreds or thousands of miles away from his place of abode; and, what is worst of all, brings to his knowledge exactly what is said about him, with all its details. It thus inflicts what is, to many men, the great pain of believing that every body he meets in the streets is perfectly familiar with some folly, or misfortune, or indiscretion, or weakness, which he had previously supposed had never got beyond his domestic circle.

It is no defense for this state of things to say that the passion for notoriety of any kind has been fostered to such an extent by this wide diffusion of printed gossip that there is a large number of people who do not dislike it, but on the contrary put themselves in the way of having their private life explored by the press. They are a small minority at best, and their taste must be recognized as a depraved one.—Scribner.

NEW OUT-DOOR GAME.

A Sort of Tennis Called Crooketta and How It Is Played.

Mr. J. D. Horn, of Leicester, has added a new game to the already long list that has been placed before the public during the last few years. In lawn crooketta there seems to be the elements of success, as players will find plenty of skill necessary, and also there is a certain amount of exercise required. This, however, is by no means so violent as one sees in a game of lawn tennis; so to many this will prove a great attraction.

The game can be played on grass or gravel or, indeed, on any hard substance, while it is not necessary that the courts should be always of the same shape or size; so that in this respect it will suit grounds that might not always be available should the same-sized court be a sine qua non. The implements required for the game are not many, being four crooks, four standards, a net and six balls. The crooks are three feet six inches long, having the appearance of a lawn-tennis racket, very loosely strung; indeed, the baggy part of the racket is nearly three inches deep. The standards, three feet six with cupped tops, are placed so as to form a six-foot square, the net, two feet eight inches high, inclosing this space. The balls in use for the game are four and one-half inches in diameter, four, called sentinels, to be placed in the cups on the standards, and the remaining two being the play balls. The service lines are thirty feet long, and are placed twelve feet away from each side of the inside square, called the fold; and when the court is made complete by joining the fold corners to the service-line corners.

Two or four players can take part in lawn crooketta, the greater number appearing to us to enhance the interest shown in the game. The principal part of the play consists in placing one of the balls in the crook, and then, standing outside the service line, serving the ball so that it shall pass over the fold and fall in your opponent's court without his catching it, or you may displace one of the sentinels on the standards, but taking care that your ball shall still drop in the adversary's court.

The game is scored by points; one, two, three or four, called a knave, queen, king and an ace, respectively, can be made from each service, while fifty or one hundred points constitute a game, according to whether a long or short game is required. Before trying the game ourselves we had seen it well played by some of the team of lady cricketers, who are now showing such great form with the bat and in the field.

To Memory Dear.

"Why so sad?"

"I once wasted some money."

"But why dwell on that now?"

"Because now I need it so confoundedly."—Chicago Times.

Just Suited Her.

He—May I not pour out my burning heart at your feet?

She—That's a good idea. My toes are right chilly.—Texas Siftings.

English ladies are adopting the fashion of putting their maids who wait at table in livery. The skirts are plain of these livery gowns and of the heraldic color of the house. All the plaits are thrown behind. Then the waistcoat and jacket are trimmed with livery bands, buttons and crests or monograms in metal. A high, stiff white collar, white cuffs and a tiny white cap like a topknot complete this livery.

—Good Macaroons.—Blanch and heat in a marble mortar, with rose water, three-quarters of a pound of sweet and one-quarter of a pound of bitter almonds. Mix with one pound of powdered white sugar and add to this, a little at a time, the stiffly beaten whites of six eggs. Mix well and mold into little balls, flatten, brush over with egg white and put on sheets of tin well sprinkled with granulated sugar.—Boston Budget.

AN INNOCENT MAN.

He Plays a Little Trick and Is Caught by the Wrong Policeman.

In Chicago, one night last week, a nicely-dressed man was caught in the act of attempting to pass counterfeit money, and was taken to the police station. When drawn up before court the next morning, he seemed instantly to awaken an interest in the judge, for he was indeed a fine-looking fellow with a well-bred air and a face of striking expressiveness.

"What is your name?" the judge asked.

"I am Leroy Wallraven," he replied.

When the officers that had made the arrest were examined, the judge turned to Leroy Wallraven and said: "I am sorry for you. It does not require much of an effort to sit in judgment upon the misdeeds of a man whose appearance bespeaks a hard life, but it requires an uncomfortable exercise of nerve to pass sentence upon a mere youth that bears the aspect of gentle training."

"Judge," the prisoner spoke up, "please do not exercise your nerve to an uncomfortable extent on my account. I am perfectly willing to relieve you of all responsibility in this matter—in short, you may discharge me."

"Ah, I suppose so," the judge replied, "but you see I have a duty to peform. You are charged with attempting to pass counterfeit money, and as the proof against you is direct, there can be no doubt of your guilt."

"I don't think that I am guilty, judge."

"Don't think that you are?"

"No sir, I do not."

"Why, don't you know whether or not you are guilty?"

"Well I can not positively say. The truth is, I was very much intoxicated last night and hardly knew what I did. I am sure, however, that I never carried any counterfeit money about me, and if I attempted to pass a worthless note, I can not understand how I came by it."

"But you did come by it in some way, and of all the counterfeit money I ever saw I think the bill you tried to pass was the worst."

"Will you please let me see it?"

The judge handed him a piece of green paper. The young fellow looked at it for a moment and then roared with laughter.

"You needn't laugh, young man. What you now perceive to be a rank counterfeit might, last evening, have seemed to you clever enough to pass."

"I am not laughing at the rankness of the counterfeit; I am laughing at the manner in which the bill came into my possession. I am an actor and played last night. My position in the drama was not a very high one—in fact, I accept a bribe of ten dollars from a fellow that is attempting to run away with a girl. Well, I took the green paper and put it into the pocket of my vest. I had been drinking during the performance and did not change my clothes after the show, but went into a saloon to get a drink. Then, after taking a drink, I must have tendered this stage money in payment."

"Your explanation is perfectly satisfactory," said the judge. "I am pleased to see—"

"Hold on a moment!" exclaimed a policeman.

"What do you want?" the judge asked.

"I want to say a word in regard to this case. I want to say a word about a strange coincidence. Some time ago, while I was on the police force of Cincinnati, a fellow that looked a good deal like this man was arrested for passing a counterfeit bill, and at the trial next day he gave us the theater racket, just as his nibs has done, and the judge let him off. How do you explain that?"

The young fellow began to "hem and haw," and the judge, who by this time had opened his eyes pretty wide, asked: "Were you ever in Cincinnati?"

"Yes, sir, but—but not at the time that other fellow innocently attempted to—"

"That's enough. Pass him back."

As the young fellow turned to go, he remarked: "This is the worst police-ridden town I ever saw. The day when an innocent man had a chance has forever passed."—Arkansaw Traveler.

His Head Was Level.

A tramp who was rubbing a Woodward avenue lamp-post the other day struck a pedestrian for a dime, saying he wanted to get a bite to eat.

"Why don't you try some of these houses around here?" was asked.

"I've tried all but that one on this block, and the people are either away or down on the purfesh."

"But why didn't you try that one?,'

"I'm no fool, mister. I may not be purty, but I've got some common sense."

"Well!"

"Well, follow the street sprinkler and you can't go wrong. When it leaves a dry spot in front of a man's house you just keep away from that man. That's where they tie ropes around the children's bodies just before feeding."—Detroit Free Press.

She Called at His Office.

Irate Wife—Where is my husband?

Cashier—He is in his private office with his type-writer.

Irate Wife—The horrible wretch! What business has he sitting around in there with his type-writer?

Cashier—He's repairing it, while the operator is away on her vacation.

Irate Wife—Oh! That's different.—Light.

Spite.

Clara—So you are really engaged to Tom, are you? That's a pretty ring you have, but it is not the same one I returned to him after we quarreled.

Sophie—Tom said it was a new one.

Clara—I suppose Tom is in earnest this time, so he got struck with a fit of economy, and sold the other ring and bought this one, and put the balance in the bank.—Harper's Bazar.

It Was Rather Personal.

Char. Lotte (at the market house)—What are you buying, this morning, Jinks?

Jinks—Pig's feet.

Char. Lotte—Cannibal!

(It took the efforts of two policemen to separate them.)—The Jury.

ENJOYMENT OF LIFE.

Make the Best of Every Thing and You Are Sure to Be Happy.

There are a great many persons in pursuit of happiness who fail to succeed because they are unable to take pleasures as they come, but are forever reaching out for something beyond them. While it is folly to pursue a life of mere selfish gratification, it is the duty of all to try to enjoy themselves in this world; to be contented and happy where Heaven has placed them. There are many people who miss the pleasures of life because they are indifferent to the pleasures of nature. They do not stop, as Ruskin says, "to watch the corn grow or the blossom set," but rush on in feverish haste in pursuit of money, as if that were a certain road to enjoyment. The morning song of the thrush, the gleam of the hummingbird's plumage, the beauty of lakes and the majestic grandeur of mountains bring no pleasure to some natures. Many people lose all enjoyment in life because they are hypercritical. They are forever in search of flaws and imperfections instead of looking at the best side. No picture or work of art gives them genuine pleasure, because they are not content with it. They find some slight error which no one else possibly has discovered, and it overbalances their enjoyment of a noble effort of the artist. A taste of genuine art is one of the most noble and refining of which man is capable. It is an inspiration to a noble nature to higher living and better thinking. Many lovers of music seem so critical in their appreciation that they lose all pleasure in any performance that they attend. A discriminating taste is an excelent gift, but this is a different thing from a hypercritical taste. Many persons fail to enjoy their homes for the same reason. They always find more needs that can not be filled than pleasures to enjoy. Nothing, in short, gives them true enjoyment for any length of time. One of the most frequent causes of dissatisfaction is fickleness of taste. Nothing seems of any value to some people after it is fairly in their grasp. The most beautiful gem afar off becomes a common pebble in their hands. A bird in the bush seems far more beautiful than one in the hand. Such people can never be happy until they learn to take pleasure in what they have. It is the small things of life, enjoyments of the hour, that make up the sum of human happiness. Those who do not find pleasures enough to be happy in the position in which they are placed, need seek no farther. In short, enjoyment comes from within; it is the disposition of the man, not his surroundings, that makes or mars his life. Put the discontented laborer, who complains against the law of Heaven that he should earn his bread by the sweat of his brow, in a palace, and he would still find cause for grumbling. There are not enough Mark Tapleys among us, who try to be cheerful under difficulties. What a pleasure it is to know happy people who make the best of every thing; people whose fires always burn brightly and cheerfully, and whose daily fare is thrice blessed because it is taken with a cheerful spirit.—N. Y. Tribune.

COLORS FOR BLONDES.

They Should Not Wear Pale Blue Nor Fear Rose Tints.

A long time ago people used to think that blue was essentially a color for blondes and angels. Nobody can dispute its being the color for angels, but it certainly is not the one to be chosen by a blonde. The fair skin looks cold enough, and when blue, especially pale blue, is put near it the effect given is undesirable, because what was clear white before becomes a pallor now. Blondes had much better wear any of the rose shades, bright scarlet, warm brown, or dark green, leaving the trying pale blue to the brown-haired lassie with a bright color, or the warm brunette whose skin does not know the unsightly touch of sallowness. Every body likes a rose-colored lining, and to be in vogue this season every body ought to have a rose-color frock—in cotton or wool, in silk or tulle, it is always most charitable in bringing out one's best features and toning one's worst. Combined with white the pink shades are as dainty as a bit of old china, and will suggest the pretty pink and white ladies whom Watteau painted on fans, who played at little Trianon with Marie Antoinette, laughed and jested and yet did not fear when they had to face death on the guillotine for the sake of the King and the Queen.

There is a curious "shot" silk that is gray and white, which the wise shopkeeper knows as being a fac-smile of the one worn by the beautiful Queen of France, and which, it is said, became hallowed by being assumed during the Reign of Terror, when life, love and every thing seemed going from her. The frou-frou of it to-day sounds as gay as it did in the long time ago. Will the wearer have such a life? Surely nobody will wish her a tragedy such as the Austrian went through.—Chicago Tribune.

—Quite a surprise came to Sam Cobb, of Madison, Fla. He found a wild turkey's nest, and in it were several eggs. He took them out, and as he was not to go home for several hours, he wrapped them in his coat and laid it on the bank of a creek where he was fishing. He was surprised shortly afterward to hear the chirp of a young turkey. He investigated, and found that one of the eggs had given forth a turkey; soon another followed, and so on, until he had quite a brood in his coat. They were carried home, but all soon after died.

—Those who go for rest to the fashionable summer resorts are lulled to slumber not only by the piano playing of the amateur, but by the music from the girl violinist, the girl cornetist, the flute player and the girl with the banjo. Bits of broken tunes float out of innumerable doors and windows, and there never was such a summer for musical variety.

GARNET AND TURQUOISE.

History and Description of Two Popular Precious Stones.

The garnet has many admirers. The brownish-red tint is caused by the oxide of iron which it contains. Some of them contain so much iron as to be attracted by a magnet. The color is that of claret or red wine, and is of different shades. When of a rich, deep color, and cut en cabochon (in raised form like the roundness of an egg), it is called carbuncle. Garnets of a fine quality are found in large quantities in the mines of Zobiitz, in Silesia. They are alao found in Piedmont, Siberia, Norway, India, Siam, Mexico and in this country. The finest garnet is the Oriental, or Syrian, the name coming from the Syrian, a river in Pegu, in Farther India.

Fine cameo have been cut in garnet. It was not a favorite with the Greeks, but was used very much in the later Roman times, especially in the imperial period. The Romans called the ruby the male, the garnet the female variety, and magical virtues were attributed to the latter. It was much used by the gem cutters of the Renaissance, who have left some magnificent works in this stone; modern artists have rarely used it. It is hard to work, and very brittle.

Garnets are not always shaded in red. They appear in brown, black, green and yellow. Colorless and white specimens have also been found. There is a coarse variety known as common garnet found in sufficient quantities to be used as a flux in the smelting of iron. It is the noble garnets, or the precious garnets, sometimes called Almadine, that are of great value. They are generally of a crimson-red color, sometimes of so deep a tint that jewelers hollow it out beneath, or place a plate of silver at the back of it. The cinnamon stone is said to be a garnet. There is a variety found in Siberia which is called the Grossularia, from its resemblance to a green gooseberry in form, size and color. Powdered garnets are often used for polishing and cutting other stones. The powder is known among lapidaries as red emery.

The turquoise, called in former times turkis or turkey stone, is a light blue stone, sometimes translucent, usually opaque. It is both oriental and occidental; the former is the best. It is found in reniform or stalacticic masses, never crystal. It comes from Persia, China, Arabia, Thibet, Silesia and Saxony, and has been found in our Western Territories. It is nearly one-half alumina, and strikes fire with steel. There is a bone or fossil turquoise found in Lanquedoc, France. It is called turquoise bricard, and is softer than the oriental.

In color the turquoise is white, blue and azure-blue and greenish-blue, but only the fine blue stones are prized. The color of the stone is subject to change, particularly if brought in contact with musk, camphor or other scents, and with acids, but some ancient stones are in existence that have not changed color.

The turquoise is not very expensive unless of large size and fine color. It is the stone most frequently used by the Orientals for amulets, sentences from the Koran being engraved on them. They also ornament pipes, dagger hilts, girdles, etc., with them.

Only a few ancient engraved turquoises are known; they are in cameo and busts, and not in intagli. In ancient times the stone was thought to bring health and good fortune to the wearer, and many occult virtues were ascribed to it. De Boot, who wrote in 1609, states that no gentleman thought himself properly attired in his time without wearing a fine turquoise. Singular to say, he adds, that the ladies did not wear them. In mediæval times it was supposed to change color as the state of health of its owner changed.—Keystone.

Her Estimate of Damages.

"Had an accident here this morning?" queried the breathless reporter, as a matronly lady appeared at the door in response to his violent ringing.

"Yes, we did. You see, the next house comes right up to ours, and the man painting it asked to come through our house and crawl out the scuttle onto its roof. Well, I let him. When he crossed the garret he fell through the floor—"

"Hurt him much?"

"Yes, I guess so. But he didn't stop with the garret; he fell through the next floor, tore a hole through the carpet, knocked the plastering off the ceiling and, oh, he just made an awful muss!"—Texas Siftings.

Looking Before Leaping.

Lady—I wish you would call at the office of Mr. Oldrich, 999 Fashion avenue, contrive to have some conversation with the venerable gentleman, and so far as you are able examine into his physical condition. I desire to know how long he is likely to live?

Physician—Certainly. Are you his wife?"

Lady—No, but I have a chance to be.—N. Y. Weekly.

The Funny Man Again.

Uncle Zeb—There is no fun in that

George—What is it?

"Why, here it says:

"'Wheat, 70 to 75, small demand.

"'Oats, 35 to 37, upward tendency.

"'Corn, 32 to 33, variable.'"

"Why, that's a market report."

"It is? Blamed if I didn't think it was another of those funny dialogues."—Epoch.

Something in It.

Brown—That's a handsome pocket-book.

Robinson—Yes, it's a birthday present from my wife.

Brown—Did she put any thing in it before she gave it to you?

Robinson—O, yes, the unpaid bill for the pocket-book was in it.—Munsey's Weekly.

A Fair Average Cost.

Mrs. Cumso—You've seen those Dollar Dinner Bills-of-Fare in the household magazines?

Mrs. Fangle—Yes; I got one up the other day.

"How much did it cost you?"

"Three dollars and a half."—Puck.

GERMAN STUDENT LIFE.

The Graduate an Expert Duelist, With a Great Capacity For Beer.

The difference in tone between the American college and a German university is very great. The universal dueling spirit is a slight index. It is hardly possible for a German student to go through the course without fighting a duel, often several. He is ostracised and life made a burden for him if he refuses. This practice is a trifle more elevated and genteel than fist fighting, but springs from the same semi-barbarous love of brutal physical encounters and the sight of blood.

A student rudely jostles another, treads on his foot or applies to him some insulting phrase to provoke a challenge to a duel, which challenge the other is bound to give. If the needed supply can not be kept up in this manner, then the different secret societies designate certain of their members to fight with those chosen by other societies, just as the Spaniards arrange for a bull fight. The combatants have their eyes, necks, breasts and arms protected, so that the wound is generally received on the left temple or cheek. Occasionally an ear or a nose is laid open for variety, but the wounds, though bloody and ugly, are seldom serious. What to an American student would be a great cause of regret is to a German a matter of intense pride, that is to have his face so scarred that it looks like a checkerboard, and the more scars he has the prouder he is. The natural result of this custom is that the sword in the hands of Germans is mightier than the pen, and in their quarrels instead of shedding seas of ink through the papers they fight a duel. This is such an evil in the army that the old Kaiser issued an order forbidding duels under penalty, but it is often evaded.

But the worst evil is the almost universal excessive drinking of beer, or kneiping, as it is called. A number of students get together in a saloon or some private room at about nine in the evening, and spend the time till midnight, and often till two or three in the morning, singing, telling stories and drinking as much beer as they can hold. I should say that six big schooners of beer would be a minimum, and a number will drink fourteen to fifteen. They don't get positively drunk on beer, but they are so saturated with it that they are little better than stupid beasts, and the next day have a headache and are generally used up. On peculiarly festal occasions wine is substituted for beer, and some of them do get drunk and uproariously so. Intoxication is not a common vice, nor is it in England and America, but there are very few German students, I fancy, who have not, at some time, been drunk, and they have no hesitation in telling about it, while in American colleges such men are rare exceptions, the drinking men being found in other walks in life. The natives can stand this sort of thing for a long time without perceptible effects, but an American can't. A German will drink till his head is so large that he has to use a shoe-horn to get his hat on, and yet appear in class the next day, while an American will be laid up. Some of the best German students follow this sort of amusement for several semesters and keep up their health and class work. Americans try it, and either become thoroughly dissipated or contract habits that ruin them after they get home, and should they not become actually dissipated there is apt to be a decided lowering of the standard of gentlemanly conduct. If a father wishes his son to spend Sunday at a shooting match or a horse race and to pass the evening fanning himself in tobacco smoke, making a beer-vat of himself, singing obscene songs and playing cards with a money stake he will find superior advantages in this line at a German school. Some may prefer to finish their education in a less pronounced style.—Chicago Journal.

BISMARCK'S PIPE.

An American's Memento of the Iron Chancellor's School Days.

"This is all that I have left of a pipe which Bismarck used in his school days."

The speaker was Judge J. Gadsden King, who leaned far back in his easy office chair as he spoke and held up in his hand a plain cherry pipe stem about a foot long.

"How did I come into possession of it?" the judge said, repeating my question.

"It was in this way. You see my brother, Mitchell C. King, went to school with Bismarck when he was a student at Dr. Becker's famous school at Frankfort-on-the-Main. They were class-mates and room-mates—altogether very intimate friends. Now, when they were about to leave college they exchanged pipes—for you know every German student has his pipe. Well, Mitchell brought the pipe which the future Chancellor gave him in exchange for his own to America with him, and it fell into my hands, for I am a great smoker.

"The pipe," Judge King continued, "was quite a pretty one. The bowl was made of fine china and had a cameo likeness of Bismarck on the front of it. The stem was about twice as long as it is now, for it has been trimmed very often.

"Mitchell and Bismarck were very warm friends and corresponded with each other for years; in fact, they do now, I think. Some time ago somebody wrote Bismarck a letter, asking him if he knew anybody on this side of the water. He replied that he knew and corresponded with two men in the United States—one was Mitchell C. King and the other Dr. Emory Coffin, of Aiken, S. C. Mitchell, my brother, is now seventy-six years old and is living at Flat Rock, N. C.

"How old is the stem?" I asked.

"Well, it's hard to say," the judge replied. "Let me see. Mitchell brought it over with him in 1835; that makes it fifty-five years old, and I don't know how old it was then. It is an interesting memento, and I prize it very highly," the judge concluded, as he laid it carefully away in one of his desk drawers, and turned to pick up his everyday pipe, which he had laid aside while holding the stem of Bismarck's school-day pipe in his hand.—Atlanta Journal.

GOD'S PROVIDENCE.

A Belief That Helps the Unfortunate to Bear Their Burdens Nobly.

Nothing so helps the unfortunate to bear their burdens as a belief that those burdens are a part of the providence of the world and come to them with purpose and design, and, although not easy to bear now, have a future benefit not only to themselves, but to the whole universe at large. This belief begets a spirit of humility which in itself gives the strength to bear more than half of the hard load, for with its coming departs all that defiance, all that fighting with fate, which is as useless as it is desperate. And with the willing spirit of humility comes also a capacity for reliance and trust, for dependence on supreme and fatherly care, that makes all pain seem lighter than it could seem otherwise, and that gives one all the satisfaction that the little child has when sobbing out its grief after any hurt upon a mother's breast. It is a tremendous thing for one to possess this sense of the fatherhood and providence of the power that rules the universe; one who has it fully ceases to struggle, rests in the divine arms, and no matter what deprivation, effort, loss or sorrow comes, that person remains satisfied with the divine will, sees the sun behind the shadow, feels that grief and trouble are temporary but better things are eternal, and finds it easier to endure with that help, as if one were carried over on strong wings.

But one who does not possess this faith in God's providence has the woes of the world, so far as they affect one's self, to carry all alone, has to fight with the sun in the face, has a burden under which the giants of old would have staggered. The folly and futility of the effort are as certain as if one undertook to make a world one's self, or to hold it in correlation with the other worlds. It ends either in stony indifference that has its consequence in an equal indifference to pleasure and satisfaction, so that if one no longer suffers, neither does one any longer enjoy, or else in madness. The moment that the effort is surrendered comes peace, comes absolute abandonment of all one's self-reliance and resistance, comes complete surrender to the all-surrounding power, in which alone is recompense for trouble or hope of relief. They that disbelieve in God's providence are no wiser than they that believe in it, they themselves openly declare that they do not believe because they do not know, and meantime knowledge is wisdom, and they certainly are no happier. Thus it seems self-evident that in the beginning of misfortune to be able to experience not only non-resistance and submission to fate, but acquiescence and loving trust, is the part of religion and duty, to be sure, but that it is also, in view of its capacity of producing comfort and happiness, the part of worldly wisdom also.—Harper's Bazar.

A MUSCULAR HEN.

She Vanquishes Biddy and Adopts a Family of Kittens.

At Stafford Springs, Conn., a determined old hen wanted to sit. Her owner removed her eggs, whereupon in querulous mood she quit her nest and blustered about the homestead, finding a great deal of fault with life. While she was doing that the family cat discovered her artistically wrought and rounded nest, curled upon it and deposited live kittens in it. Then biddy came back, pitched into pussy, fairly drove her off the nest, flew in and sat down on the kittens, evidently inferring they were a new kind of chickens, she had hatched in a moment of mental abstraction. For a day or two the hen brooded away and the unhappy cat stalked about the premises watching for an opportunity to get back her own. At the end of three days the hen had to quit the old stand for food and water, and promptly the cat slipped into the nest and taking the kittens one by one by the cuff of the neck, transported them all to the distant part of the hay-mow.

Then came biddy home again. When she found the fledgings flown she raised another noisy row all about the farm. She looked alow and aloft vainly for awhile, for the missing brood, and finally found them ranged like pegs, on a telegraph pole arm alongside the parent cat. Again another battle and the old cat had to fly from the furious hen pecking, but she took along one kitten in her teeth, while the hen held the field of battle, and four feline spoils. With the kitten in her teeth the cat scaled a high scaffold and made for herself a new home, with her one offspring by her side. The old hen is still encamped on the rest of the kittens in the new-made nest. She lays not, neither does she cackle, but it really looks as if she was going to bring up the four kits in spite of all drawbacks and setbacks. The Stafford Springs man has watched the proceedings impartially, but with interest, and he fancies he is proprietor of the only case of cat and hen abduction and reabduction. Who can beat this novel sight?—Ohio Farmer.

How to Stop Hiccoughs.

Hiccough is produced by a spasmodic twitching of the diaphragm. If it happens when a person is just breathing in, it produces a sort of guttural noise. If the person has strength of will enough he can take hold of his diaphragm and hold it down, that is, by taking a deep breath the diaphragm is contracted so that it can not contract any more. The spasms of hiccough occur in rhythmical order, once in so many seconds. Ascertain the length of the interval and then about five seconds before it is time for the hiccough, take a deep breath deliberately and slowly, and hold it until you have passed two periods. This will break up the rhythm. Frightening a person has the same effect and explains the philosophy of that mode of cure. Hiccough is usually due to irritation or some other disturbance of the stomach. Remove the cause and break up the habit.—Dr. J. H. Kellogg.

He Never Went to College.

FRIDAY OCTOBER 3 1890

County Official Paper.

By ways best known to corrupt politicians a rascal was made a Judge in San Francisco. Of course, on the first opportunity that offered, this unprincipled Judge perverted the law and and rendered unjust judgment. James A. Barry, editor of the "Star" exposed the wrong and criticised the corrupt Judge. He was arrested, fined $500 and sentenced to the common jail for five days. No trial was offered him, no opportunity afforded him to defend himself before a jury. On appeal the Supreme Court sustained the action of the Court below. All the Courts, high and low, will stand by each other in all acts of usurpation, no matter how arbitrary. Under the forms of free institutions the grossest tyrrany may be perpetrated by scoundrels, who by lying, bribery and every kind of corruption contrive to get elected Judges. The Bench is the last resource of tyrrany in the United States if the tools of tyrrany can be seated there. No man with even the slightest taint of want of honor; of want of moral principle, of want of love of truth and justice, should ever be seated in the chair which ought to be the throne of justice. The wrong inflicted upon Mr. Barry has raised a storm of indignation in San Francisco that may lead to the election of better men as Judges.

England, France and Germany are loud and violent in their protests against the passage by Congress of the McKinly bill. This bill is framed for the benefit of the American, and not for the benefit of those foreign nations. During the War of the Rebellion the ruling classes of those nations showed their bitter hostility to the United States and they do not deserve any consideration from us now. The McKinley bill, as it will benefit us, should become a law no matter how it may affect them. All the interests of California are well protected in the bill, particularly, wines, fruits, barley and beet sugar. Those who deny the bill are not friends to their own State and their opposition is entirely factious.

Jos. Seely was appointed Guardian of Oren, Albert H. and Mary A. Johnson, minors Geo. H. Palmer, E. H. Edwards and J. J. Stewart were appointed appraisers of the estate.

BORN.

VAUGHN—At Citus, Sept. 24th, to Mr. and Mrs. W. Vaughn, a son.

Get registered. Your time will soon be up.

Camp Independence school opened on Monday.

The King of Holland is on the point of death.

The fair is over and no one wears an ocular ornamentation.

Judge Hannah intends to leave here next week for Ventura.

But very little fall pasture has been let to sheepmen this year.

Fresno County has fifty thousand acres in raisin vineyards.

Register C. W. Craig took possession of the Land Office last Wednesday.

Frank Fitzgerald and family returned from a visit to Los Angeles last week.

The population of San Francisco is 297,990, an increase of 64,031 in ten years.

Miss Maud Cook has gone to Hawthorne on a visit to her sister, Mrs. Julia Church.

Mrs. Noteware, the lady injured in the runaway at Carson last week, died on Monday.

The card of Walter A. Lamar as candidate for District Attorney will be found in this issue.

The Supervisors meet this evening to to establish, consolidate and abolish election precincts.

A surveyor reports a tree 650 feet high growing near the base of Mount Tacoma, Washington.

The Stevens Ditch Company Directors have levied an assessment of 35 cents per share. See notice.

A horse belonging to Lem Baxter was very severely stung by bees a few days ago at Ezra Goodale's ranch.

Miss Sophie Rhine and her brother, Mr. Henry Rhine, left town yesterday morning for San Francisco.

A copy of the Democratic State and County ticket will be found in the advertising columns this week.

C. Mulholland went to Bishop on Thursday to attend a meeting of the Republican executive committee.

Thanks are due Messrs Castro and Celayo for a delightful serenade at; the conclusion of the ball last Saturday morning

On the night of the fair ball a salmon pink crochet shawl was lost in the pavilion. Finder will please return to this office.

A. J. Davis intends going to mining soon and all persons wanting repairs in the shoe and boot line should bring in their work immediately.

Will Yancy spent a pleasant week in San Francisco on his recent trip below with the forger, Alcorn. He returned home last Monday.

Frank P. Slavin, the Australian heavyweight easily defeated Joe McAuliffe of San Francisco on two rounds before the Ormonde Club in London last Saturday.

A. R. Conklin, Esq, will be the representative of the Masonic Lodge at Independence at the approaching meeting of the Grand Lodge of California.

There are no end of quail in the valley this year. The stubble fields are full of them. There has been very little hunting as yet and sport should be excellent.

Mr. J. Mairs is a candidate for Road Overseer for Independence. Mr. Mairs is deeply interested in keeping roads in repair and if elected promises to do his duty.

Already a considerable quantity of new snow has fallen on the high Sierras, which will remain till next summer. An excellent water season may be confidently expected.

J. J. Gunn and Arthur Smith have gone to Modock to look after mining interests they have there. In all probability work will soon be resumed on the Minnietta mine.

The list of premium awards will be found in this issue. As the list is a long one some errors may occur which will be corrected on application of the parties interested.

It affors the people of Independence great pleasure that the visitors from Bishop and Round Valley who attended the fair expressed themselves well pleased with the treatment they received here.

About the middle of last week John Auton was lifting a heavy piece of iron at Lookout. A severe pain darted through him and he fell helpless. He was nearly forty miles from Keeler where a messenger was sent who called Doctor Bunting by wire from Lone Pine. The Doctor went as rapidly as possible and did what he could to alleviate the suffering of his patient. Mr. Auton is reported to be improving.

Wind-Up.

A very close race was the last half mile dash, starters Hayseed, Pickpocket and Brown Frank. From start to finish all three of the riders could have touched each other with their whips. Hayseed's nose appeared to be about four inches longer than Pickpocket's when they passed under the wire. Frank's head was between the saddle and girths of the other two horses. Whips and spurs were vigorously from first jump to last.

The last race of the fair was trotting, mile heats. There were but two starters, Allen's Andy and Mulholland's Fred. Mr. J. M. Horton drove Andy and Mulholland drove his own horse. Fred distanced Andy and this ended the race. Time, 2:24.

The protest entered by S. P. Smith against the decision of the judges in the race where his horse was beaten by Hayseed, was withdrawn and the judgment accepted.

State Senator.

Mr. Charles E. Sherman of Bakersfield arrived at Independence last Friday and has since made a tour of Owens Valley. Mr. Sherman is the Republican candidate for State Senator for the District of which Inyo County is a part. He thoroughly understands what should be done in the Legislature for Inyo and knows how to work for that end. If elected, he will try hard to serve us well. We need a bright man in the Senate and Mr. Sherman fills the bill.

Suicide.

On Monday of last week Almond Huntoon committed suicide by shooting himself through the head. Deceased was a well known citizen of Mono County. At one time he was in easy circumstances, but lost all in the Bodie boom. The "Chronicle Union" says he had been sick and despondent for many years and the manner of his death was not wholly unexpected. He killed himself in his brother's barn.

Notice of Sale.

For Sale.

The ranch known as the "Rittgers place" near Lone Pine is offered for sale together with the the farming implements and stock. The ranch contains 320 acres of excellent land. The stock consists of thirty head of cattle and twelve brood mares. There is now sixty tons of hay on the place and feed enough to winter 200 head of stock. The winter pasture is rented for five years at $300 a year. The soil is a rich loam and excellently adapted to vegetable raising. There is plenty of outside range, making it a good stock ranch. For further particulars address

The Elizabethan Age.

The circumstances of the Elizabethan age favored unity of style. The language, to begin with, had recently been remade under the influence of new ideals and new educational systems. Far more than lapse of years and wastes of desolating warfare separated Sixteenth century English from the speech of Chaucer. The spirit itself which shapes language to the use of mind had changed through the action of quickening conceptions and powerfully excited energies. And to this change in the spirit the race was eagerly responsive. In a certain way all writers felt the Bible—Greece, Rome, Italy, France, Germany; all strove to be in tune with the new learning. At the same time criticism was hardly in its cradle; you find a trace of it in Jonson, Bacon, Selden, Camden; but it does not touch the general. The people were anything but analytical, and poetry issued from the very people's heart, as melody from the strings of the violoncello. The spontaneity which we have already noted as a main mark of the Elizabethan utterance led thus to unity of style. The way in which classical masterpieces were then studied conduced to the same result. Those perennial sources of style were enjoyed in their entirety, absorbed, assimilated, reproduced with freedom. They were not closely scrutinized, examined with the microscope, studied with the view of emphasizing this or that peculiarity a single critic found in them. And the same holds good about contemporary foreign literatures. Everything which these literatures contained was grist for the English mill; not models to be copied, but stuff to be used.—J. A.

About
HALE'S
$2-50 Shoes!

It is not everywhere that you can get a FULL CALF shoe for $2.50. It costs too much—cuts too deep into the profits for ordinary shoe dealers to handle them.

There is but one place in the State where you are sure of getting just such a shoe for your money. This advertisement is intended to tell you that place.

Hale's $2 50 Shoe is made of solid calf, tanned to meet the requirements of our California climate. The workmanship is thorough and lasting. The shapes are neat and pleasing to the eye as well as easeful to the feet. Such a shoe as we have described is commonly sold for $3.00 or more. Its worth shows in its wear. We have it in the following styles:

Hook and lace—Plain French toe; London toe, with tip.
Congress gaiters—Plain French toe; London toe, with tip.
Button shoe—Plain French toe; London toe, with tip.

A RURAL ROMANCE.

(SOMEWHAT IN THE LINE OF LORD TENNYSON'S PASTORAL POEMS, ONLY DIFFERENT.)

Two honest husbandmen dwelt side by side
In farms adjoining. Grubbs and Stubbs their names.
Rough, homely names in sooth; but all they had,
And oft those names had served them in good stead
When they had need of names to sign to notes
Grubbs had a son Ezekiel tall and staunch
As any rustic who wore pants in boots,
And rose at four to milk his seven kine
And seek for eggiets in the hennery.
Stubbs had no sons; a daughter only came
To bless her father's home, to shed sunligh
About its rooms and eke to do odd chores
'Twixt meal times. She was fair to look upon
As snowdrops blossoming in early spring.
Her name was Mary Ann, a gentle name,
And gently borne by her. Ezekiel saw
And loved her, whom to see and love were one.
The farms adjoined and were but kept apart
By one plain picket fence of easy compass,
Through which the faithful dog of Farmer Stubbs
Did oft meander in the eventide
To chase the dogs of worthy Farmer Grubbs.
Thus was a feud begun between the twain;
But Mary Ann and young Ezekiel too
Were not a part of the parental strife.
Equal their fathers' lots; content were they
To know that when some day the old men hopped
The golden twig, the farms should be united,
A goodly estate for a goodly pair.

But one day came a shadow o'er their paths.
A schemer from the town intruded on
The peaceful confines of the Grubbs estate,
Looked here, dug there and sniffed and snuffed about,
Saying wiseacrely, with shake of head:
"There's oil upon this land, of that I'm sure.
Oil that is pent up in a mighty store.
Dig, farmer, and I'll warrant thee thou'lt find Riches, the like which thou wotst not of."
So he departed. Then good Farmer Grubbs
Did hold his head aloft and elevate
His nose when neighbors passed, as who should say:
"I shall be rich. There's oil on this, my land,
And wealth immense shall speedily be mine."
So when Ezekiel came and softly said:
"Father, I fain would wed with Mary Ann,"
He waxed full wroth, exclaiming in his wrath:
"How now? thou who, when we have dug for oil,
Shalt be a man of riches; wilt thou wed
This beggar's brat, this pauper farmer's child?
Go to! It shall not be."

And so the son
Went sorrowingly to tell his Mary Ann
And break the match, explaining as he might
That he so rich must look above poor her.

Then there was digging on the Grubbs estate,
Digging in day time, boring in the night
For oil, rich oil, that was to make them rich.
For days and weeks and months they dug and bored.
What came of it? Nothing, nothing, ever nothing.
Then came the city schemer, and he looked
About the place exclaiming: "Marvelous!
Behold the vein of oil that once lay here
Has vanished and has made its oily way
Beneath yon fence to Farmer Stubbs' estate.
His is the oil well; yours the memory of it."
So saying he vanished, and Ezekiel wept.

That night he hied him unto Mary Ann,
And told her that his love had never ceased,
Besought her take him back and let no oil,
No sordid, oleaginous obstacle
Disturb the dream, the golden dream of love.
She said him nay and mocked him.

So he went
Kicking himself adown the dusty lane.
Then Farmer Stubbs set cheerily to work,
And in a few weeks' time struck oil right rich.
A fortune rolled in and his wealth became
So vast that all around marveled thereat.
So Stubbs waxed wealthy, and so Mary Ann,
Her father's heiress, grew accustomed to
Ezekiel's loss and married very soon
A foreign nobleman with heavy bills
Which Mary Ann's papa paid willingly.

So read and learn that we can never tell
Who that is down to-day may not be up
To-morrow, and who down that now is up.

—Harry B. Smith, in America.

AN ACCEPTABLE OFFER.

Story of an Old-Fashioned Donation Party.

"IS THIS all we've got for dinner?" said Leslie Bernard, rather dolefully.

"Isn't it enough?" retorted Clara, her sister.

The dining-room in Glenwood Parsonage was unmistakably shabby. It was bad enough when the friendly gloom of a rainy day concealed its shortcomings in some degree. But on a clear, uncompromising August noon like this, the cruel sunshine revealed each crack in the ceiling, and every worn spot in the carpet like a magnifying-glass.

And really there was some occasion for the doleful look with which Leslie regarded the table. There was the extreme shank bone of a ham boiled into rags, a few slices of cold beef, some baked potatoes, and a custard that certainly had not been rendered indigestible by too much richness of material. There were the remains of yesterday's stew, half a cold apple pie, and a plate of home-made pickles; and around this meal gathered four little Bernards, with ravenous eyes, while Harry, the eldest brother, who had been doing some amateur white-washing, was making a hasty toilet in the sink-room; and the two grown sisters superintended the banquet.

Mr. Bernard was engaged in writing his next Sunday's sermon, and his wife was at a neighbor's house, helping to nurse a cross old woman, who had worn out everybody's patience but her own.

"Enough, I suppose," said Leslie, "but not very appetizing. Now, is it?"

"Poor folks have no business to expect appetizing food," said Clara, shortly. "In fact I don't think they have any business to live at all. Davy, take your fingers out of the sugar-bowl. Ida, sit up straight."

"Why, Clara, what's the matter?" said Leslie, gently, moving the bowl of sugar out of young David's reach, and helping to perpendicularize the small Ida in her chair.

"Oh! I don't know," replied Clara; "I'm cross."

"No need to tell us that," observed Harry, seating himself. "It is one of the very few facts patent to all observers. Where is father?"

"It's that donation party," said Clara, with an impatient, backward toss of her auburn hair.

"Eh?" said Harry.

"I hate donation parties!" cried out Clara, recklessly carving the end of ham into unctuous shavings. "I think they're an insult to people. So, there!"

Harry whistled; Leslie smiled; the children all stared.

"If they want to do papa a favor," went on Clara, breathlessly, loading up the children's plates with all sorts of incongruous materials, "why don't they pay him his salary, instead of letting it run behind? Why don't they repair this dismal hole of a parsonage, and stop the church chimney from smoking, and do what they ought to do? Who wants Mrs. Hampton to bring us a chair tidy, and Squire Ramsey to sort out all his damaged beans for our benefit, and Annie Smith to work horrible pen-wipers for us? We're not objects of charity yet, are we?"

"Hush, Clara," soothed Leslie.

"It's the custom, sis," said Harry. "I can't say that I quite uphold it myself; but hush, here comes father."

Mr. Bernard was a mild old gentleman, with a bald head and spectacles, who sat down to his meal in an absent sort of way, as if his mind were somewhat in Syro-Phœnicia. The children might easily have continued their discussion and he would have been none the wiser.

Clara Bernard was twenty years old. She was not a beauty, nor was she remarkably talented; but she had a round, fresh face, with hazel eyes, and warm red-brown hair; and there was a deal of common-sense in her make-up.

Leslie was the family beauty—a pink and white Dresden china little creature—and Clara had it fully settled that Leslie was to make a brilliant match, while she, Clara, was to settle down into the monotony of old maidism. But there were some things that she would have liked different, and the coming donation party weighed very heavily upon her soul. It was supposed to be a surprise to the minister and his wife. Clara, Leslie and Harry had, however, been let into the secret as a sort of necessary preliminary.

"I wish," said Leslie thoughtfully, "that Mrs. Hays would think to give us a new sitting-room carpet. Ours is worn through to the very boards of the floor; and she has just recarpeted her own house with real Brussels."

"She will give you a bunch of paper-roses, you will see," scornfully retorted Clara.

"The Hamptons are rich," said Harry. "Little mother would appreciate a sewing-machine from Mrs. Hampton, now wouldn't she?"

Clara shrugged her shoulders.

"I can tell exactly what Mrs. Hampton means to give us," said she. "One of those book-marks that her granddaughter worked, or a splatter-worked tidy. Oh, Harry, if you only knew how I hated all this!"

Toward dusk the presents began to come in. Mrs. White sent a jug of coal-oil, Deacon Jones brought a bag of walnuts ("just as if the woods weren't full of them," said Clara, contemptuously). Minnie Brown brought a chair-tidy, Miss Kiser contributed a staring chromo, the Widow Jackson a bag of rancid hen's feathers, Charlie Young a setting of duck's eggs. It was planned to fill the back kitchen with gifts of this nature, and to display them all at once to the minister and his wife, as a "surprise."

"Sister," piped little Ida, "here's a chair from Mrs. Forrest!"

Leslie groaned.

"Its the old chair that stood all last summer on her porch," said she. "Painted over and glued up. But it won't last a month."

"Mrs. Forrest all over," said Clara. "At this rate we shall be rich."

It was nearly dark when Norman Arlington came in. Clara was emptying a paper of yeast cakes which old Mrs. Harrington had sent. Old Mrs. Harrington had been very sick that summer, and both Mr. Bernard and his wife had kept many a faithful vigil at her side. Naturally, she wished to show her appreciation of all this. Yeast cakes were a penny a piece at the village store, and she had sent half a dozen of home manufacture. Norman Arlington was a tall, straight, young man, with black eyes, and a quiet, earnest way with him. He came in with a bag over his shoulder. Clara eyed him antagonistically.

"Well," said she.

"You're going to have a donation party here to-night, they tell me?" said Norman.

"Yes sir," answered Clara.

There was a warning flash in Clara's eyes.

"I thought I would come in early—before the commotion began," said he.

She laughed scornfully.

"The commotion is here now," said Clara.

"Clara!"

"Yes, Mr. Arlington."

"Would you be offended if I were to offer you—"

"Yes, I would," broke out Clara, reddening to the very roots of her hair. "I don't want it! It's an insult! Carry it back home, whatever it is, and please—please don't think that because I have the misfortune to be a minister's daughter, that—"

Norman's black eyes glittered, half with fun, half with vexation.

"Clara," said he, "you are a little vixen! Won't you hear me out?"

"Is it buckwheat flour?" said Clara, indignantly eying the bag, "or is it black-eyed beans? Because we've got a plenty of both, thank you all the same."

"The bag is not intended for you," said Norman. "It is on its way to Dr. Holmes, full of castor beans. I couldn't put my offering into a bag nor pack it in a box. It's too big."

"Nobody wants your offering," retorted Clara.

Norman put the bag on a chair and took both Clara's little hands in his.

"Are you quite sure of that?" said he. "Dear little Clara, don't look so cross at me. I came here to offer you myself, and I don't propose to go away until you have said either yes or no. I know you are cross; but I can't help risking it. Clara, I can't live any longer in suspense. I love you in spite of all the scoldings you give me, and I want to marry you. Come, Clara, is it yes or no?"

Clara blushed redder than any rose. She made an instinctive movement to slip out of the room, but Norman intercepted her and placed his back composedly against the door.

"I MUST LET HIM IN," PLEADED CLARA.

"No," said he, "there's no escape for you until I get my answer."

"YOU'RE GOING TO HAVE A DONATION PARTY HERE."

At that moment there came a prodigious knocking at the door.

"It's Squire Dixon," gasped Clara, "with a gallon can of kerosene oil!"

"I don't care if it is a cargo of dynamite!" said Norman. "Is it yes?"

"I must let him in," pleaded Clara.

"Is it no?"

"And there is Dr. Gibson's gig, with a bundle of broom-corn and a basket of Hubbard squashes! Do let me go, Norman!"

"Not one step, until my fate is decided!"

Clara darted a shy glance at him from under her long lashes. Apparently she was meditating a rebellion; but a second knocking of persistent knuckles at the door decided the question.

"They will knock in the panels!" said she. "Yes, Norman—yes! Only let me open the door."

But even then Norman would not suffer her to open the door until he had taken a very deliberate and satisfactory kiss. "You are a little darling," said he. "And I knew I should conquer you in time."

The Squire and the doctor came in, but Norman had taken himself and his bag of castor beans off through the open window.

"Any thing wrong with the fastenin's o' this 'ere door?" said the Squire, gruffly.

"I—I couldn't get the barrel of apples out of the way," said Clara, coloring very red.

The donation party came triumphantly off that night. Apples and salt pork, patch-work quilts and many tidies were received. The minister made a speech of thanks. Mrs. Bernard wondered how much would be left of her best china dishes and worn carpets before the company was gone. But through it all Clara seemed to walk on rose-colored clouds. Nothing put her out. All the irritation was gone from her heart; and Leslie, watching her with a smile, said to herself: "Dear Clara, so it has come at last. The enchanted prince has ridden up to the castle gates and set her free. I am so glad!"

ESTELLA G. MORRIS.

People Who Are Afraid of Death.

Another remarkable fact is that people who attempt suicide and fail are almost always afraid to die. When I was a young doctor in a hospital we used to sometimes play pranks on men brought in who had a tendency to kill themselves. I recall a very interesting case which happened not long ago. A man was carried into the institution who had attempted twice in one day to commit suicide.

"'Let us see,' said I to another physician, 'how badly this man wants to die.'

"I handed him a harmless mixture, of which he gave the man a good dose. I turned quickly around, snatched the bottle out of his hand and said, so that the would be suicide could hear me:

"'My God, doctor, you have killed that man. Get the stomach pump at once.'

"The man, who only a few hours before had tried to take his own life, instantly became scared to death at the thought of losing it. He begged like a good fellow to be saved. I have never known it to be otherwise that if a person fails to take his own life he is afraid to lose it by accident."—Interview in New York Star.

Medicine in Vegetables.

The New York Herald says the following information may be useful to some, if not now to many: Spinach has a direct effect upon the kidneys. A common dandelion used as greens is excellent for the same trouble. Asparagus purges the blood. Celery acts admirably upon the nervous system and is a cure for rheumatism and neuralgia. Tomatoes act upon the liver. Beets and turnips are excellent appetizers. Lettuce and cucumbers are cooling in their effect upon the system. Onions, garlic, leeks, olive and shallots, all of which are similar, possess medicinal virtue of a marked character, stimulating the circulatory system, and the consequent increase in the saliva and the gastric juice promoting digestion. Red onions are an excellent diuretic, and the white ones are recommended to be eaten raw as a remedy for insomnia. A soup made from onions is regarded by the French as an excellent restorative in debility of the digestive organs.

The Number of Our Ancestors.

To one who has not thought upon the subject, it is quite inconceivable how rapidly a person's lineal ancestors multiply every generation he carries back the calculation. If one is asked how many great-great-grandfathers he had, he will, in all likelihood answer: "two," while in reality he had eight, if there have been no intermarriages of relations among his ancestors. In fact, the number of male ancestors doubles every generation. Thus, every one has had two grandfathers, four great-grandfathers, eight great-great-grandfathers, sixteen great-great-great-grandfathers; and fifteen generations back, he had no less than sixteen thousand three hundred and eighty-four lineal male ancestors.—N. Y. Ledger.

MERIT DESERVES IT.

We are not in the habit of puffing up any patent medicine, but where merit deserves it we are always ready to notice the same particularly for the benefit of mankind. We have heard much of the fame of The Great Sierra Kidney and Liver Cure, but lately we have received positive proof of its healing qualities. A gentleman well known to us had suffered for years of kidney complaint. The Great Sierra Kidney and Liver Cure was recommended to him. He has given it a trial and now assures us that a wonderful change has come over him, and that he is entirely cured. Thanks to your great and scientific vegetable remedy.—Jewish Times and Observer, San Francisco, Cal.

LUCKY MRS. HOWARTH.

She Tells a Reporter How She Got Her Big Prize.

"Yes, I got my $15,000 Wednesday," said Mrs. Jane Howarth of 401 Central avenue, Kearny, to a Journal reporter who went to see her about the matter this morning.

Mrs. Howarth, who is a bright, pleasant faced woman, then told the whole story of the affair as follows:

"I have been purchasing tickets and parts of tickets in The Louisiana State Lottery for the past year. On July 8 I bought one-twentieth of ticket No. 92,561, paying one dollar for it. Of course as I did not expect to get much out of it, I did not fret much, but I had interest enough in the matter to make me keep my eyes open for the returns from the drawings. On July 15, however, you may believe I was made happy by the receipt of a notice informing me that I had won one-twentieth of the capital prize of $300,000. I then went to New York with my husband and placed my ticket in the hands of the agent of the Adams Express Company for collection, and on Wednesday, as I said before, I got my money and now have it placed away in a safe place."

"Did you ever win anything before?" queried the reporter.

"Yes, only last Christmas, I won an approximate prize of $5, and at other times small sums.

"I believe that the lottery is conducted fairly, for, if it was not, why should I get such a large sum of money for so little. They knew nothing about me or mine."

Since Mrs. Howarth's good luck has become known, she and her family have become very popular with their neighbors, although some of them envy her good luck.—Newark (N. J.) Journal, August 1.

A Wealthy New York Janitor.

Members of the firm of Drexel, Morgan & Co. and their chief clerks have a neat little lunch room in the basement of their buildings at the corner of Broad and Wall streets. This firm, together with that of Henry Clews & Co. and the Mercantile National, Continental and Broadway National banks, are supplied with dinners by a venerable colored man, James W. Mars, who has been in the business for twenty years and made a fortune out of it. Mars and his wife and three colored assistants manage to furnish two or three hundred men with lunch and take care of two buildings of which he is janitor, and he is reported to be worth $250,000.—New York Press.

In Massachusetts the birth rate of the native population is 18 per 1,000, while that of the foreign population is more than 54 per 1,000, which is considerably higher than that of any other country. The proportion of deaths among the foreign born, as compared with the natives, is one to three.

Mudie's great library in London has put into circulation since its foundation nearly 4,000,000 books. An annual ticket costs a guinea, and for this sum a diligent reader can peruse books that it would cost him about $1,000 to buy.

TAKE CARE! THERE IS DANGER

In allowing inactivity of the kidneys to grow through neglect. The deadly shoals of Bright's disease and diabetes will wreck the goodly bark of health if it is allowed to drift rudderless upon them. The bladder, too, if inactive, and judicious medication does not speedily direct the helm toward the port of safety, will be whelmed by the quicksand of disease. In selecting a diuretic, let your choice fall upon Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, which stimulates the renal organs without irritating and exciting them, two effects to be apprehended from the unmedicated stimuli largely resorted to. These have a tendency to react prejudicially. The Bitters invigorate the kidneys and bladder, in common with the nerves and the digestive organs, and so afford lasting aid. It also affords dual assistance in preventing and curing intermittent and remittant fever. Biliousness, constipation and rheumatism it also subjugates.

The person who never made a fool of himself is one who was spared that trouble by an overruling Providence. It is only they who stand that can fail.

MR. JOHN W. FURBUSH, An Army Veteran, OF WAKEFIELD,

who has probably suffered more than any man or woman in America to-day. Taken sick while in the Army, he has endured untold agonies since. Describing his first symptoms he said: "My head ached and my appetite was poor. I felt a faintness at the pit of the stomach, and bad taste in my mouth, while my skin was sometimes hot and sometimes cold. I next felt pains in my back and around the lower portion of my body, and noticed a peculiar odor and color in the water I passed, which was scanty at one time and free at others. Sometimes it pained me to void it, and again it was almost impossible to do so at all. Finally I began to pass clear blood accompanied with the greatest strain and agony."

No less than 20 eminent physicians attended Mr. Furbush at various times, but not one of them could help him. He was near death's door. And yet he says: "I am alive and well to-day, wholly through the wonderful power of Hunt's Remedy which took me from the verge of the grave."

This Great Remedy absolutely cures all Kidney, Liver and Urinary Diseases.

P. HINKLE'S PATENT CENTRIFUGAL ROLLER QUARTZ MILL

THIS cut shows the New Hinkle Centrifugal Quartz Mill, with plates and slummer. This is the only mill made that needs no oil for the inside working parts, as it is thoroughly lubricated with water, supplied from a circular tank, which is connected to the roller spindles, slides and drips by rubber hose. By this means oil cannot interfere with perfect amalgamation. Other features of superiority are: Simplicity of construction; the free discharge of pulp; the wearing parts are easily replaced at a small cost. The small amount of power required to run the mill will recommend it to all practical mill men, as well as the small cost of erection and transportation of mill to the mine. A 5-foot mill weighs 9,000 lbs.; pulverizers 38 in. diam.; run, 80 to 90 rev. per minute, with a capacity of 20 tons per day. This size mill costs $1,500. With Silver Plates, Slummer and Ore Feeder, $1,800.

P. HINKLE'S PATENT ORE FEEDER.

Positive Feed and Ready Adjustment.

IN this Improved Ore Feeder the falling tappet of the mill causes a backward movement of the feeding-tray. As the ore comes from the hopper on to the tray, a transverse bar prevents the ore moving backward, and a small portion of the ore is thus forced off the front edge of the feeding-tray into the battery. The amount of movement of the feeding tray may be regulated, thus regulating the feed of ore. This feeder can be arranged for roller mill or stamps. It is strong and durable, and feeds wet or dry ore in regular quantities.

SKULL DEVELOPMENT.

HOW TO "SIZE UP" YOUR FRIEND'S INTELLECTUAL POWERS.

Mental Caliber and Cranial Measurements. Mistakes of Peregrinating Phrenologists. Dr. Peterson's Talk on Recent Investigations.

Recently the scientists both in Europe and America have been giving a good deal of attention to the conformation and measurement of the human head or craniometry, as they call it.

The studies of Dr. Frederick Peterson, the insanity expert and specialist in nervous diseases, of New York, have been equally extensive. Their conclusions have been reached by accurate measurements and not by feeling bumps. Dr. Peterson said to me:

THE FRONTAL LOBES.

"In men noted for great attainments and intellectual capacity all the diameters and arcs of the skull are far above the normal averages. In other words, their heads are larger. In many criminals the diameters and arcs are below the normal average, and there is also great abnormality in shape, especially in hereditary criminals. One side of the head may be larger than the other, the forehead may retreat, or there may be some other lack of symmetry and proportion. Often the teeth, jaws and ears are deformed. All the higher mental faculties are located in the frontal lobes of the brain, and these naturally have a direct proportion to the length and breadth of the forehead. Just back of this region are the muscular centers and the centers for cutaneous sensation.

"Directly behind the ears and a little above are the centers for remembering that which is heard, and here are undoubtedly located some of the muscular faculties, for instance, the wonderful memory of musical compositions, such as was possessed by "Blind Tom." The memory of everything seen is stored away in the posterior lobes of the brain; therefore people of great perceptive power and who remember well all their perceptions will be found to have a large development on the back of the head. It has been noted that in people born blind this part of the head is smaller than it should be. In contradistinction to quack phrenology the perceptive power is located here in place of Gall's philoprogenitiveness and bump of amativeness. Gall located the perceptive power immediately over the eye, behind which is a cavity in the bone containing no brain.

"The average circumference of an adult man's skull is 20½ inches and of an adult woman's 19⅝ inches. The average length of the arc from the roof of the nose over the top of the head to the most prominent point on the back of the head is in man 12¾ inches and in the woman 12½. The average length of the arc from one ear to the other over the highest part of the head is in a man 12¾ inches and in a woman 12½. The average antero-posterior diameter, that is from the middle of the forehead in a straight line to the hindmost part of the head, is in a man 7 inches and in a woman 6¾. The average diameter through the widest part of a man's head, from side to side in a straight line, is 5¾ inches, and of a woman's head 5½ inches. These are only a few of the more important measurements taken.

"I never made less than seventeen measurements and three drawings of each head. But in the most careful studies sometimes from 30 to 130 separate arcs and diameters are measured. It will be seen that the head of a woman is on an average smaller than that of a man, just as her brain weighs several ounces less. While it may be taken as a general rule that a head of large dimensions is associated with unusual capacity in some one or other direction, it is, of course, not always the case. One can easily imagine, or may even have met with persons with large heads who seemed to enjoy considerable emancipation from the bonds of intellect; and one can readily conceive of much of their brain substance being replaced by more ordinary tissues or substances required to prevent the formation of a vacuum.

PACKING OF THE BRAIN.

"The skull bones may be twice as thick as usual, or there may be an unusual amount of fluid in the cavities of the brain and its coverings. Again, a person with a rather small head may have more thinking centers to the cubic inch of brain than the other; less fat, less water, less packing of every kind, as in the case of Gambetta, whose brain was rather small. The word 'packing' is an excellent one to use in this connection, for it describes the condition perfectly. Just as delicate china or glass vessels are packed away in sawdust, hay, etc., for shipping, so the fragile cells containing memories and thoughts are packed away in an enormous quantity of substance, known as connective tissue, which differs relatively little from hay and sawdust in structure as seen under the microscope, and which serves an equally efficient purpose. Hence an idiot is occasionally, though indeed rarely, seen with an unusually large head; but in the packing of his cranium valuable structures were left out by the thoughtless workmen, and only the hay and sawdust stowed away.

"Up to the age of 25 the development of a man's skull depends on his education, and, in fact, his entire environment. Subsequently the mind may develop a great deal, but the skull will not. From the age of 25 the skull retains the same proportion and the same dimensions, and it is on this account that certain measurements of the head become useful as a means of identification of adults. They may change their appearance in many respects, but cannot voluntarily alter the shapes of their heads. M. Bertillon has incorporated, therefore, certain skull diameters in his system of identification of criminals, now much employed in France, but as yet little in this country."

RECRUITING FOR HAREMS.

How the Girls Are Trained and Where They Are Taken From.

The Revue Britannique contains an article descriptive of the training of girls for harems. Their education is begun at a very early age, children of from seven to ten years being usually chosen for the purpose. The girls are then sent to a regular harem school, where they are educated and taught various accomplishments. Those intended for the Sultan's harem are taught music and French; if, however, as they grow older, they are found to be stupid or wanting in good looks, they are sold as slaves to the lower nobility. Girls from Persia and Afghanistan are in great demand, particularly from the latter country. Circassians generally supply the Turkish slave market, not only with their own children, but with girls who have been stolen in their infancy from Russia and the Roumanian provinces of Hungary. The Gypsies, it is stated, up to the present time entice young children away from their homes and travel with them to the market of Top Home, where there is a constant demand for good-looking girls. Some few years ago these thefts became so common that the Hungarian Government instituted an inquiry into the subject, and since then the trade has decreased, but it is still carried on secretly to a certain extent. One of the rules of the sultanic harem is that when a slave has reached the age of twenty-five and does not meet with the approval of the Sultan she is immediately removed and married to one of the court officials, whose taste is not consulted, but who acquiesces in the inevitable with truly Oriental indifference.

Very Appropriate.

A certain Young Men's Christian association recently invited a gentleman to deliver an address. He did so, and flattered himself that he made a good impression on the audience, but was somewhat taken aback when the chairman at the close of his address gave out the hymn: "Art thou weary, art thou languid, art thou sore oppressed?"—New York Tribune.

A WEALTHY INDIAN.

Old Splitlog of the Wyandottes Worth a Big Pile of Money.

I have just returned from a trip through Arkansas and Indian Territory, and in the course of my travels I met what I never expected to see in this world—a millionaire Indian. I had heard of this unique personage, but was not prepared to meet such a strange combination of opulence and ignorance. He is known as Matthias Splitlog, the chief of the Wyandotte tribe, and is a powerfully built man 5 feet 8 inches tall, with a swarthy countenance, but not the high cheek-bones usually found in the Indian. This is accounted for from the fact that Splitlog is a half-breed, having been born in Canada and afterwards adopted into the Wyandotte tribe in 1843, before its removal from Northern Ohio to the West. Splitlog is now seventy years old, and can not read or write. He speaks English imperfectly, but is a great money-getter, and is constantly growing richer by the advance upon the thousands of acres of land which he owns in Southwestern Missouri and the Indian Territory.

A story will give an idea of the old chief's manner of transacting business. About two years ago a syndicate of Kansas City capitalists persuaded him to part with 140 acres of land on the Kaw bottoms, between the two Kansas Citys, for $140,000. The trade was to be completed at one of the banks on Minnesota avenue, Kansas City, Kan., at ten o'clock on a certain morning. Promptly a few minutes before the time Splitlog walked into the bank and took a seat. He kept his eye on the clock, and as the hands pointed to the hour of ten, and the other party had not yet materialized, the chief put on his hat and started down the avenue. At a short distance he met the capitalists on their way to close the bargain. They said they were ready for business.

"Not to-day," replied the chief.

Knowing that persuasion would be useless they asked when he would meet them.

"To-morrow, ten o'clock," was the laconic response.

At ten o'clock all were present at the bank.

"Can't sell for $140,000; must have $160,000," said the Wyandotte chief.

The surprised purchasers held a hasty council and decided that they must hustle up the $160,000 or the figures would go still higher. They raised $20,000 more and counted out the money in crisp greenbacks. As the chief saw the paper money he shook his head.

"Can't take paper; must have gold," said he.

Quickly half a dozen hacks were called, and the banks of Kansas City were ransacked for the required amount of the yellow metal. After it was fixed upon a table before the chief he pawed it over like a miser, and then said:

"Give 'em deed."

The money was deposited in the bank, but Splitlog would have opened his eyes had he seen the same hacks used in collecting the gold, receiving it again and being driven rapidly back to Missouri. That 140 acres of land is now selling at the rate of $2,000,000, and proved one of the best speculations ever entered into at the mouth of the Kaw.

Splitlog is married and has seven children. He never stops at a hotel when visiting Kansas City, Kan., where he owns valuable property, but always puts up with a negro, who is one of his tenants. One of Splitlog's daughters is married to a negro. He is building a railroad in Southwest Missouri. In religion he is a Roman Catholic. There is rather a peculiar history given of the origin of his name. At the time of his birth his mother was at work with other Indian women in a field near a log that had been split. As she gave birth to him near that log he was christened "Splitlog." He is still robust and active and bids fair to live to a great age. —Denver (Col.) News.

HOW DOLLS ARE MADE.

A Strange, Variegated and Most Eventful History.

When the word first goes forth, "let us make dolls," it is not to potter's clay that the hand of the dolls' maker is stretched forth, but to a large roll of white calico, cold and smooth and as dead as dead can be. Quaint patterns are laid upon it, close together, so that there shall be no waste, and quickly the sharp scissors cut round them. The result is a number of articles looking exactly like those garments which in fashion papers are known under the name of combinations. Humiliating though it may appear to the owners of a fine family of doll-children, it is nevertheless true that these coarse white combinations are the beginning of dolls of all sorts and conditions. As yet they are devoid of any life, even animal life, but nimble fingers seize them, sew them neatly together down the sides, round the short arms and legs (for the calico arms come only down to the elbows and the calico legs down to the knees), and feed the pale form so diligently on dried seaweed or hay that presently the limbs begin to grow round and firm, the "mysterious part called inside" swells to fair proportions, the last aperture through which the intestines have been forced into the body is sewn up, and behold! a white torso, which if not exactly like the perfect marble form of the Venus of Milo, has still a good deal of "the human form divine."

There they lie, dozens by dozens, awaiting the touch of the hand which shall "create a soul under the ribs of death." It is already near, that life-giving hand, which now puts down beside the torsos a tray full of arms and legs and another tray full of heads. Some of the arms and legs are of leather, and destined, by a wise providence, for the working classes among dolls, for the girls and women who will have china heads with yellow hair, broad faces, fat red cheeks, and frocks of cheap material. These heads are made in Germany, and for their vulgarity and coarse looks are cordially despised by the more refined classes of the community. And they are ugly, no doubt, with a cheerful kind of ugliness, those broad-faced kitchen malkins; but who, having played with them and loved them with a child's blind, eager love, a generation ago, when the higher form of doll was as yet unknown, does not, with a sense of yearning affection, look at the blue-eyed lass, and in her heart of hearts give preference to her? But the present generation knows nought of such sentimental preferences; it chooses the fairest and costliest the doll with a curly wig of human hair, or that most perfect of dolls which has every hair on the head and in the eyelashes carefully planted into its place, as if growing out of the rosy wax.

Then there are china arms and legs, and pretty French china heads; wax limbs, exquisitely molded of the best East Indian wax, and heads with beaming eyes and blush-rose complexions of the same material. Dozens there are of each, and sometimes dozens of dozens, and all in turn are taken up and fitted on one of the white bodies; the stumps of arms and legs are beaten and kneaded into shape by a kind of massage treatment, and then comes the final painful process out of which the complete doll emerges into full life. A long sharp needle, specially made for the purpose, pierces through the arms and legs and through the white shoulders, sewing to them with stiffest and strongest of threads the shapely limbs, the fair young head. It is finished, the doll is alive; for the first time it looks around; timidly, questioningly at first, and then with a joyful presentiment of all the pleasures to come:

Enjoy thy youth, it will not stay,
For oh! it is not always May.

Now begins a series of days of perfect happiness. The boundless stories of a child's affection and admiration are lavished on the darling doll. "Dorothy," she is called, and goes to balls and parties and teas and dinners every day of her life, and for each event she is dressed in another frock from her dainty trousseau. She drives out in her own private brougham (which is only called perambulator when "Dorothy" is an infant), she goes shopping wrapped up in furs and shawls and her complexion protected by a soft white veil. When the long day is over; when tired with pleasure, she retires; it is into a bed covered with sheets and pillows of cobweb texture, with lace trimmed satin quilts and curtains, to lie in which is happiness itself.—Pall Mall Gazette.

FASHIONABLE KINKS.

Hints Concerning Dress Novelties and Society Stationery.

Corselet bodices are the rage in Paris, but only look well on fine figures.

Crossed bodices are worn with chemisettes of crape disappearing under belts of embroidery.

Tulle covered silk evening dresses are bordered with flowers or feathers.

Crowniess hats have the trimmings arranged to cover the crown sufficiently to conceal the top of the head.

A plain gown is made effective by a velvet corselet, while a fawn-colored cloth dress, made with a corselet bordered with loops of brown braid, needs no other trimming.

Sleeves are too elaborate, and women with fine round shoulders are tired of hiding them under a puff so large that the shape of the upper part of the arm is lost, and the probabilities are that the change to simpler sleeves will be one of the first important changes in the autumn.

Zouave and Figaro jackets are very popular, and they are made so as to be worn with different dresses, velvet ones, lined with colored silks, framing the arms but not meeting either front or back, being most stylish.

Over sixteen years of age boys don long coats, and from twelve to sixteen they wear long or knee trousers, and double-breasted sack or Norfolk jackets, while for wet weather there are leather leggins to wear with knee breeches.

It is astonishing to see how popular the cutaway coat and shirt front have become, about every fourth woman you meet wearing the suit. A dark green cloth coat, with a double-breasted vest of green silk, opens over a shirt of the sheerest mull, and often one is forced to visit the men's counter for some of these masculine accessories.

The latest style of visiting cards are almost square, and should be about 2½x3½ inches. The engraving should be in the plainest script, without any flourishes, and upon the best white bristol board. The card Mr. and Mrs. is the largest, being about 2⅝x4 inches. The card of Mrs. is often engraved with the name of the daughter below it. During a young lady's first season her name is put on her mother's card, and after this she has a separate one. Cards for younger daughters have the Christian name, while the eldest has simply Miss. Children's names are printed on very small cards in small script. A popular dinner card is a plain gilt-edged one with the monogram or crest stamped in bronze. A collection of the changing styles of letter paper, with various stampings, is most interesting. Gros grain ribbon, fringed at each end, about five inches long and two wide, run through a celluloid card, hand painted, is in use. When a motto is used it is often printed on satin. Individual taste decides the width of black borders used on visiting cards. In England it is a custom to send out memorial cards. The first page contains the words "In memoriam," the second contains the particulars of death and burial, while the third and sometimes the fourth is devoted to a prayer or eulogy. These are sent out a week or ten days after the obsequies. Invitations to wedding anniversaries are written or printed on note sheets, while the dates are sometimes distinguished from the rest by gold figures or silver. Cards of wood or tin are no longer in good taste.—N. Y. Weekly.

—Traveler—"What a splendid landscape you have up here; the great noble mountains, these peaceful lakes in the valleys." Mountain Maid—"Oh, just let me have your glass for a second." Traveler—"So you would like to admire this beautiful prospect nearer?" Mountain Maid—"I only wanted to look down as far as our pasture, to be sure the cows were feeding all right."—Fliegende Blatter.

A MYSTERY.

That sunless day no living shadow swept
Across the hills, fleet shadow chasing light,
Twin of the sailing cloud; but mists, west white,
Slow stealing miss, on those heaved shoulders crept,
And wrought about the strong hills while they slept
In witches' wise, and rapt their forms from sight.
Dreams were they—less than dream, the noblest height
And farthest; and the chilly woodland wept.
A sunless day and sad; yet all the while
Within the grave green twilight of the wood,
Inscrutable, immutable, apart,
Hearkening the brook, whose song she understood,
The secret birch tree kept her silver smile,
Strange as the peace that gleams at sorrow's heart.

—Helen Gray Cone in Century

Failed to Work Somehow.

Mr. Billus has a theory that his wife is too indulgent to tramps and beggars. With a dimly defined purpose of teaching her a lesson he disguised himself the other day as an abandoned vagabond, boldly rang the bell at his own front door and inquired for Mrs. Billus.

"Have you any old clothes to give a poor man, mum?" he asked in a loud, aggressive, but carefully disguised voice when the lady presented herself.

Mrs. Billus looked at the soiled, grimy, disreputable looking object before her with some interest. Whether or not she suspected the genuineness of the mendicant is not certainly known, but she answered:

"None that would fit you, my good man. My husband is a much smaller man than you are."

She shut the door in his face, and Mr. Billus made his way back to his office down town.

"Darn it all!" he ejaculated, as he sneaked through a back alley, "I must have looked a thundering sight bigger than I feel just now!"—Chicago Tribune.

As to Andy Johnson.

"You have spoken of Andrew Johnson. Do you remember the day he was inaugurated vice president?"

"I remember it very distinctly, and I'll tell you what I know about his alleged intoxication on that occasion. Hannibal Hamlin was retiring vice president, and I was in his room when Mr. Johnson arrived. Mr. Hamlin said to me: 'Isaac, Mr. Johnson has been riding all night on the cars, and is worn out. Run down to the hole in the wall and get him something good to drink.' I went down and got two bottles, one of whisky and the other of brandy. When I returned Mr. Johnson was just getting ready to go into the senate chamber. He poured out and drank a very small quantity of the brandy, and was then led into the chamber. So far as I could judge he was not the least intoxicated, and if he was under the influence of liquor he did not get the liquor in the Capitol. When I took the bottles back to the hole in the wall, the man in charge there looked at them and said: 'Why, Mr. Johnson has not touched the whisky, and has taken but a swallow of the brandy.' Yet it is true that in making his speech he mumbled a good deal, and repeated himself so much that the story was at once started that he was drunk. I think that when he stepped into the senate chamber, which was very warm, that little bit of brandy went to his head, and for a few minutes affected him very much."—Interview with Isaac Bassett.

Prompt Adhesion of Dental Plates.

L. C. Bryan gives an excellent plan for securing immediate suction in a new dental plate or a newly repaired one. The plate is moistened, and then simply sprinkled with fine powder of gum tragacanth. The plate is then pressed into place, and no matter how good or bad a fit, it will hold firmly for a day under almost any use or abuse. The advantage of this is apparent; for the first half hour after a plate is put in makes or mars the reputation of the dentist, for the time being, in the estimation of the patient, whose efforts to "suck up" a plate, if not immediately successful, are at once discontinued, and the plate pronounced a misfit.

It is said that a thin coating of tragacanth will even up all irregularities, preventing the plate from wounding the sensitive membrane of the mouth, and often leading to a satisfactory fit where otherwise the plate could not be worn, if the dentist is of opinion that time and use will improve the general adaptation of the plate it is recommended that a small box of tragacanth should be presented to the patient with directions for use whenever the variation in the suction of the plate from atmospheric causes should render its employment necessary. —New York Commercial Advertiser.

A Poor Boy's Faith.

Another London schoolboy, a child of poverty, showed that he felt the sentiment of poetry. The subject of his composition being "Flowers," the boy described the wonders of the country where flowers "grow wild in the fields and not in skwares and rounds.

"Nobody believes it till they go in the train. You can pull as many as you like and fill your baskets, and carry home to your fathers and mothers. And the teacher said that if we could only go the next day there would be just as many flowers again. Some boys would not believe what the teacher said, but I did, for God can easy do miracles. When I am a man I shall go the next day."—Youth's Companion.

—Lawrence Bommer, a hinge manufacturer, of Bromley, captured a monster snake weighing 150 pounds in the surf at Coney Island, and it is now on exhibition in one of the West-End resorts there. Mr. Bommer is upwards of seventy years old, but with the assistance of his dog he captured the big fish without much trouble. His attention was first attracted to it by the barking of his dog, and when he saw it the surf he seized a heavy piece of wood and walked almost out to his waist in the water before he reached the fish. He stunned it with the wood and the dog seized it and tore at it wickedly. It was finally secured with a rope and towed ashore.

FEEDING A BIG SNAKE.

The Appetizing Meal of Rabbits That a Boa-Constrictor Delights In.

Three corpulent rabbits of Belgian breed were caged in a soap-box quietly awaiting their fate. They were the meal for which the snake was anxiously awaiting. He had not tasted meat in four months and his voracious maw yawned like a bottomless pit for the unfortunate trio in the soap-box. Manager Bell appeared and drew forth one of the rabbits. After stroking "bunny" on the back for a moment he opened the door to the snake's den and thrust him in. The huge boa had coiled himself up in a corner, but at once roused himself for action. He was fully twelve feet long, and having recently shed his winter coat, his skin glistened and shone like satin. He raised his head a foot or so from the floor and viewed the first course of his quadriannual meal. The rabbit showed no signs of fear, but rather seemed to enjoy his new quarters. The snake slowly lowered his head and cautiously began to stretch himself along the side of the den. He never once took his eyes off the rabbit, which was still unconscious of his danger. Suddenly the rabbit began to act strangely and to cut all sorts of ridiculous capers. He would leap back and forth over the snake, and then rub up against it, and appeared to be fascinated. Slowly and stealthily the snake turned his head about until it was within a foot of the rabbit's haunches. Then, quick as a flash, he darted forward, seized the rabbit in his mouth, and in another instant there was nothing to be seen of the little animal save the tips of his ears, which protruded from between the folds of the snake.

The huge serpent then raised his head full two feet from the floor, darted out his forked tongue and hissed horribly at the motley group watching him. If there was any struggle on the part of the rabbit it was not visibl. The snake had him in his awful coils. Then the coils slowly, but with a strength which was terrible to look at, began to tighten until every bone in the poor rabbit's body must have been broken. This done the coils relaxed, and the limp, lifeless body of the sportive rabbit of a few moments before lay ready to be swallowed. First the serpent nosed his victim all over. The eye balls of the dead rabbit were protruding from their sockets, and by way of beginning the boa licked them with his tongue. Once more he coiled about his victim, leaving its head and shoulders free. Then he opened his monstrous jaws and, taking "bunny's" head therein, began to swallow. Soon the head and shoulders were out of sight, and in less than fifteen minutes the hind legs followed.—Chicago Inter-Ocean.

GIRLS IN CONNEMARA.

Their Life in Healthful Poverty and Their Dream of American Luxury.

The Connemara girl weighs about one hundred and eighty pounds. She wears two red woolen petticoats woven by herself, and over her head and serving the purposes of both a shawl and hood is a white petticoat, held in place with her left hand under her chin. The red petticoats reach only half way down her calves. The stride of this child of the bog is Amazonian, yet it is graceful. Her days are spent in carrying seaweed for fertilization, turf for the fire, and water for the illicit still. Sometimes she carries the turf a distance of two miles on her back in a wicker basket. Her load usually weighs about one hundred pounds. Her stockings have no soles, and she is too poor to buy shoes. But she wears the legs of heavy woolen stockings to protect her calves when the edge of the heavy petticoat, wet with sea water, slaps against them.

The brown cow that browses in the bog is no more innocent than this maid of the crag and land. Such a wealth of color, such satiny skin and such vigorous health are not seen in America. In the evening, after this maiden has worked hard, she goes home and eats a supper of potatoes (boiled potatoes), nothing else. Her father and mother may drink a cup of tea, but this luxury is denied to the girl. The tea costs too much. When the potato skins have been fed to the pig the Connemara girl heaps on the turf—for there is plenty of it there—and nods herself to sleep in the chimney nook. Or, it may be, if there are visitors or neighbors in the house, she will lilt or hum for them to dance by on the hearthstone. This lilt is one of the quaintest things heard in Ireland. The sounds resemble closely those of an Irish pipe. They are produced by the vocal organs in conjunction with the tongue. The tune is usually very rapid and the lilter catches her breath frequently.

And what do you suppose the Connemara girl's dream by night and by day is? 'Tis that she may gather twenty dollars together so that she can come to America, the land of catarrh and pneumonia; of in-door work where she will lose her satiny skin and splendid vigor; where her eyes will ache for a sight of the Twelve Pins in Connemara; where—but pshaw! she'll cross the sea when she gets her passage money.—Boston Globe.

Unconsciously Sarcastic.

Mr. Gooley (with strong musical fervor)—Perhaps you'd like to have me give you a rendering of my last ballad? It's called: "No sleep comes to my fevered brain."

His New Landlady—Mr. Gooley, if you are aware that that is a piano bedstead, I think you are very unkind to make fun of it.—Judge.

No Rose Without a Thorn.

Mrs. Watts—Did you enjoy your summer trip very much?

Mrs. Potts—O, just moderately. I might have enjoyed it better if the city papers had not come every day and made me realize that I was 150 miles away from a bargain counter.—Terre Haute Express.

THE PARIS BREAD-APRON.

Peculiar Garments Worn by the Bakers' Women of the French Capital.

The Paris baker of world-wide fame sends out his bread, not in baskets and wagons, as is the custom in America, but by a woman who wears the longest apron on record. As will be observed, its extraordinary length is for a reason. When it is dropped down, this apron trails on the ground in front of her, and its utility is as evident as its simplicity is beautiful to the unaccustomed eye. The ends of this apron she ties together forming a sack in which the bread is carried. There is a waist fitting over the shoulders so that her load, by no means a light one, weighs upon the shoulders and does not pull altogether on the hips. Who invented this novel panier au pain is not known, but it must have been some genius who could not afford a donkey cart, and desired to economize space.

The small breakfast rolls—how good they are!—the long and the short loaves, the sticks of bread so slender that they are called "flutes," and are only crust to be broken up in soups, are brought in this amazing apron. Mr. Henry Bacon, the artist, tells me that, when he was in the Beaux Arts studying under Cabanel, there was a pupil there whose father was a baker, and a fine baker at that. The young fellow was tall and thin, and they at once christened him in the school "Flute-au-soupe;" and to this day, when they meet together to chat and dine, he is called by his thoroughly Parisian nick-name.

This sturdy woman who carries bread is not one of the aristocrats in aprons. She is a sort of patient pack-horse going her rounds betimes, and too heavily loaded to relish gossip with her customers on her route. She seldom sees her clients, as she leans her loaves against the door, rings and departs. It is not a ring which ever penetrates to the ears of the sleepy master or mistress of the apartment; on the contrary, it is only a gentle tinkle, an apologetic tinkle, forsooth, for having called so early, before any body is awake.

These bread-aprons, which are often the property of the baker, are always made of dark blue linen. As they cost twenty-five francs or five dollars apiece, a poor working woman is not expected to supply them any more than she is expected to furnish the baker's shop. In Paris, breadstuffs receive a certain worship not accorded the staff of life in less economical lands, and bread-making has consequently reached the acme of perfection among a people who look upon flour with reverence, and its productions with intimate affection. That its transportation should be originally conducted is not surprising. A loaf carried about in an apron is no more singular than to see it tucked, unwrapped, under a buyer's arm, or used as a cushion for the cold sidewalk by the urchin who pauses to watch a top spin on his way home from the baker's shop. As the loaves have a hard and slippery surface, their integrity is preserved under adverse circumstances, and when more delicate substances must surely be rendered unfit for human consumption. Let fastidious people take comfort in that thought. But unless one rises very early, the baker's woman will remain an invisible factor in the distribution of our daily bread. — Wide-Awake.

HOW TO LIVE LONG.

Oliver Wendell Holmes' Unique Prescription for Longevity.

One of my prescriptions for longevity may startle you somewhat. It is this: Become the subject of a mortal disease. Let half a dozen doctors thump you, and knead you, and test you in every possible way, and render their verdict that you have an internal complaint; they don't know exactly what it is, but it will certainly kill you by and by. Then bid farewell to the world and shut yourself up for an invalid. If you are three-score years old when you begin this mode of life, you may very probably last twenty years, and there you are—an octogenarian. In the mean time, your friends outside have been dropping off, one after another, until you find yourself almost alone, nursing your mortal complaint as if it were your baby, hugging it and kept alive by it—if to exist is to live. Who has not seen cases like this—a man or a woman shutting himself or herself up, visited by a doctor or a succession of doctors (I remember that once, in my earlier experience, I was the twenty-seventh physician who had been consulted), always taking medicine, until every body was reminded of that impatient speech of a relative of one of those invalid vampires who live on the blood of tired-out attendants: "I do wish she would get well—or something!" Persons who are shut up in that way, confined to their chambers, sometimes to their beds, have a very small amount of vital expenditure, and wear out very little of their living substance. They are like lamps with half their wicks picked down, and will continue to burn when other lamps have used up all their oil. An insurance office might make money by taking no risks except on lives of persons suffering from mortal disease.—Oliver Wendell Holmes, in Atlantic.

A Reporter Who Was Too Funny.

A man can be too funny, even in this country. Recently a Texas paper told a story about four people on horseback being carried up in the clouds by a "cyclone." One of those unimaginative people who are to be found everywhere said the story was not true; and, just to bluff him, the reporter who wrote it up made affidavits to the facts. Instead of gracefully caving in, as in such cases made and provided, the doubter carried the matter into court, whereupon the reporter confessed that his story was imaginative and was sentenced to a term in State prison. Now if we could see justice done to the men who invent the stories about live snakes in people's stomachs and about persons in various remote localities being buried alive, we should feel that the blind goddess was beginning to do her duty.—N. County Official Paper.

In 1861 the value of personal property on the assessment roll of the State was 49.62 per cent and real estate, 50.38 per cent. The taxes levied upon the two kinds of wealth were thus very nearly equal. At present the proportion of personal property assessed is not greater than 15 per cent and at least 85 per cent is charged upon real estate. The money wealth of the state pays $15 and real estate pays $85. The capitalist escapes taxation and the farmer and every person who owns a house and lot bears the burden of taxation. This grossly unjust division of taxation may fairly be attributed to the fact that our Legislatures are usually made up of a few sharp rascals and a crowd of incapable block heads who are blindly lead into voting for measures they do not understand.

The "Bridgeport Chronicle Union" thinks that in the new apportionment for Assembly Districts, Mono will be joined with counties west of the Sierra Mountains. The paper says, "We do not feel dismal over this. On the contrary, we trust this county will drift over the summit. There is good Legislative timber in Mariposa and Tuolumne. Mono has no cause to be proud of the Assemblyman that went from her confines." It would be adverse to the interests of Inyo County to be united with any county or counties West of the Mountains in an Assembly District and we ought to resist such an effort with all our power. The people of Inyo have always accepted such candidates as Mono offered. The "Chronicle Union" is not at all flattering in its estimate of the character and qualifications of those candidates, but that matter Inyo leaves to the people of Mono.

M.; thence North on line between Ranges 38 and 38 E., M. D. M. to the place of beginning.

The Board changed the boundary lines of Election Precinct No. 18 to read as follows:

Election Precinct No. 18, or Lookout—Commencing at the Northeast corner of Election Precinct No. 17, running thence East on the line between Townships 17 and 18 S., M. D. M., to the San Bernardino Meridian; thence East on the line between Townships 26 and 27 N., S. B. M., to where said line intersects the State line between the States of California and Nevada; thence Southeast following said State line to where the Township line between Townships 24 and 25 N., S. B. M., intersects said State line; thence West on said line to the San Bernardino Meridian; thence West on the line between Towships 19 and 20 S., M. D. M., to where said line intersects the East boundary of Election Precinct No 17; thence North to the place of beginning.

It is ordered that Election Precinct No. 12, or Keeler, be and the same is hereby consolidated with Election Precinct No. 14 or Cerro Gordo.

It is ordered that Election Precincts No. 19 and 20 be and the same are hereby consolidated with Election Precinct No. 21, or Panamint, which said Election Precinct No. 21, or Panamint shall be known hereafter as Election Precinct No. 19, or Panamint.

The Board changed the boundary lines of Election Precinct No. 19 to read as follows:

Election Precinct No. 19, or Panamint—Commencing at the Southwest corner of Election Precinct No. 18, running thence East on the South boundary line of said Precinct No. 18 to the State line between California and Nevada; thence Southeast following said State line to where the South boundary line of Inyo county intersects the same; thence West along South boundary line of Inyo county to the Southeast corner of Election Precinct No. 17; thence North following the East boundary line of said Precinct No. 17 to the place of beginning.

The Board rejected two petitions for the establishment of Election Precincts.

The following bills for mileage and per diem were allowed on the Salary Fund:

J. D. Harger	$26 10
S. G. Sneden	25 80
E. Robinson	12 30
J. J. Stewart	16 80

Whereupon the Board adjourned.

Sylvania.

At Sylvania all work except in mines is stopped for the present. The new furnace being about ready for lighting up, Mr. A. J. Sanborn came up from San Francisco last week to see if it would be well to make a start. He concluced that it would be better to get out several hundred tons more ore first, and for this reason all other work was suspended. In two of the Company's mines work is pushed vigorously for opening up large ore bodies. These mines are looking well and will supply large quantities of ore from what is already in sight.

COURT NOTES.

Superior Court of Inyo County California Hon. John A. Hannah, Judge.

TUESDAY, Oct 7th.

Estate of G. A. Thede, deceased—Filed petition of Mary K. Thede for Letters Testamentary.

BORN.

ALLINGHAM—At Bishop, October 1st, to Mr and Mrs. L. W. Allingham, a daughter.

WILLIS—At Bishop, September 29th, to Mr. and Mrs. Geo. F. Willis, a daughter.

MARRIED.

CONKLIN—SHEPHERD—At the residence of the bride's parents at Georges Creek, October 8th, by Hon. John A. Hannah Superior Judge, Mr. Alvah Conklin and Miss May Shepherd.

DIED.

McDONALD—At Darwin, October 4th, Rosa Loretta, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. James McDonald, aged 22 months.

J. J. Gunn will start for Modock the first of next week to resume mining operations.

Eli Clark of Bishop has gone to Ontario, Canada. He will enter upon a three years course of study at the Veterinary College at Ontario.

C. H. Wilson and wife and William Gheen late of Bishop passed through Independence last Sunday on their way to Fresno. They have gone to stay.

Those who have stood by the graves where their own children were laid away forever can best sympathize with Mr. and Mrs. James McDonald while they mourn the loss of their only child.

Mr. A. Stecker came in from Sylvanite last Monday. He reports very favorably of the mines. Mr. Stecker has been in charge of all carpenter work at the camp for some months past.

The Cornet Band serenaded the young married couple, Mr. and Mrs. Alva Conklin last evening at the home of A. R. Conklin. Others were visited by the Band in the course of the evening.

S. M Bell of Big Pine is a candidate for County Superintendent of Schools. Mrs. Bell comes before the people without asking the endorsement of any political party and subject only to the popular will.

The Grand Lodge of Masons of California will meet in special session to morrow at Petaluma, for the purpose of laying the corner stone of a new Episcopal Church. The Grand Officers have all been notified to be present.

Mr. L. D. Mathews has orders from San Francisco to push the survey for the big canal down the west side of the Valley as rapidly as possible. All the men that Mr. Brooks, the engineer-in-chief, can work to advantage are to be given him.

I. H. Mulholland brought down twenty-one head of horses from Bishop last Tuesday. He bought the animals from S. P. Smith. Among the number are five mares bred to the Standard trotting stallion, Antare and five more to the thoroughbred, Pickpocket.

H. Trickey is now on his way to New York with ten tons of honey. The honey is all in pound sections and is a first class article. Mr. Trickey began keeping bees three years ago and had very little experience in the business. This lot is the yield of the season from two hundred hives.

On Wednesday evening the relatives and friends of the young people met at the the residence of Mr. John Shepherd to witness the marriage of his daughter, Miss May Shepherd to Alva Conklin. This is the consummation of an attachment that began when the parties were children. A handsome residence for the young couple was completed a few days ago on a farm at Blackrock, and there they have gone to make their home.

Last Saturday J. W. P. Laird, Esq. served notice upon District Attorney Gill that upon October 19th, 1890, Frank Broder will apply to Governor Waterman for a pardon. Broder was committed of murder in the second degree, August 30th, 1885, and sentenced by Judge Hannah to ten years imprisonment in San Quentin. Broder is an Indian and the man he killed was also an Indian. Mr. Laird was District Attorney at the time and prosecuted Broder.

A Wise Provision.

The Supervisors have very wisely provided a fund for building a fire proof vault for the County Records. It would be a dire calamity to have the records destroyed and to that danger they are constantly exposed so long as they are not protected by a fire proof building.

D. C. GRUNOW,
Corporal, Signal Corps.

To The Electors of Inyo County.

A report having been circulated to the effect that I am addicted to the habitual use of morphine, I am forced to deny the same through the press as being the most practical means at my command of calling the attention of the voters to the malicious and defamatory attack, with the earnest hope that whatever credence may have been given it may at once be laid aside, and the vile and slandering tongues of my traducers effectually silenced.

Those of my friends and acquaintences who have met me daily are aware of the falsity of these reports, and it must be apparent to them that the object of my political enemies is to influence the votes of those who are not personally acquainted with me, to the end that I may not only be defeated in the election but permanently injured in my profession.

I unhesitatingly denounce such reports as false, slanderous, defamatory and cowardly to the last degree, and submit that they are calculated to reach farther than the mere confines of a political campaign.

In substantiation of my denial of these reports, I herewith append the certificate of my family physician, Dr. I. J. Woodin.

Respectfully, GEO. M. GILL.

TO WHOM IT MAY CONCERN.

I hereby certify that I have been, since December, 1887, the family physician of George M. Gill; that he is constitutionally unable to take morphine or opiates of any kind, and I have never prescribed the same to him, nor have I ever seen or known of his being under its influence.

Central Committee Meeting.

The Executive Committee of Republican County Central Committee met at Bishop last week. Bills were audited and ordered paid. The publication of County ticket was provided for. The matter of a candidate for Supervisor for the First District was presented for consideration. It was shown that at the meeting of the County Convention the delegates from said First District had reported to the Convention that J. D. Harger had been nominated. The Chairman had announced said nomination publically to the Convention and thereupon the same was entered upon the minutes of the Convention. The Executive Committee have no power to change the records of the Convention, and had no choice but to order that the name of Mr. Harger be printed on the party tickets. The Committee thereupon adjourned, subject to call by the Chair.

Unselfish Devotion

The writer of the following few lines will be very much surprised to see them in print. They occurred in a letter written not long ago to one whom the writer loves and trusts. These words come from a pure and loving heart and show how much we are indebted to faithful school teachers.

"I try to attend to my pupils morals as well as to their book education, and I find an improvement this term that I am proud of. Every afternoon I give a short five or ten minutes talk on etiquette at table, in parlor, at home and elsewhere and also on their obligations to God. It would delight you to see how respectful they have become. A few quiet words spoken earnestly reaches their tender little hearts and will, I hope, take root there and prove fruitful some day." Parents who have such a teacher for their children may well be thankful.

The New Canal

It looks now as if the big canal would certainly be built. Mr. Brooks is in the field with a corps of assistants making a working survey. Mr. C. A. Swan has nearly completed a portable kitchen for the surveyors. It is built upon wheels and is filled with all necessary cooking aparatus. The canal will be one of the greatest works of the kind in the State. From the point where it leaves the river to where the water can be turned loose to find its own way to Salt Wells Valley, he distance is over sixty miles. The water would there flow freely into the valley, a distance of about thirty miles. It will take a great outlay of money to complete this work, but the results obtained will be correspondingly great. Tens of thousands of acres of land will be fertilized, population and wealth correspondingly increased, new railroads built and all the other effects that would in turn come from these.

A Railroad War.

It is reported that the biggest kind of a railroad is likely to begin soon. The Union Pacific on one side and Jay Gould and all his backers on the other. The extension of the U. P. road from Salt Leke to Mojave is regarded as a very serious menace against the Gould roads, the Santa Fé and others. To head this off it is said that the others have secured control of the Colorado Midland line. If they can also secure the Denvre and Rio Grande Western they will then have a line to Salt Lake and Ogden and could then be able to give battle on equal terms, if the others show fight at Mojave. In any event this line though Inyo is likely to be of great importance.

Notice of Sale.

Notice is hereby given that unless all claims are paid on the following described stock, viz: Two bay fillies, aged four years, by Bismarck Jr., [Muldoon]. I will sell same to the highest bidder to settle said claims on Saturday, October 25, 1890, at my place at Camp Independence. Said animals are the property of one J. McCormick.

MRS. M. LEWIS.

Change in Stage Line

Mr. J. A. Delameter of Mojave has just purchased the stage line running from Keeler to Mojave. Mr. Delameter is a thorough business and experienced stage man. Knowing the condition of affairs in Inyo as he does, it augers well that there is to be a general livening up of business throughout the County.

Hand bag Lost

Rev. H. J. Winsor, while on the way between Georges Creek and Lone Pine on Sunday, a week ago, lost a small black hand-bag. The finder will confer a valued favor by leaving the article at Stewart's Hotel, Lone Pine, or at Edward's store or at any store or hotel at Independence.

For Sale.

The ranch known as the "Rittgers place" near Lone Pine is offered for sale together with the the farming implements and stock. The ranch contains 320 acres of excellent land. The stock consists of thirty head of cattle and twelve brood mares. There is now sixty tons of hay on the place and feed enough to winter 200 head of stock. The winter pasture has been rented five years past at $300 a year. The soil is a rich loam and excedently adapted to vegetable raising. There is plenty of outside range, making it a good stock ranch. WOMAN'S WORLD.

A CHARGE THAT LITERARY WOMEN ARE DOWDY DRESSERS.

Miss Wanamaker's Rooms—An Art Teacher's Romance—Mrs. Squire's Fast Horse. Virginia's Woman Physician—The Spanish Queen's Favorite.

A New York correspondent writing of the dress of the literary woman and the disciples of dress reform tells of some fearful and wonderful gowns worn by these ladies at a recent meeting of the Woman's Press club. She says: "There is a fashion writer whose frocks and bonnets set your teeth on edge, and as for a certain poetess of fashion, who goes in for the aesthetic, you simply wish you were a man for about five minutes that you might rail profanely at her execrable raiment. In all the various New York literary cliques the tastefully dressed writer is an anomaly. At the club reception the other night how many well dressed women did we see? We could count them on the fingers of one hand.

"Think of the best paid woman editor in town wearing a guy of a gown and hat. Another writer ambling around in a trained red velvet looked as if she had escaped from some Shakespearean show. Next neighbor to the badly dressed literary woman is the Delsarte fright. The other night at the Brunswick in walked a well known woman in an outlandish gown. Her little face, under its halo of towsled black hair, rose from a high necked gown of putty colored plush. She was guiltless of stays, and her frock was loose in front and watteaned in the back. 'Great Scott!' I heard a man say, 'I wouldn't travel around with that if it were shut up in a hand bag.' She certainly looked like the Witch of Endor, and yet she is supposed to 'know it all.'"

Miss Wanamaker's Sanctum Sanctorum.

Another boudoir that is all in yellow is Miss Wanamaker's, the postmaster general's oldest daughter. The color here is almost as pale as primrose and consequently much more of it can be used in decoration. The room is on the third floor of the house, above the library, and is as dainty as the lovely girl who occupies it. All the furnishings were made especially for the room and the mountings are all of brass. The brass bedstead is draped with soft yellow silk festooned from the high posts. The divans and chaises lounges are upholstered in the same color, and yellow again is the predominating color in the rug and walls, which are tinted in pale ecru.

The rarest bit of furniture in the room is a Henry Quatre desk which was purchased in Paris for Miss Wanamaker. It is of the slenderest proportions, the upper part being hardly more than a foot square, and everything about it suits the present demand for dwarfish appointments in all pertaining to letter writing. The desk is a fine example of Italian mosaic. Beyond the boudoir are dressing and bathrooms, and further away but within call the little room of Therese, the French maid. That dressing room has seen a sight that perhaps no other in the country has seen, for before the season began it contained six long, narrow boxes, bearing the mark of a famous Parisian dressmaker, which remained unopened for two weeks. Fancy a girl having six lovely new gowns and not looking at them for a fortnight!—Cor. New York World.

An Art Teacher's Romance.

Some ten years since there came to Boston from Europe a young and accomplished German lady, Fraulein Ida Bothe. An artist of merit and a loving and devoted student of art, she quickly won friends and inspired an interest both warm and wide in its manifestations. Among her pictures was a portrait of Mrs. Lucy Stone, which was exhibited in one of the art club exhibitions, and which had great claim to consideration in being not only an admirable piece of work in a technical sense, but in its power of rendering that serene and beautiful expression that so pre-eminently characterizes Mrs. Stone, the mingled courage and indomitable will, held always in abeyance to the "sweet reasonableness" and the tender sympathies for all humanity which Mrs. Stone always feels.

Time passed on, and Fraulein Bothe was secured as instructor of art in Wellesley college. Under her wise administration this department has been raised to very high rank. Now comes the conclusion of this little sketch of real life—as pretty a denouement as ever closed the novel of a romancist. Fraulein Bothe is about to be married to the Baron Ehrenfreid von Voss, of Province Posen, and she sailed from New York Saturday, April 19, for Germany, where the wedding will occur in about three weeks. A reception was given to her at Wellesley. The future Baroness von Voss takes with her the best wishes and happy congratulations of her American friends.—Boston Traveller.

Oriental Matting.

The variety offered in the newly imported mattings is endless. Notably among mattings are the Japanese importations, which exceed in variety of design and happy combination of color any hitherto manufactured. There are five grades, "fancy jointless," "best jointless," "medium jointless," "best jointed," "medium jointed." All these are one yard wide. The "fancy jointless" shows some unique designs, and may readily be used as a substitute for carpets, as their rich patterns and colorings make them charming for floor coverings. Among examples may be cited those which have a ground of solid dark colors, such as navy blue, old red, maroon and green, with an all over geometrical design of octagon shaped medallions, each four being joined together by a smaller medallion.—Montreal Star.

Mrs. Squire's Fast Horse.

To see the woman devotee of the trotter in all her glory one must go to the country. At all the resorts during the season the demure city girl, who has been a victim to style for the rest of the year and has sat discontentedly in the back of her brougham while Jehu handled the ribbons, lets herself loose and drives the fast horse at will on country roads over hill and through valley. The country is the trotting horse's paradise all the year round, and country fairs are largely patronized by women who love the speeders.

Mrs. Rollin M. Squire is a type of a great many estimable women who delight in a fast horse. The poet ex-commissioner has a country place in Westchester, and Mrs. Squire delights to drive a superb Kentucky thoroughbred, for which her husband paid $5,000. She appears at fairs in a dainty country phaeton behind this fine horse, and is so proud of him that she does not miss an opportunity to enter him for the honorary prize for fine blooded horses often offered at the larger county fairs. Mrs. Squire has driven her horse herself in such contests, exhibiting his paces and accomplishments.—New York Cor. Richmond Dispatch.

The Spanish Queen's Favorite.

Queen Christina's favorite is the Duchess of Alba. Nor can any one be astonished at the predilection shown by her majesty for this distinguished lady. Maria Alba is the daughter of the Duke and Duchess of Fernan-Numez. She married when very young the Duke of Alba, and though she has had many children she still retains the appearance of a young girl. She is tall and slim and not by any means pretty, yet no woman at the palace looks so much like a grand dame, whether at a court ball, when, in full court dress, with a fortune in diamonds crowning her plain, braided black hair, or whether at Biarritz, where in July and August she wears her pretty, girlish, summer costumes. She has received a splendid education, and can enter into conversation on almost any subject. She speaks to her children always in English; her eldest boy, in fact, is a peer of Scotland by right. The home of the duchess in Madrid is a beautiful place—more like an old English mansion in a large park than anything else.—Cor. Kansas City Journal.

Virginia's First Woman Physician.

The state board of medical examiners had for the first time among the applicants for the privilege of practicing medicine in this state a woman, Miss C. L. Haynes, who was recently elected assistant physician in the Western Lunatic asylum. Miss Haynes passed a successful examination, and her papers were highly complimented. Dr. Haynes was awarded a diploma to practice her profession in this state. This is the first female doctor who ever held a position in any of the public institutions of Virginia. When the question of having a female doctor for the female patients in the Western Lunatic asylum was broached at the meeting of the board there was a big fight, but without success, and, when the matter was decided, Miss Haynes received the appointment, and, although she was a graduate in medicine, she was required, under the laws of Virginia, to pass an examination before the state medical board before she could practice her profession in this state.—Richmond Cor. Baltimore American.

The Latest Style of Glove.

Some pretty conceits and fancies are carried out in gloves, now that dainty ladies have most of them made to order. A certain countess has always a coronet wrought in silk at the top of the arm; another lady recently ordered some white mousquetaire with her Christian name (Dorothy) embroidered across the top in crimson silk in exact imitation of her signature. Some pretty gloves designed for wearing with a white and silver dress were of white undressed kid, and were cut out in little turrets at the top, from beneath which fell a frill of silver lace. The lines up the back of the hand were also traced in silver. You have all read and perhaps seen the evening gloves, with the stitching of one in gold wire, entangling jewels in its meshes, but the haute nouveaute is the seamless glove, which has a most mysterious effect. It clothes the hand like a skin, and only the most minute investigation shows that a seam is concealed in the middle of the hand, but so sewn as to be practically invisible.—New York Sun.

Mrs. President Harrison's Boudoir.

One does not wonder that every mistress of the White House chooses one or the other of the two oblong south rooms for her boudoir, for of all the private apartments they are the coziest and most homelike. They are no longer than the bedroom in a three thousand dollar cottage and could easily be stowed in one corner of the state bedrooms. Mrs. Harrison has the one at the southwest corner and she has it charmingly fitted up. She lives in it more than in any other room, and has her desk, where she writes so many letters, there at the broad window. The desk is of rosewood and much more business like than a lady's desk usually is. At mail time Mrs. Harrison sits there for an hour or two giving personal attention to the scores of letters she receives. Near her is a small table containing pictures of her children and grandchildren, and down the length of one side are tall wardrobes containing the dresses of the mistress of the White House.—Miss Grundy, Jr.

Tablecloths and China.

The days when milliners' trimmings in the shape of scarfs of plush or satin decorated the center of the table have gone by. A plain white tablecloth is preferred to any colored cover for dinner, luncheon or breakfast. There is also a fancy for the white and gold china of years ago, and some dinners have been given this season at which all the decorations of the table, china, flowers, candles and shades, were snowy white, and the dishes served were masked in white sauces wherever it was possible. There is more freedom of colored decoration allowed at the luncheon table. Where the hostess possesses a table with an exceptionally beautiful top of polished wood the luncheon cloth is often dispensed with, and white crocheted mats are strewn about, or squares of hemstitched linen, decorated sometimes in drawn work, which, under the name of Mexican drawn work, is becoming a fashionable amusement of New York women.—Exchange.

Sunshades and Hats.

Parasols, of which few are as yet in use, are in plain, fancy striped and plaid silks. A novel pattern has the stripes radiating from the point to edge, forming a star. Another has the stripe beginning at the point, curling around, forming a spiral. Carriage parasols are of tulle, with lining of delicate tinted silk, transparent net and lace, and of chandron, and pea green silk. The latter two are very popular with the ladies, as they can be carried with most any elegant costume and harmonize with it. The lace toque is the connecting link between the winter hat of velvet and the spring bonnet of straw, and is very popular. A very chic hat has a broad brim of pale yellow straw and crown of horse hair in lace effect. A panache of black feathers and bow of yellow silk. Another stylish hat is of open work horse hair braid, with Ophelia bow of crepe and cluster of lilies of the valley.—Cor. Albany Journal.

LIFE IN HELIGOLAND.

Queer Customs Observed in the Island from Time Immemorial.

It must be noticed, however, that their Sabbath begins at six p. m. on Saturday, when the church-bell is tolled, and ends on Sunday at the same hour. Formerly no vessel could leave port between these hours. Marriage cancels every other engagement, so that there can be no breach of promise brought against a man when once he is married.

The inhabitants have a strange custom on New Year's Eve. They then perambulate the streets with broken pots and pans, which they place before their friends' doors, and the man who has the largest heap before his cottage is considered the most popular.

The people rarely lock their doors, but when they do they leave the key where it can be reached by any one seeking admission.

The fisher-girls bait the hooks and carry them in a large wooden basket filled with sand to the fishermen on the beach. This is by no means a light burden; yet they may be seen cheerfully chatting with their companions as they march onward with woolen shawls over their heads. The streets bear English names, as Leopold, Berlin, Church, Augusta, Thames, Short, O'Brien, Prince of Wales, Princess street, etc. but the natives have their own names for them.

Heligoland has a small prison or lock-up, but they rarely lock any one up, as they do not care to board the prisoner. There is also a small cottage hospital ready for use if necessary, but patients are few and far between. There is also a poor-house. Here poor people live rent free. The plan adopted is for parents and children to go before the magistrate, when the former resign any little property they may possess to their children, who in their turn promise to find them in food. When the husband dies the wife takes his property, and at her decease it is equally divided between the children.

There are no horses or donkeys on Heligoland, for they would be useless there; but there are eight cows and about thirty sheep tethered and milked, the milk being considered superior to that of cows. There are three policemen, the junior being known by the extra amount of gold lace worn by him. The coast-guard consists of five Englishmen, who are not permitted to act as constables. There are also sixteen active native coastguards, and sixteen in the reserve. When there is a wreck the whole island claims the salvage. Most of the inhabitants are behind with their rates, but they are never prosecuted, for when a settling takes place after the season is over what remains is left in hopes of being recovered next year. The doctors are engaged to work on wrecks, and then old scores are wiped off and the balance handed over to them. The natives only are permitted to rent small potato patches, which are much valued, but the government reserve most of the land for their own purposes.—London Times.

Aristocracy Among Saleswomen.

The average wages paid to saleswomen and cash girls has been steadily on the decrease for several years, until now more than one of the best firms refuse to give employment to girls who have no other means of support because they want only respectable girls, and they know a girl cannot support herself on the wages paid. A man said on learning the wages offered by a firm to his daughter: "Well, I think a good deal of that firm, but not enough to support one of their saleswomen." There has never been any kind of organization among the saleswomen. They are, as a rule, well up to the average in intelligence, but in no other class of artisans is there to be found the peculiar type of aristocracy which prevails among them. Generally speaking, they do not consider themselves as having anything in common with other working people, and refuse to mingle with them.—Cincinnati Enquirer.

A Wrinkle Defier.

A lady who is advanced in years (indeed, she has reached her sixtieth birthday) has a lovely complexion and no wrinkles. When asked her reason for believing that she possessed the secret of perpetual youth, she laughingly replied that she had found the fountain of youth, for herself, in olive oil and rose water. She also says that patent face powders are to be shunned, and preference given to "drop" or prepared chalk, which is harmless, cheap and lasting, not having a peculiar clinging quality and is not "dead white," but yellowish in tone.—New York Journal.

Earrings Going Out of Use.

The most prominent jewelers now admit that even the diamond solitaire earring has almost departed. Many fashionable women with earrings worth a fortune no longer wear them, but have the stones reset in hair ornaments, brooches or bracelets. Possibly the fashion will never be revived. The antiquarian in the Twenty-fifth century may note, as a distinct advance in civilization, the date when women ceased to bore their flesh to insert ornaments.—New York Tribune.

Waistcoats of white pique, with gold buttons, are affected by the young woman who gets herself up to look like a boy, for a woman never gets any nearer masculinity than that. If she is inclined to be slangy she rather inelegantly calls them "the masher's waistcoat," but if she is well read on the subject of dress she gives them a more royal name, and calls them "Louis XIV."

Dainty baskets of yellow, lined with silk the color of cowslips and covered with cowslips, are shown for bonbons. There are also violet baskets on which are pinned a cluster of violets, the size of the penny bunch of "sweet violets" sold by London flower boys. A tiny bonbon basket in rose color is decorated with wreaths of wild eglantine.

The girl who can work out some of her energy at the end of a crochet needle is busy making herself a crimson Tam o'Shanter to wear when she is climbing the mountains in search of health and strength. She wants to get a color that will put to shame that of her bonnet; for, after all, the "Tam" is a bonnet—at least so a student of costume says.

Everybody has been noticing for a week or two past how much fresher and brighter the big office buildings look than usual. A man who thinks he has found the reason says that it is because the typewriter and other girl clerks and assistants have all got their new spring suits and Easter bonnets and wear them every day.

AND STILL THEY COME.

Sierra Chemical Co.:

Gentlemen:—I have been a sufferer from Kidney complaints for several years and have used all kinds of medicine without any apparent results or relief until my friend advised me, and told me of the wonderful cures The Great Sierra Kidney and Liver Cure was accomplishing. I was induced to buy one bottle but without much faith, and to my surprise after using that bottle I noticed such a great improvement that I keep on until I have now used three bottles, and can safely say that I am entirely cured and never felt better in my life. I wish to recommend this remedy to all sufferers from Kidney and Liver disorders, for it will positively do the work.

Very truly yours,
L. H. Cohn,
Atlantic & Pacific Pub. Co., room 52, St. Anne's Building, San Francisco, Cal.

"Come right in and I will tell you all about it," said Mrs. Mary Sherman of 307 Pine street, with a happy smile last evening to a Herald reporter. The latter had called to learn the truth of the report that William Carles, who boarded there, had held one-twentieth of ticket No. 12,851, which won the first capital prize of $300,000 in The Louisiana State Lottery.

"Mr. Carles is not at home, but I can tell you all," said Mrs. Sherman in a tone which, although quiet, had an eager ring to it. "I am entitled to half, she continued, "for I played with Mr. Carles and we made that agreement."

"This is the fourth time I have invested my money in The Louisiana State Lottery," said Mr. Sherman, "but it will not be the last. I want you to say for me that I am thoroughly satisfied that the company is an honest one." When asked what they were going to do with the money Mrs. Sherman said: "Oh, we have that all arranged. I have a boarding house here, but I am going to discharge all my boarders to-morrow and close up the house. Next Wednesday morning Mr. Carles and myself and husband leave for Europe on an extended tour. We will visit my birthplace, Belgium, then Mr. Carles' old home, at Brussels. From there we go to Germany, where my husband's mother lives. At Paris we will remain some time before returning to Philadelphia."

When she returns from Europe, Mrs. Sherman will again take boarders, and Mr. Carles, although rather excited and elated when the news of his good fortune reached him, is not too proud to work. He says that upon his return he intends going into business.—Philadelphia (Pa.) Herald, August 1.

A Fair Trial

Of Hood's Sarsaparilla for scrofula, salt rheum or any affection caused by impure blood, is sufficient to convince any one of the superior and peculiar curative powers of this medicine. The following statement is right to the point:

"My daughter Mary was afflicted with scrofulous sore neck from the time she was 22 months old till she became 6 years of age. Lumps formed in her neck, causing great annoyance, and two of them, after growing to the size of a pigeon's egg, broke and discharged. One became a running sore for more than three years. We thought we would give Hood's Sarsaparilla a thorough trial. We began with it in January, and in a few months, after she had taken five bottles, all suppuration had ceased. We then waited three months, when as a new lump was beginning to form, we again gave her Hood's Sarsaparilla. After she had taken less than two bottles the lump and all indications of scrofula had entirely disappeared, and now she seems to be a healthy child." J. S. Carlile, Nauright, N. J.

PUT ON THE BRAKES

If you find you are going down hill in point of health. Failing strength, impaired digestion and assimilation are the marks of decline. Check these and other indications of premature decay with the grand vitalizer and restraining tonic, Hostetter's Stomach Bitters. Beginning at the fountain head, the stomach, the Bitters remedies its inefficiency, corrects its errors, and sets it vigorously at work. The digestive organ is thus enabled to thoroughly separate from the food its nutritive principles, which the blood assimilating, is enriched. Thus is the system nourished, and being nourished strengthened, and abnormal waste of its tissues stayed. Appetite, the power to rest well, a regular habit are also re-established, and the various functions move once more in their natural and healthful groove. The Bitters, moreover, is a specific for and preventive of malarial complaints, rheumatism, biliousness and kidney troubles.

CHAMPION HURDLER.

A. A. Jordan, champion hurdler of America, and holder of the American record for running 120 yards over 3 feet 6 inch hurdles, says:

"I have for a great many years used Allcock's Porous Plasters, particularly during the training season. I find that if I am affected in back or loins with any kind of a pain or strain, that Allcock's Porous Plasters instantly afford relief. For pains in the body, the result of a severe cold, nothing can beat Allcock's Plasters. I would certainly recommend the plasters to any athlete who is suffering with soreness and stiffness while in training."

P. HINKLE'S PATENT CENTRIFUGAL ROLLER QUARTZ MILL

THIS cut shows the New Hinkle Centrifugal Quartz Mill, with plates and slummer. This is the only mill made that needs no oil for the inside working parts, as it is thoroughly lubricated with water, supplied from a circular tank, which is connected to the roller spindles, slides and drips by rubber hose. By this means oil cannot interfere with perfect amalgamation. Other features of superiority are: Simplicity of construction; the free discharge of pulp; the wearing parts are easily replaced at a small cost. The small amount of power required to run the mill will recommend it to all practical mill men, as well as the small cost of erection and transportation of mill to the mine. A 5-foot mill weighs 9,000 lbs.; pulverizers 38 in. diam.; run, 80 to 90 rev. per minute, with a capacity of 20 tons per day. This size mill costs $1,500. With Silver Plates, Slummer and Ore Feeder, $1,800.

P. HINKLE'S PATENT ORE FEEDER.

Positive Feed and Ready Adjustment.

IN this Improved Ore Feeder the falling tappet of the mill causes a backward movement of the feeding-tray. As the ore comes from the hopper on to the tray, a transverse bar prevents the ore moving backward, and a small portion of the ore is thus forced off the front edge of the feeding-tray into the battery. The amount of movement of the feeding tray may be regulated, thus regulating the feed of ore. This feeder can be arranged for roller mill or stamps. It is strong and durable, and feeds wet or dry ore in regular quantities.

THE POODLE'S ESCAPE.

He Begged for His Life and Found a Sympathizing Audience.

A touching story comes from Paris. In a certain famous school of medicine the professor was about to illustrate the effects of a particular mineral poison. He placed a little white poodle upon the table, and then, fondling it caressingly, he explained to his audience in a few simple words the exact nature of the operations, and the symptoms of the instructive agony they were to witness.

Then, fastening the dog down into the torture trough, with the fine firm touch of the practiced vivisector, he skillfully laid open one of the veins of the neck. With a cry of pain the animal writhed for a moment helplessly under the calm hand of the professor, when suddenly by some misfortune one of the fastenings gave way, and then with a bound the poodle was free, and stood bleeding on the other end of the operating table.

The vivisector put down the phial containing the poison he was about to inject into the wound, and was stepping round to catch the poodle when the little animal stretched itself out flat upon the table, and began to crawl slowly towards him.

The whole attitude was expressive of penitence and submission, as though the creature were begging not to be punished any more. In another moment the dog would have been captured and put back properly into the torture trough, when it stood erect and turned head over heels.

The vivisector had before him a performing poodle, and the animal was saying as plainly as though it were in words, "See, you mustn't punish me any more, I will perform well." The antics over, the poodle resumed its attitude of submission, and crawling up to the professor began to lick his hands.

To him the incident was nothing—only a little delay in an interesting experiment, but before it could be resumed the students were on their feet, angrily telling the vivisector to put up his knife, declaring the poodle had earned its life.

The professor shrugged his shoulders at such a primitive display of emotion, but the students had their way.—Christian at Work.

Chancelor Caprivi's Democratic Ways.

A Berlin paper, discussing General von Caprivi's every-day life, says that the bell is rung at the Chancelor's door as at any other mortal's, and it is possible, without being prevented by the detectives who formerly were posted in front of Palais Radziwell, to penetrate as far as the threshold of his study. Whether the visitor succeeds in gaining a personal audience depends, however, on the importance of the occasion and on the time which the Chancelor has at his disposal. The General is busy every day from morning until evening. He rises early and works much in the morning hours. As early as ten o'clock he receives his colleagues. After a very simple dinner, at which the new Chancelor seldom has company, he rides for a few hours. On returning he receives official visitors, except on the days when he goes to Potsdam to the Emperor. Then comes the reports of the ministers. The remainder of his evenings, when he now and then receives some military visitors, and when, as in Prince Bismarck's time, the long pipe is invoked, he spends in his study. The Chancelor uses only half of the rooms of the palace, the whole right wing standing empty. The beautiful park which extends to the Koeniggratzer strasse, he does not use as often as Prince Bismarck. The latter often walked there even at night, accompanied by a detective and his dog Tyras.—Chicago Post.

—"While in Mexico on my last trip," says a drummer in the St. Louis Globe-Democrat, "I had my breath taken away when I saw what I guess is the most magnificently constructed railroad in the world. The ties are made out of the finest mahogany and bridges built of marble. The waste seems criminal, but the builders are actuated by motives of economy, as they find the mahogany and marble along the track side. The road hasn't really cost much to construct, but if the materials were appraised at St. Louis or New York standard of prices the total would mount up in the millions."

—"All the fools are not dead yet," said a cantankerous Richmond man to his spouse. "Of course they are not, John," replied the wife, "for if they were I'd be a widow."—Richmond Recorder.

RUSSIAN OFFICIALS.

How They Manage to Live High on Very Small Salaries.

When we descended into the street Herr von Hamilton told me that the nacselnik, whose official salary is £600, is supposed to make an income of about £3,000 to £4,000 a year. Nothing is done, nothing is carried out under his regime, but something remains in his palm behind. Every official request must be accompanied by a ruble note, or a bundle of that commodity of proportionate value to the matter in question. A merchant, say, wishes to undertake a journey, and forwards his passport, together with a five-ruble note, to be vise. A week passes, his departure is imperative—no passport! The Russian merchant knows better than to show any temper. He presents an humble request between the leaves of which a ten-ruble note is gracefully sandwiched, and lo! he receives his passport—he is a happy man. The proverbial spoonful of oil goes further than the bottle of vinegar, and in dealing with Russian officialism gentle persuasiveness is the means of gaining your end.

A characteristic episode led to the removal of the last nacselnik. He had conveyed to an old Bendzin Jew that his son could be got off serving in the army by the payment of a thousand rubles (for a short time ago (before) it was a usual thing for the officials who were connected with this matter, from the nacselnik downward, to sell exemptions and share the spoil). This Hebrew's son happened to be a weakly creature—almost a cripple—and by some misunderstanding the old Jew wrote to the authorities at St. Petersburg averring that his son would make at best such a poor soldier that he thought that he was not worth more than five hundred rubles. After that expose the nacselnik was no longer comfortable in Bendzin, so he was sent to the Caucasus—kicked up-stairs into an even more lucrative position!

We had not walked far before another meeting took place, and in broad daylight the usual kisses and affectionate accolades. "That man," said Herr von Hamilton, "was up till lately the secretary of the nacselnik. His official salary was about £60; still he managed to take his wife and family to Italy every year, and when he was removed—perhaps for being too energetic—he had managed to save 60,000 rubles besides."—Gentleman's Magazine.

ALL HANDS ASLEEP.

Engineer, Conductor and Passengers Let the Train Run Itself.

"We had been shooting prairie chickens in Uinta County, Wyoming Territory, and lost our way," he said. "We had expected to strike the Union Pacific railroad at Hilliard, about sundown, but it was nearly 8 o'clock in the morning when we crawled up to the little station platform, tired, sore, and dead fagged. We sat there shivering waiting for the next down 'freight' until the red light rounded the curve and came toward us shivering and tottering, as it seemed, in the darkness. We did not expect to be able to stop the train, but the grade was slight here and as all trains from Piedmont to Evanston are run 'on grade only' we had determined to 'jump the train.' S—— was to take the engine at the cab door. That left for me the caboose at the end or possibly the emigrant-cars, if the train carried any. It is next to impossible to 'jump' a freight car, as there are no steps or no place to seize as you make the spring. I was to climb up, walk along the freight-cars and join S—— in the engine where it was warm and where we could talk to the engineer and fireman.

"The heavy freight train rumbled down upon us, and as the engine shot past I saw S— suddenly pull himself up and then he was gone in the darkness. A moment later, after the rattle and rush of a string of cars, I spied my chance on an emigrant-car, and I, too, was safe on board. I had not expected to find an emigrant train, but when I landed on the platform of the first coach I opened the door and went in. Every one, including a brakeman, was fast asleep. I went through the three cars and back to the caboose. Every one was fast asleep. Then I walked back through the cars, and climbing to the top of the last freight car, started to walk ahead to find S—. I met him coming my way, as he was afraid I had not made my connection and had been left behind.

"'The engineer and fireman are both sound asleep,' he said.

"'Then every one on this train is asleep,' I answered, 'and there are a hundred or so of emigrants back there.'

"We went ahead, and I, getting down to the tender, sat on the coal and looked at the engineer and fireman. From Hilliard to Evanston the grade increases and it is a lively run. The train went ahead at a smashing rate, not a single brake being on, but both the men in the cab slept on peacefully.

"It was full daylight when we entered the cut above Evanston. S—— shook the engineer heavily there.

"'Better wake up,' he said, with a curious smile on his face. 'You are running into town at a passenger train's speed.'

"'Who's asleep?' said the engineer, gruffly, springing up and rubbing his eyes as he looked at his big silver watch. 'What are you doing in here?'

"'Oh,' said S——, with a laugh, 'I've been watching over your slumber for an hour or more.'

"At this the engineer's savageness suddenly disappeared. It was down brakes then, and the long train came to a standstill. The fireman meanwhile had become awakened and looked sheepishly at his superior. Each had trusted the other.

"'What are we lying here for?' asked S——.

"'Twenty minutes ahead of time,' said the engineer, meekly. 'Say,' he added, eagerly, 'you've saved my head on this. Don't say any thing about it, will you?'

"Twenty-three minutes later No. 8 pulled into Evanston on time to the second."—N. Y. Tribune.

LITTLE HELIGOLAND.

It Commands the Approach to Germany's Most Important Ports.

The relative value of national possessions is curiously illustrated by the fact that England, with her 9,000,000 square miles of the earth's surface, receives for this little island, which is not as large as Central Park, an indemnity representing about half a million square miles of African soil. Even this may prove less than profitable, for Heligoland yields an annual revenue of $40,000, while he would be a bold prophet to assert than any European power will make both ends meet in the administration of the Black Continent. But though as a mercantile exchange the British have received a questionable property from Germany, still it is a matter of congratulation for the civilized world that the two greatest Protestant nations of Europe, both belonging to the same Germanic race, and both rivals in the same industrial field, should have removed from between them the cause of what might at any time provoke a war.

Heligoland became English after the defeat of Napoleon and his exile to Elba. At that time no one but Gneisenau dreamed of such a thing as a mighty German Empire, stretching from the ocean to the Russian frontier, and England had little difficulty in holding it by treaty.

It lies adjacent to Germany's greatest seaport and commands the approach to the second in importance as well. If a foreign power should claim possession of Block island or Fisher's island, we could realize how Germans would regard Heligoland in British hands. Or, if we could imagine an island off the mouth of Mississippi, or between Sandy Hook and Fire island, the cases would be somewhat analogous, provided the British flag floated over them. Fortunately Heligoland has long since ceased to be considered valuable to England, while to Germany it has risen in importance with every increase in the German navy, every addition to Germany's merchant marine, and, above all, every indication of having to reckon with Russian or French cruisers.—Poultney Bigelow, in Harper's Weekly.

MR. DEPEW'S INDUSTRY.

Rejuvenating Effect of His Presence on a Listless Lot of Men.

I have often heard people express their wonder that Chauncey Depew can get through such an extraordinary amount of work every day and still have plenty of time for dining out at night. He boasts the complexion of a sixteen-year-old girl, and his eyes are bright, snappy, and full of life. Doubtless a great share of the details of his work are taken off his hands by Mr. Duval, who is the most sagacious and energetic of private secretaries known to public life since Colonel Lamont's retirement. The rest Mr. Depew does himself. I saw an illustration of his methods this week. On one of the hottest nights of the week—and there were some scorchers—I happened to miss a train on the Central road by the fraction of a minute, and as I had forfeited my dinner in the wild hope of catching the train I felt a depression of spirits which was in inverse ratio to the height of the thermometer. I dived across the street to the nearest place and entered a long, narrow and low ceilinged cafe. Twenty or thirty dejected looking men with their waistcots unbuttoned, their collars loosened and their legs stretched out, sat mopping their faces and endeavoring to eat. A crew of frowsy waiters lagged to and fro and the cashier leaned back in his chair fanning himself languidly. I ordered something to eat and sat in the stuffy seclusion of a corner trying to summon up enough energy to go down town and attend to some important work I had in hand. It was imperative, and yet I made up my mind to let it go by the board, and was sitting there fully resolved to do no more that night, when the door was opened briskly and a strongly built, square-shouldered man strode in, glanced rapidly about, selected a table that stood apart and taking off his hat, revealed the dome-like forehead and thinly thatched cranium of Chauncey Depew. A small, active and alert young man who accompanied Mr. Depew dropped the valises he was carrying on the floor, handed the famous railroad president a big bundle of papers, and, whipping out a big note-book, revealed the fact that he was a stenographer. He was a good one, too. For an hour he never raised his head from the book nor asked a single question. His pencil moved with machine-like regularity from one side of the page to the other until the book was half filled with notes. As for Mr. Depew, he offered a picture of energy, intellectuality and health which was vividly accentuated by the groups of fagged, listless and somnolent men in the same room. He sat perfectly erect, with his papers in one hand, while he occasionally passed his handkerchief over his forehead with the other, dictating with indefatigable evenness and emphasis. The play of his features and the constantly alternating series of expressions almost gave an index of the character of the letters he dictated. One paper after another was disposed of, and in exactly an hour the correspondence was finished and Mr. Depew arose, handed a liberal fee to the waiter, bowed courteously to the cashier and strode out. His exhibition of energy and vitality were not without effect. The waiter braced up, the cashier began balancing his books, a number of the diners buttoned their waistcoats and straightened up in their chairs and I lighted a large cigar, climbed on the bow of a Fourth avenue car and went down to tackle the work I had decided to shirk before Chauncey Depew had set us all a good example.—Blakely Hall, in Brooklyn Eagle.

A PECULIAR SECT.

California Ascetics Who Refused to Answer Census Questions.

Census enumerators in Southern California have run across a queer settlement near Anaheim. They are purely vegetarians, and refuse to acknowledge any Government, church or law other than Jehovah, and flatly declined to give any information to the census men, so it was necessary to arrest the entire party of fifteen. They still refuse to give an account of themselves, claiming that they are not citizens of the United States, but of the world, and that no power has authority over them save the Supreme Ruler, and they will probably receive the full penalty of the law.

This sect has many queer ideas, and started about fifteen years ago when George P. Hinde, an Englishman by birth, located near Anaheim. He gave it out that he was desirous of demonstrating that man could live without animal food; that he could exist alone on nuts and vegetables. The result has been that he has gathered about him a colony of about fifteen, most of whom are men, although women are admitted to the faith. All property is held in common. It is invested in land which belongs to the sect. They raise considerable produce, for which there is always a market, and in this way make a living. In the past they have lived quietly with and among themselves and public attention has never been directed to them until now. At present Walter Lockwood Thales appears as leader.—St. Louis Republic.

Amusing Tricks of the Birds.

"I was much amused one afternoon," says an observant friend, "by a little family scene on a twig of an elm tree, where a fly-catcher had her tiny brood of five, just out of the nest, all perched in a row. She was feeding them, and the little dots took their rations with great content as often as the mother caught an insect and flew back with the morsel to each open beak in turn. The regularity with which she kept account, feeding one after the other, in exact order, from top to bottom of the row, was very interesting. Presently one small chap grew impatient, and while the mother was away fluttered over and crowded itself into the place next to the bird last fed—exactly as he had planned to get the next fly. He sat there looking very sober and innocent when the mother returned, but she saw the trick at once, and gave the fly to the right bird, whisking the interloper (as I fancied) with her wing as she passed him, by way of cuffing his ears. Probably he was the rogue of the family, and she knew him too well."—Boston Transcript.

POPLIN BACK AGAIN.

The Well-Known Fabric Coming Into Fashion Once More.

Slowly, but surely, poplin is regaining its former fashionable position. It is shown in all the quiet shades and none of the extreme ones, which would seem to suggest that it is expected to be worn by people of good taste. In the dainty heliotropes and grays it is specially liked, as it seems to have a silvery look then that is very artistic. Poplin in the light-weight quality shown for summer wear is simply developed, a perfect fit and suitable decorations, if any, making the gown smart, rather than numerous drapings, shirrings or plaits

The woman who feels that she can not dare the simplicity of a tailor-made gown will be wise to select a poplin, inasmuch as it can be made very simply and yet have a soft waistcoat, a jabot of lace, or some effect with ribbons to take away from the severity of the bodice. Velvet sleeves look very well in contrast with this lustrous material, and if one wishes to be a little ahead of the fashion, a cloth jacket, matching the gown material in color, and without sleeves, may form part of the get-up. Then have a cloth toque, draped with velvet and a couple of velvet rosettes just in front. This is not absolutely a summer costume, but one must remember that there are cool summer days when the spring or autumn gown is greeted with joy.

In choosing a heliotrope poplin get one of the pure shades; that is, one without a pink tone in it. When the undesirable shade is gotten, and sometimes it is by mistake, it proves tiresome to the eye, and then, too, it is shown in cheap cotton stuffs, the last a special reason for avoiding it.

A poplin costume recently exhibited is made of heliotrope poplin, the pure shade that, having in it no tint of pink, is suited for all occasions when one wishes to be dressed a little more than usual and yet does not care for too elaborate toilet. The foundation skirt is quite plain. Over this is the long, full skirt that forms the drapery, and which is trimmed with four rows of velvet ribbon a shade darker than the material. It is looped in box-plait fashion on one side, which gives a wrinkled effect to the front; but that is the only looping, straight, full lines being formed by the remainder of the skirt. The basque is extra long and very sharply pointed. It is closed down the front with small velbet buttons of the shade of the ribbon. A zouave jacket is simulated by heliotrope passementerie that is shaped to fit the figure and sewed well to its position. The sleeves are slightly full and have deep cuffs of the passementerie. The high collar is also covered with it. A velvet ribbon starts from each side at the waist, is brought forward and knotted just at the point of basque, and then the loops and ends decorate the front. The bonnet is a capote of black lace straw; its brim is draped with heliotrope velvet, in front is a cluster of mignonette, and the ties are of heliotrope velvet. Pale heliotrope undressed kid gloves are worn.—Chicago Times.

THE LOVER'S RETURN.

His Calculations Upset by an Event of Some Importance.

"I—I—that is, you will excuse me," he stammered as he entered a store on upper Broadway yesterday and was accorded an interview with the proprietor.

"What did you wish, sir?" was the cold but polite rejoinder.

"Well, you may think me foolish, but I must run the risk. About a year ago you had a girl over there behind the railing—a type-writer and private secretary, I presume."

"Yes, sir."

"She was a handsome girl—very handsome, and her speech and demeanor showed good blood."

"Yes."

"Well, I—I fell in love with her."

"Did you? Well?"

"She was very coy and shy, but after a time I thought I could detect signs that my feelings were reciprocated."

"Ah! Indeed! Look at you in a tender way?"

"I thought so. For weeks I made it a practice to pass your store at two o'clock daily, so as to get sight of her. She got so she looked for me at that hour."

"Indeed!"

"That is, I thought she did. I thought her eyes lighted up as she caught sight of me. I suppose the proper way would have been to come in and ask you to introduce me, but—but one hesitates over those things, you know."

"Yes, I know."

"About a year ago I was suddenly called to Chicago. While there I met with a bad accident, and only yesterday returned to New York. I wanted to write her, but under the circumstances I could not."

"I follow."

"But I thought of her daily, aye! a hundred times a day."

"That was correct."

"And now that I have returned I called to catch sight of her dear, sweet face once more, but I don't see it. Is she with you yet.?"

"O, yes."

"Is she ill?"

"O, no."

"Absent temporarily?"

"Yes; over at the house."

"Your house?"

"Yes. Perhaps you'd like to walk over? I married her about a year ago, and this is the hour when the baby is asleep and she is at liberty."

The axe fell. With a moan of anguish on his pale lips the returned lover walked out of the store in a blind, staggering way, reeled down the street as if drunk, and uttered no word until he reached the drag store at the corner. Then he made a great effort, pulled himself together, entered, sat down on a stool before the soda fountain, and hoarsely whispered:

"Give me lemon and vanilla, with plenty of froth on it, for I calculated she'd earn enough to support us both!"—N. Y. Sun.

—As far as experiments with car-brakes have been carried there is found to be practically no difference between the different metals so far as their power is concerned, although their wearing qualities differ materially.

THE COMMON PEOPLE.

World Customs That Strike Americans as Preposterous.

In Europe, rank is first of all a question of birth. Mr. Gladstone must go into dinner after a boy if the boy happens to be a duke. This rule of precedence strikes the American as preposterous. Our countrymen have been so long rid of a privileged class of titled aristocrats that they can not understand how genius and eminent service may be reckoned after a mere family distinction. We believe in blood in this country, but we expect it to tell in achievement before it is accorded the first place of honor. It is true that Americans are sometimes accused, not always unjustly, of tuft-hunting; but the titled foreigner is sought after over here because he is a rara avis, a social curiosity, and not because Americans are born with that instinctive deference to rank which is so general on the other side of the Atlantic. An hereditary legislature has always been impossible here. Strictly speaking, there are no common people except commonplace people. The rigidity of social forms, the drill of society, establish a conformity to etiquette which, however decorous, is not picturesque or otherwise interesting. The regulation uniform of society, the dress-coat and white cravat, may be defended upon certain grounds which we need not examine now; but there should be no tolerance for the affection of a tone, a mannerism, which is at war with every thing expressive of originality or even of individuality. We would not imply, of course, that people of good society are necessarily commonplace or dull. Wit and humor are always welcome among sensible men and women; but we have remarked a tendency to make a fetish of forms, to set up a Draconian code on the authority of Mrs. Grundy, which is only too suggestive of another famous lady's "prunes and prisms." But commonplace people are not confined to any sphere of life. We find them wherever a stupid mental conservatism condemns the eccentricity of a new thought or an independent opinion. If a man does not enjoy the "Paradise Lost," if he is not enthralled by the genius of Addison or of Steele, we confess that we like to hear him acknowledge his treason frankly. There is more in him than there is in the solemn humbug who professes to admire every thing that he has been told he ought to admire, and who has never in all his life been guilty of one honest criticism. Originality is the one essential uncommon thing in the world, and—though this may seem paradoxical—there is a great deal of it among those whom we are wont to call the common people. Our great novelists seek it in remote country districts, in mountain fastnesses, in the lowly retreats of poverty and ignorance—wherever nature has a chance and people say what they think. It fascinates us because it is human rather than conventional. The society novelist essays a task of immense difficulty, for every body prefers Sam Weller to Fitz Augustus Templeton De Vere, and society is never dramatic until, under the impulse of passion, it tears off its mask and forgets its rules. When we said just now that there were no common people except commonplace people, we meant merely that there is no common mold or brand of human nature. Twins are not so nearly alike that their mothers do not know them apart, and nothing can destroy the impress of individuality but academic restraint and social discipline. It is variety of talent and taste that makes the necessary division of labor the joyous activity of progress, and it is the natural opposition of temperaments that endows human intercourse with its chief charm. Nothing could be more stale, flat and unprofitable than a symposium of interlocutors who all thought and felt alike on every imaginable subject.

The beam of song, the blaze of eloquence, are provoked by the contrast and the conflict of independent minds occupying different points of view.—N. O. Picayune.

CONCERNING POETRY.

Judicious Reading of It Will Give One Command of Language.

A girl said to me a few days ago of a friend of hers: "I never in my life knew anybody who had such a flow of language as she has. She is never at a loss for a word of comparison or an appropriate quotation. How in the world does she do it?" Well, I asked her, and this is what the good talker said:

"When I was a very little girl my great delight was to read and study poetry. I learned poems by heart to recite at school, to say to my mother and to delight my brothers with. I have always kept up that habit, and every day, as I am dressing, I have an open book on my bureau and learn something by heart, even if it is only a verse of four lines. I have never given drawing-room recitations, for I know I should simply bore people, but I have gotten a great deal of pleasure myself from the habit, and I believe it has done more to give me a good command of words than anything else.

If you take a bit of advice from me you will chose to begin on the shorter poems of Austin Dobsin, of Owen Meredith, or dear old Tom Hood or Adelaide Proctor, and later on, of Elizabeth Barrett Browning and Rossetti. You know the last was the poet who so dearly loved his wife that he buried with her the poems which he had written beside her, and which had never been published. Many years after his friends insisted that these poems should be disinterred, and it was found when the coffin opened that her wonderful blonde hair had grown to her feet and formed a network that glistened like gold thread in the sun over the bundle of papers. If you do not care for these poets, take any other you like, but do not try to do too much at once. The little by little is the very best theory in life if you want to gain any thing.—Ladies' Home Journal.

A Bad Blunder.

Housewife (testily)—Go 'way from this door, you old tramp! What do you want anyway?

Seedy-looking man—(starting off)—I wanted to make you a call, I'm the new minister.—Drake's Magazine.

ON LIFE'S THRESHOLD.

Young Tommy, a Goat, a Hose and a Pretty Grave.

A dear, benevolent old gentleman gave to an enfant terrible a fine goat. This was a few days ago. The youngster was naturally delighted with his pet. His gave out vaguely to his friends and enemies that he was training an animal which would be a terror to the neighborhood. Doubtless the goat would have proved a very disturbing element in society if its youthful owner had not trained it a trifle too fine.

It came about in this wise:

The goat—and of this there is no doubt—stood badly in need of a washing. Tommy, as its owner may be called for the occasion, is not generally overfond of washing, but as regarding goats he was an ardent lover of cleanliness. So he got a garden hose and attached it to a hydrant. Then he tied up the goat securely and played upon it till the animal's hair was as clean as the streets of Pittsburg will be at the millennium.

Then Tommy fell to communing with himself.

"If," reasoned he, "the goat was so dirty outside, he must be very far from clean inside."

This seemed conclusive to Tommy's companions, and they consented to hold the goat while he effected the internal purification.

Tommy inserted the nozzle of the hose into the goat's mouth.

It is a painful subject.

But the goat has a very pretty grave at the end of the lawn between two laurel bushes.—Pittsburg Dispatch.

Reasoning from Analogy.

A 4-year-old miss lately created a good deal of consternation, not unmixed with amusement, in a small social circle uptown. She had been on a visit to her grandfather, and while there was in the habit of playing with him as he lay, half asleep, on the sofa. One day, as her chubby fingers glided caressingly over the old gentleman's scant locks, he murmured drowsily, in reply to some infantile remark: "Yes, I'm your poor old bald headed grandfather."

One evening not long afterwards, a young old bachelor was making a call on the family, towards a certain member of which, only 18 and decidedly pretty, he inclined with very tender feelings. Into the pleasant circle where the bachelor sat flashing bright nothings of society talk, entered the 4-year-old. Unseen by the gentleman she sauntered around the room inspecting him, and gazed with especial interest on his polished scalp which gleamed in the light of the chandelier. Suddenly, with a burst of ingenuous sociability, she threw herself at his knees and exclaimed: "Whose poor old bald headed grandfather are you?"—Philadelphia Times.

The Pocket in His Night Shirt.

The precocity of eight-year-old boys has often been the theme for newspaper comment, but I think I know of one who is entitled to particular distinction for his brightness. The other day he importuned his mamma for a night shirt "just like papa's," with a pocket in it. His mother made him one, and the first night he wore it he went to bed in high glee. In the morning, when his mother took the robe off, she found in the one pocket a couple of seed cakes, three matches, a toothpick, a small silver watch, several pieces of cough candy and the boy's pocket handkerchief. When the little fellow was questioned as to the reason for the varied assortment he replied: "Well, I thought if I got hungry in the night time I would need the seed cakes, and of course I'd want the toothpick afterward. If I wanted to see what time it was by my watch I would have to have a match, and I was afraid of coughing, so I put the candy there." His excuses were equal to his preparations at any rate.—Minneapolis Tribune.

Better to Receive Than Give.

In a St. Albans church on a recent Sunday a little lad looked on with surprise as the contribution boxes were passed around. He had an idea that the cash was being distributed gratis, and so, just as the box was leaving the pew in which he sat, he put his chubby little hand in among the change and brought out a fistful, and was quite disgusted when his mamma made him disgorge.—St. Albans Messenger.

A Question About Phillips Brooks.

When Phillips Brooks rose last Sunday to give out his text, "I was in prison, and ye came unto me," a little fellow, 5 or 6 years old, looked up anxiously into his grandma's face, as he exclaimed in a hoarse whisper, plainly audible to those in the adjacent seats, "Grandma, was Mr. Brooks ever really in prison?"—Boston Gazette.

Adulation.

This represents the prevailing amusement in village circles just at present. The young gentleman in the center is a recently graduated cadet from Annapolis and is being welcomed home.—Judge.

Terse.

The following notice was posted on the Brunswick and Western bulletin board Friday morning by the agent to keep from answering the thousand and one questions about the train: "All trains delayed on account of fire at Tifton. Tift's planing mill burned. This is all we know." A mischievous chap came along and read it, and forthwith began to study up some way to catch the agent, so poked his head in at the door and said: "Mister, when did this thing occur?" Forthwith another line was added to the bulletin: "Happened last night."—Brunswick (Ga.) Advertiser.

Too Much Learning.

Gus De Smith—What did you do with that letter that was on my table?

Colored Boy—I tuck it to de pos'offis, sah, and put it into de hole.

Gus De Smith—Did you not see there was no address on the envelope?

Enough to Mix Any One Up.

"Start to-morrow on your vacation, eh! Where are you going?"

"Oh, just down to Rocky Beach."

"Aha! How do you go to get there?"

"Blamed if I know! I thought I did, but I have been studying a railroad guide to make sure, and I can't tell anything about it."—Lowell Citizen.

County Official Paper.

Just now there is a lingering howl, and long drawn out, in the entire press of the United States because of the glaring errors of the late census. A late issue of the San Francisco "Call" contains a long editorial on the subject which claims that Porter was entirely unfitted for the position which he held. It is claimed and freely admitted that the selection of Census Enumerators was but a vast system of "patronage" doled out to small party bosses, and the men chosen by them to perform the important duties of enumeration were, save in exceptional cases, political bummers and hangers-on. The census as it now stands is a menace to the immediate welfare of the Nation. There is much more importance attached to a correct rendering of census information than at first would meet the eye. Aside from the number of population and consequent apportionment for representation, the obtaining of correct statistical knowledge is a matter of the gravest importance in the political economy of the country. A number of States are now engaged in taking a new census under their own management. But the fact that an irrepairable injury has resulted from the incapacity of those in charge cannot be obviated. The entire press of the Union, irrespective of politics, are united in the condemnation of the result of the late census and the methods used in acquiring it.

COURT NOTES.

Superior Court of Inyo County, California
Hon. John A. Hannah, Judge.

TUESDAY, Oct 7th.

N. T. Piper vs. J. C. Crocker et als.—Filed complaint and issued summons and writ of attachment.

Broder et als. vs. Conklin et al.—Defendants file nosice of intention to move for a new trial.

BORN.

CROUGH—At Big Pine, October 5th, to Mr. and Mrs. D. Crough, a son.

DIED.

CROUGH—At Big Pine, October 5th, infant son of Mr. and Mrs. D. Crough.

C. S. Swan has returned to Los Angeles.

There were several frosts during the week.

Registration closes to-morrow, the 18th.

Sheriff Eldred started for Sylvania last Saturday.

United States Chief Justice Miller died last Tuesday.

Judge Hannah has gone to Ventura County on a visit to relatives.

J. J. Gunn has gone to Modock to commence work on the Minnietta mine.

Wonder if those pistol shots no Monday night were a Chinese celebration.

There are about twenty-five men employed in and about the Defiance mine at Darwin.

The Clerk of the weather leaves nothing to be desired. Too lovely for anything.

District Attorney Gill went to Benton on Thursday to defend a suit at that place.

John Anton has disposed of his saloon business in Keeler and returned to Lone Pine.

Will Yaney, Under-Sheriff, returned on Monday evening from a short visit to Bishop.

Congress will in all probability reconvene on November 11th to pass the Federal Election bill.

There is a continual rattling of shot among the quail. The shooting this year is excellent.

John C. Eddy came in from Darwin last Saturday and remained in town several days this week.

Dr. and Mrs. Bunting left Lone Pine last week and returned to their home in Michigan.

The trotting stallion, Nelson, trotted at Terre Haute last week in 2:11¼, beating Axtell's record ¾ of a second.

Messrs. A. R. Conklin and C. Mulholland are in San Francisco attending the session of the Masonic Grand Lodge.

A letter received from Cerro Gordo on Tuesday morning reports mining matters in a flourishing condition at that camp.

P. H. Mack returned home last Tuesday from a trip through the southern end of the County. He went to Bishop yesterday.

Lead is steadily increasing in value. The last quotation is $5.90. This should make mining very profitable in Inyo County.

Parties desiring a fine ranch with the best kind of stock range should address James Jenkins, Lone Pine. See his advertisement.

Mr. C. L. Crabtree of Oakland made a short visit to Independence last week, arriving Friday evening and and returning next morning.

Andy Dell met with a serious accident last Saturday. He was on the way to Bishop in a cart when he was thrown out and had his arm broken.

Stamboul failed to lower his record at Napa this week, doing the mile in 2 13¾, one second slow. He will make another effort before the meeting is over.

J. W. Symmes offers his ranch for sale. This is a fine property and should find a ready purchaser. The principle feature is the orchard, being about the best paying one in the County.

Percy Williams, a well known and wealthy horseman of Stockton, was shot and instantly killed at Fresno on the 3rd in a quarrel over a game of cards. Williams was the owner of Beauty Mc., the sensational trotter of the year, and other fast horses.

The heads of the Mormon Church have at last taken a step which has no doubt been delayed by the death of Brigham Young. They have publically and formally and authoritatively put an end to polygamy. They do it in what may be called a religious way, for want of a better term, and this is one evidence of its sincerity.

Frank Hunewill, Republican nominee for the Assembly, 721 District, spent several days in town this week. While visiting this office Mr Hunewill said, "Of course there is nothing in the office except the honor and that depends upon how the member conducts himself." He did not commit himself upon the question of securing a fair appropriation, but thought it should be done. As the District is so strongly Republican it is quite likely that Mr. Hunewill will be elected. He started on his return trip yesterday.

SUPERVISORS' PROCEEDINGS.

MONDAY, October 6th.

On the above named day the Board of Supervisors of Inyo county, State of California, met in special session at 7 o'clock p. m., pursuant to a call duly made and recorded. Present, Harger, Sneden, Robinson and Stewart. Absent, Eddy.

Chairman Robinson presiding.

Pursuant to Section 3665 of the Political Code of the State of California, as amended and approved March 9th, 1883, the Board proceeded to make the order stating and declaring the length of the main track of the Carson and Colorado Railroad Company, assessed by the State Board of Equalization for the year 1890, lying and being in Inyo county. The assessed value per mile; the number of miles of track and the assessed value of such railway lying in each city, town, township, school and road districts, or lesser taxing districts in this county, through which said railway runs, as follows:

Length of track	74¼ miles
Assessed value per mile	$2,137 14

The number of miles of track and the assessed value of such railway lying in the various school districts is as follows:

Station, 6¾ miles	$13,425 69
Bishop Creek, 4 miles	8,548 56
Warm Springs, 8 miles	17,097 12
Big Pine, 7 miles	14,959 98
Fish Springs, 14½ miles	30,988 54
Milton, 7½ miles	16,028 56
Independence, 4½ miles	9,617 13
Union, 7 miles	14,959 98
Lone Pine, 15 miles	32,057 44

The number of miles of track and the assessed value of such railway lying in the various road districts is as follows:

Road Dist. No. 2, 6¼ miles	$13,357 13
" " " 3, 13 miles	26,782 82
" " " 4, 19 miles	40,605 66
" " " 5, 14 miles	29,919 96
" " " 6, 22 miles	47,017 43

It is ordered that a tax of six dollars upon each $1,000 of value of taxable property of Bishop Creek school district as assessed for the year 1890, be and is hereby levied, to be collected and placed to the credit of the Building Fund of said Bishop Creek school district.

It is ordered that a tax of $3 70 be levied upon each $1,000 of taxable property of Warm Springs school district as assessed for the year 1890, be and is hereby levied, to be collected and placed to the credit of the Building Fund of said Warm Springs school district.

It is ordered that a tax of $2.00 upon each $1,000 of value of taxable property of Big Pine school district as assessed for the year 1890, be and the same is hereby levied to be collected and placed to the credit of the Building Fund of said Big Pine school district.

It is ordered that a tax of $5.50 upon each $1,000 of value of taxable property of Independence school district as assessed for the year 1890, be and is hereby levied, to be collected and placed to the credit of the Building Fund of said Independence school district.

It is ordered that a tax of $6.10 upon each $1,000 of value of taxable property of Union school district as assessed for the year 1890, be and is hereby levied, to be collected and placed to the credit of the Building Fund of said Union school district.

The Board adjourned until 1 o'clock p. m. of this day, at which hour it reconvened same members present as at the morning session.

The Board having considered the matter of the tax levy for the fiscal year ending June 30th, 1891, the following order was adopted:

Ordered that a tax of Two and 50-100 ($2 50) Dollars upon each $100 of value of taxable property of Inyo county, State of California, be and is hereby levied, to be collected and apportioned to the various Funds as follows:

State	$ 58
Salary	.70
Bond	.25
General Expense	.25
Special Building	.22
County School	.20
County Road	.20
Bridge	.10

The following bills for mileage and per diem were allowed on the Salary Fund:

J. D. Harger	$20 10
S. G. Sneden	19 80
E. Robinson	6 30
J. J. Stewart	10 80

Whereupon the Board adjourned.

How He Must Suffer.

A good many people have seen the following described humorous picture. A lion is seen lying quietly at the foot of a tree. A little monkey with the wizened, mischievous look of his race sits just out of the lion's reach, snirking and grinning and cutting many contemptible little antics. The lion pays no attention to the monkey's tricks, and finally the wretched little creature, grown more bold, taps the lion, who has hitherto been unconscious of his presence, on the nose with his tail. With one bound the powerful animal catches the monkey, mangles him frightfully and finally chases him up a tree, where the poor, miserable little thing sits and gnashes his teeth and howls with pain.

That is just now the attitude of "our highly (immoral cotem.," "up a stump" and he never misses an opportunity to chatter and scream. Every statement made in the INDEPENDENT that can by any means be distorted and twisted out of shape he eagerly grasps like his malicious prototype. His painful grimaces and petty anger would be laughable were they not at the same time pitiable.

Dissatisfaction.

Sheriff Eldred reports great dissatisfaction among the voters at Sylvania because of there being no polls established at that place. There are twenty-three men employed in the mine and prospecting and it will cause too much of a hardship to compel that number of laboring men to leave their work and come upward of thirty miles to the nearest voting precinct. No doubt a good reason existed for the Board refusing to grant their petition, but the miners of Sylvania are certainly warranted in their feeling of aggrievement.

J. R. Eldred returned from Sylvania Wednesday. As stated in last week's issue work on top has been suspended but a force of men are still at work in the mine. Mr. Eldred gives it as his opinion that the ore will readily smelt. A quantity of ore was placed in a pit and smelted and quite a number of bars obtained. There is iron ore within four miles of the mine which can be obtained for flux.

Abe Diaz of Lone Pine is a happy daddy.

Dr. S. A. Middleton has gone to Lone Pine to locate.

Religious service at Independence will now commence at 7 o'clock, p. m., half an hour earlier than formerly.

Ben T. Williams, Democratic candidate for Sheriff arrived at Independence on Wednesday from Bishop. He continued on south next day and will make a complete canvass of the lower end of the County.

Charley Marvin brought back the "pride of the West", Sunol, from the East and she will be trained to beat her own, and if possible, the world's record this fall. Palo Alto is also in fine fettle and it is confidently expected that he will beat Father Time in a contest before the 1st. of January.

A sample of potatoes was brought in from N. T. Piper's ranch this week and can be seen at this office. Five of them weigh 16½ pounds. They are of the Peerless variety, smooth and solid clear through. Mr. Piper raised about 200 tons of potatoes this year on his ranch at Oasis, 60 tons being Peerless.

J. R. Eldred, the present Sheriff, who has received the Democratic nomination for Assemblyman, will go to Mono County next week and interview the electors of that section. Mr. Eldred has already had legislative experience, having been a member of that body in Nevada. As Sheriff he has made a most efficient officer. He has the best interests of the District at heart and if elected will make a good Representative.

Notice of Sale.

Notice is hereby given that unless all claims are paid on the following described stock, viz: Two bay fillies, aged four years, by Bismarck Jr., [Muldoon]. I will sell same to the highest bidder to settle said claims on Saturday, October 25, 1890, at my place at Camp Independence. Said animals are the property of one J. McCormick.

MRS. M. LEWIS.

Postoffice Opened.

The Postoffice at Modock was formally opened on October 4th for the transmission of mails, F. Fitzgerald, Postmaster. A stage leaves Darwin every Tuesday and Saturday on the arrival of the Keeler stage. Arrangements have been made to carry passengers and express. This will be a great convenience to the miners and prospectors of that region as they will now receive their mail twice a week.

For Sale.

Notice is hereby given that on account of poor health I offer my ranch for sale and for sixty days from date will sell at a sacrifice. The ranch is known to be among the leading fruit ranches of the valley. For price and terms apply to J. W. Symmes on the ranch.

J. W. SYMMES.

October 16th., 1890.

For Sale.

The ranch known as the "Rittgers place" near Lone Pine is offered for sale together with the the farming implements and stock. The ranch contains 320 acres of excellent land. The stock consists of thirty head of cattle and twelve brood mares. There is now sixty tons of hay on the place and feed enough to winter 200 head of stock. The winter pasture has been rented five years past at $300 a year. The soil is a rich loam and excellently adapted to vegetable raising. There is plenty of outside range, making it a good stock ranch. For further particulars address

JAMES JENKINS.

Correspondence.

ED. INDEPENDENT:—As a citizen and taxpayer and one who has the interest of the people at heart. I wish to call the attention of the public to the candidacy of Mr. J. R. Eldred for the Assembly from the 721 District, comprising Alpine, Mono and Inyo.

Mr. Eldred has been a citizen of Inyo for 11 years and at all times has been personally identified with the interests of the District, and especially with those of Inyo. He is a man of wide experience and has proven himself a most efficient officer while discharging his duties as Supervisor and also as Sheriff of this County. He is a man of sound judgment and his legislative experience while in the Assembly from Estmeralda County, Nevada, coupled with his unquestioned integrity should recommend him to every voter in the District as the man to vote for irrespective of party.

About
HALE'S
$2.50 Shoes!

It is not everywhere that you can get a FULLCALF shoe for $2.50. It costs too much—cuts too deep into the profits for ordinary shoe dealers to handle them.

There is but one place in the State where you are sure of getting just such a shoe for your money. This advertisement is intended to tell you that place.

Hale's $2 50 Shoe is made of solid calf, tanned to meet the requirements of our California climate. The workmanship is thorough and lasting. The shapes are neat and pleasing to the eye as well as easeful to the feet. Such a shoe as we have described is commonly sold for $3.00 or more. Its worth shows in its wear. We have it in the following styles:

Hook and lace—Plain French toe; London toe, with tip.
Congress gaiters—Plain French toe; London toe, with tip.
Button shoe—Plain French toe; London toe, with tip.

A PETRIFIED WONDER.

The Great Forest of Petrified Wood Near Florissant, Col.

The petrified forest at Florissant is located in a green valley a mile and a half from the station. The road to it leads south from the railroad, rising over the rolling hills in gentle slopes and disclosing new and beautiful views at every turn. To the east and north rise the green slopes of the divide, culminating on the east in the snow-capped summit of Pike's Peak. To the north, about five miles, Crystal Peak stands out, a sharp cone, from a cluster of wooded hills rising in round terraces to its base. Far to the west, over the intervening mountains and park, may be seen the snowy range, a perpetual wall of snowy white on the horizon, making the backbone of the continent.

Everywhere along the road may be found little chips of petrified wood, either dropped there by curiosity hunters or scattered from the remains of some stump in the immediate vicinity.

After going up and down through several little valleys, the road decends a rather steep grade to the valley where the "forest" is located. The valley is broader here than elsewhere, and here and there, scattered over the bottom and on the lower slopes of the surrounding hills, are little mounds of white petrified chips, marking the spots where the tops of the stumps reach the surface. Only one of the stumps has as yet been entirely uncovered, and to this most of the visitors go first. It is on the edge of a small grove on the west side of the valley. Over it is a rough scaffolding, from which are suspended several saws, still deeply imbedded in the stump. Several years ago, when the Midland was first opened, some one conceived the idea of transplanting the stump to Manitou, but it was found that it could not pass through the tunnels on the road. He then commenced to saw it into vertical slabs, which he thought could be put together afterward. The saws sank easily in the top of the stump for about two feet, when they encountered hard silica, to which the outside air had not penetrated, and there they stuck.

The stump is about forty-five feet in circumference and twelve feet high. Its shape is perfect; the buttressed roots, the knots and the irregularities of the bark are all there, as distinct as those on any of the pine trees close at hand. The wood varies greatly. While all of it shows distinctly the grain and peculiaties of pine wood, there are some pieces which are as hard as flint and white as marble, while others are soft and almost like natural wood. By pulling off pieces of the petrified wood here and there are found little fibers which the silica did not for some reason reach, but these crumble to dust when touched. The tree has been indentified as belonging to the same family as the giant trees in California.

Across the valley from the large stump is another one almost as peculiar. It is a large bluish-black stone which is made of thousands of pieces of petrified charcoal, conglomerated in a solid mass. None of the pieces are over an inch in length, and how they became knit together is likely to remain a geological mystery.

The place in its present condition will fully repay a visitor, but the expenditure of a few thousand dollars by the town of Florissant in securing title to the land, digging out the stumps and grading the grounds would make it a very great point of attraction for curiosity and pleasure seekers. The forest is reached by a ride of thirty-six miles on the Colorado Midland, over the divide. —Colorado Springs Gazette.

A Pretty Italian Phrase.

The Italians have a pretty phrase to express that fine kind of tact which is independent of education. They call it "the intellect of love;" and they have crystalized in those four words one of the most ethereal, but also one of the most potent characteristics of human nature. Not the most liberal education gives this intellect of love where the materials have been denied by nature; not the most restricted range of knowledge destroys it where it is there by the constitution of things. People who have this intellect of love are as slow to take offense as to give it. They have none of the prickly heat of temperament which flushes out into a moral eruption at the least contrariety of circumstances. They make allowances for wealth, health, disappointments, annoyances, misunderstandings, and they give the benefit of the doubt on the charitable side, whenever it is possible to frame a doubt at all. They never quarrel. Even if things go badly, as by reason of malice and misrepresentation as they do sometimes with the best in the world, they suffer quietly, and do not make bad worse.—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

Charming Gowns for Late Summer.

Printed mousseline delaines are dressy, cooler even than alpaca, and also very much worn. Many women prefer them to foulards, which soon lose their dressing and look limp and worn. The blue and white and green and white foulards have also lost caste, from being greatly reduced in price and becoming quite a livery at the various resorts. The delaines are almost invariably ribbon-trimmed, and show some exceedingly delicate and beautiful colorings and designs. The favorite patterns are detached bunches of flowers or sprays. The very large straggling devices which were popular last year are not much affected this season.—N. Y. Post.

As to Measures.

School-Teacher—Johnny, what does the word meter mean?

Johnny—A measure.

School-Teacher—Now, Johnny, what do they measure with the meter?

Johnny—Gas, electricity, water and poetry.—Harper's Bazar.

No Idea of It.

Husband (at 2 a. m.)—Are you going to let me stand here and pound on this door the whole night, my dear?

Wife—Why, of course not. I intend to hail the first policeman I see and have you locked up.—N. Y. World.

Mrs. Garfield is now 58 years old. She is somewhat stouter than of old, and her hair is whiter than in the days of her Washington life. She is said to look prettier in her mourning costumes than in the brighter colors that she used to wear.

The plain full skirt may be tucked almost to the knees in very fine tucks and by hand. The more hand work you can show on your gown the better taste is it, for machine stitching, except for long seams, is counted a profanation.

ABOUT EXTRAVAGANCE.

In the Past Money Was Spent More Recklessly Than at Present.

Pessimism continually charges a woful extravagance upon our age. The fathers, it says, were compeled to scrape and to save, mindful of every dollar, and content if only a meager balance remained to their credit at the end of the year. We are rapidly drifting into enervating luxury, it affirms, and our costly buildings, and paintings, sculpture, our comfortable modes of life, and our reckless way of considering public and private expenditures are indicative of an unhappy mental and even moral degeneration. There is much apparently in support of such statement. We are weary of prosaic living, in great degree, and long for a release to a civilization eminently comfortable if not luxurious, and, at least, "interesting," as Matthew Arnold would say. Not so far beneath our greed for monetary prosperity, indeed, existing as a potent motive to accumulation, is the natural desire for a better social condition. We take a half-holiday now and then to study great pictures or statues; we read more than ever good books and magazines, and we live in better houses. All this is necessary to proper development, and yet we must confess a certain tendency to extravagance, careless and dangerous. Still, however reckless we may be, it is perhaps a consolation to know that we are less extravagant than the people of certain other times. We pay our thousands for our houses, our pictures and our sculpture, and yet do not equal the Greeks and the Romans in expenditure. Attalus offered Nicias a sum equal to $75,000 for a painting, and the artist refused him, preferring to present the picture to his country as a gift. Julius Cæsar bought of Timomachus, the Athenian painter, two figures for eighty talents, or $100,000, and Apelles received some $25,000 for a portrait of Alexander wielding a thunderbolt. Indeed, he himself paid $75,000 for the pictures with which Protogenes had adorned his studio, and which had proved unsalable, and this chiefly as an encouragement to a struggling fellow-artist. Some of our public lecturers command excelent salaries, assuredly, but none of them would demand any thing like the $12,000 which Athens paid to Herodotus for reading his history at the Panathenaic festival. Socrates, it is said, received almost $19,000 for one oration, and, probably, even Dr. Depew could be engaged at a figure more reasonable. We all remember that Virgil was rewarded most generously for his few lines on the young Marcellus, and Suetonius says that Asellius Sabinus received four hundred thousand sesterces—some $17,000—for a dialogue between a mushroom, a cabbage, a thrush and an oyster. It cost the city of the Averni in Gaul a round million and a half for a statue of Mercury, and this expenditure seems to have been not especially exorbitant for the age. A hundred other examples of ancient extravagance might easily be found, but all would point to the same general truth, that our recklessness of expenditure has not yet equaled the recklessness of the past. But we must remember that a national lapse into luxurious idleness is followed always by national decay, and keep our eyes wide open to the pleasant but dangerous tendency of the present.—Providence Journal.

AMERICA'S RICHEST WIDOW.

She Maintains a Private Chapel Costing Seventy Thousand Dollars.

Never has there been such universal church-going in New York as during the present season. I saw a lady in black step out of a handsome mourning carriage in front of St. Thomas' church, last Wednesday afternoon, and some one told me that it was Mrs. Moses Taylor, who, with Mrs. W. H. Vanderbilt, shares the honor of being the richest widow in America. She is a member of the Presbyterian church, but is subject to no bigotries and finds pleasure in occasional attendance upon services in Episcopal churches. Churchgoing is one of her favorite pursuits at all times, and down at Long Branch she has a private chapel and chaplain of her own, who ministers to her spiritual needs during her summer sojourn. This chapel cost her $70,000, is attended by quite a large congregation of the local Presbyterians and is the center through which she distributes her many beautiful and lavish charities. It was a great surprise to her, upon her husband's death, to find herself so rich a woman, for he never talked to her about his business, and though she knew he was a wealthy man, she had formed no calculation as to the amount he was worth; no one, indeed, not even his executors, had credited old Taylor with more than half a dozen millions at the most, and the surprise of the latter was great on the appointed day, when they and the widow went to open the doors of the particularly-solid vault which the old man had built into the wall of his office.

The innermost compartment was large enough to hold certificates of stock and and the like securities without folding. There was a great stack of these papers lying neatly on top of each other, unwrinkled and uncreased. They represented Taylor's investments in railroads, banks and insurance companies, deeds of real estate and every sort of sound financial venture. The widow did not comprehend the full meaning of this great pile of documents, but the executors looked at each other with pleased significance, and set about making an inventory, jotting down figures on the back of a card, and announcing in awed tones to the widow, when this pleasing task was done, that she was the sole possessor of a fortune amounting to $40,000,000. She bore it with that meek and gentle resignation of which even the worst of us would be capable under similar circumstances, and many unfortunates have since had reason to be grateful that this great sum fell into such discreet and charitable hands. Mrs. Vanderbilt is also a faithful church-goer, having pews in several different churches, one of her favorite places of worship being old Trinity.—Brooklyn Eagle.

A Woman of Sense.

"Now, John," said Mrs. Olyum to her husband, "you must remember that there is a good deal for us to accomplish yet. We can't sit down and fold our hands. More refinement is what we want. I'm a great advocate of refinement."

"That shows ye've got sense," said Mr. Olyum, looking over the top of the paper. "I've jest contracted for a new refinery that'll pervide for all the crude material our wells'll turn out."

THE TINTYPE GIRLS.

They Have Lots of Fun, But They Worry the Poor Photographer.

They come in late in the afternoon, all talking at once.

"We want our tintypes taken."

"Yes, all together."

"In a group."

"Any particular style you'd like?"

"Oh, we want something picturesque. Yes, we want it artistic, an out-door scene, you know."

The photographer quickly wheels up a mountain view for background, waltzes a wooden-looking "rock" into the foreground, props up a rustic fence at one side, and throws down a shaggy grass-suggesting mat before it. While he is composing this medley from the inexhaustible beauties of nature the girls discourse on the subject in hand.

"Belle, you sit on the rock and I will stand beside you; Grace can lean on the fence, and May, you sit on the floor. We ought to have a book to be looking at. Ah, here's an album; that will do. Dora, which side of my face would be the best to have taken?"

"The outside," said Dora, promptly.

"I wish we had a parasol," says Grace.

"Be quick as you can," interrupts the photographer, realizing how precious is every moment of the fast-fading light. Dora bestows upon him a look which plainly says "with intent to annihilate:"

"We pay you by the job, not by the hour. Do not presume to hurry us."

At last they locate themselves according to the dictates of their own sweet and wayward fancies.

"Ah, my!" exclaims Belle from the rock, "what an awfully uncomfortable thing this is to sit on."

"Put your hand on my shoulder, Grace."

Finally all seems in readiness, when just as the photographer is about to remove the cap to expose the plate, May suddenly exclaims from the floor:

"Hold on a minute, Grace, you ought not to be standing; you are to tall. Change places with me."

Then ensues a general scrambling and rearranging. Belle improving the opportunity to try for a softer spot on the rock.

"Am I looking at the right place?" May anxiously asks of the photographer, as if the sun would certainly fail to do its desired work if her head was not turned at just the most becoming angle.

"Yes," replies the much-harrassed personage addressed, heroically choking back unholy utterances. "Sit perfectly still now."

He removes the cap, and a brief and blessed silence ensues. When he replaces the cap for a moment the chorus breaks out:

"Oh, my goodness—dear me—I never—why, I was just."

"Keep just as you are," says the photographer, authoritatively, unexpectedly removing the cap again, and thus effectively shutting off the threatened deluge of remarks.

The poor light necessarily made the exposure unusually long, and when at last it is over a volley of deep and revengeful groans comes from the girls as the photographer disappears with his plate.

Then their tongues are loosed.

"My, I feel all tied up in a bowknot."

"Goodness, but I'm tired standing so long."

"I never knew any one to be so long taking a tintype."

"Oh, I feel as if I had just had a tooth pulled—so thankful it is over."

"Oh, see this picture of some girls in a boat. Why didn't he say he had a boat?"

"I don't think he is very agreeable, anyway. All he thinks of is to get it over with."

"Oh, here he comes with the pictures."

Now they gather around the man with the pictures, all talking excitedly.

"Oh, oh, just look at me."

"Just see the way my eyes look."

"My head is held too high, and I asked you—"

"Oh, see how my dress looks," etc., etc., till at last they relinquish the artistic treasure long enough to have them put in envelopes.

Then they pay for them and go out, leaving the long-suffering photographer free to relieve his overwrought nerves in any form of speech he thinks will be most soothing to his feelings and expressive of his sentiments.—Boston Globe.

Easily Explained.

"Mr. Phorex," said the young man, with much feeling, "you must permit me to express my gratitude as well as my surprise that you have permitted Miss Daisy to look with favor upon my suit. In the bitterness that exists between the two cities I could not have complained if you had told me that you did not relish the idea just at this time of having a St. Paul man, and a poor man at that, for a son-in-law."

"It is all right, Philip," said the great flour merchant, kindly. "Make your mind easy on that score. When I found that Daisy was determined to have you I went to a census enumerator and had you enrolled as a resident of Minneapolis."—Chicago Tribune.

A Child Born with Wings.

A gentleman from Jonesboro was at the Capitol and told Mr. Briscoe, of the railroad commission, a queer story. He claims that in Jonesboro a baby was born last week which has four legs and feet, four arms with hands and a pair of wings on its shoulders. The gentleman vouched for the truth of the story, and said that it is still alive, and when he saw it was yelling as lustily as any ordinary two legged, two armed and wingless infant.—Atlanta Constitution.

Manufacturers of the Great Sierra Kidney and Liver Cure:

GENTLEMEN:—I have been a sufferer from kidney complaint for several years, and have used medicine upon medicine without any apparent relief until a friend of mine told me of the wonderful cures accomplished by your remedy. I was induced to buy a bottle but without much faith. After using the first bottle I noticed such an improvement I kept on until I had taken three bottles, and can safely say that I am entirely cured and never felt better in my life. I can gladly recommend The Great Sierra Kidney and Liver Cure to all people that are suffering in any way with kidney or urinary disorders.

Respectfully yours,

Some General Observations.

If I vhas to live my life oafer again I oxpect I do no petter ash pefore. Nopody knows how to live until he vhas about ready to die.

In trying to get something for nothing in dis world we cheerfully buy $2 worth of cigars fer der man who gifs us a teecket to a fifty cent show.

I doan' see some loafers around midout I wonder dot nature vhas so foolish. She could shust ash well haf used oop dot material to grow fence rails und hitching posts.

If you find me some man who vhas satisfied mit der weather und der peoples und der world, I show you somebody who vhas ripe for either heaven or der idiot asylum.

Vhen I like to pound on my drum I forget dot I haf some neighbors who may like to shleep. Vhen I like to shleep myself my neighbor should be put in shail if he plays on der piano.

We like a man who shpeaks der truth by us, und yet shust so soon ash he tells us something unpleasant we vhas mad at him.

Vhen I hear a boy whistle I feel safe. I know dot so long as he whistles he doan' put up some shop to shteal my apples or carry off my front gate.

If you take a man's bad luck und trace it back you vhill discover dot he vhas to blame ten times vhere somepody else vhas once, und yet he remembers only dot once.

We doan know some men until dey vhas gone to der bad. Den it vhas we hear aferypody say how shmart und talented dey vhas all der time.

Sometimes it seems to me dot der world vhas too wicked to stand much longer, and dot it vhas hard to find one honest, upright man. I take some liver medicine, und lo! der next day der world vhas good enough und all men vhas all right.

I haf seen a funeral procession a mile long, und two weeks later I haf asked who vhas buried dot day, und nopody could remember. Vhen a man gets through mit der world der world vhas through mit him.—Carl Dunder in Detroit Free Press.

Why He Stopped Eating.

"Polhemus, you look like a ghost. Have you had a spell of sickness?" "No, Magruder; there's nothing the matter with me but my microscope." "Your microscope! What do mean?" $15,000 FOR $1.

A Kensington Engineer Who Struck It Rich in The Louisiana State Lottery.

"I told him he might just as well throw the dollar in the gutter as spend it in a lottery, but I've changed my mind now as he won $15,000 with it."

So spoke Mrs. W. H. Fisher of 2518 Emerald street to a Herald reporter yesterday. Her husband held one-twentieth of ticket No. 92,561, which won the first capital prize of $300,000 in The Louisiana State Lottery this month.

"Well, it was the first ticket I ever bought," said the husband, "but," he added, "it won't be the last. I heard that a friend of mine was sending for a ticket, so I thought I'd send with him, I did so and never gave the matter another thought. On July 16th, the next day after the drawing, the man came running up to my house. His face was as white as a sheet and I immediately thought one of my boys had broken his large bulk window and he'd come up to complain.

"'You've won it,' he gasped.

"'Won what?' I asked.

"'Why, $15,000' he said.

"I looked at him for a minute and then went back to my work. It didn't affect me much.

"Yesterday I got my money—a draft for $15,000—and it is now in the Eighth National Bank. I have five children and have been working since I was 9 years old. I'm 49 now and I don't propose to stop. I'm an engineer and I only have to go to my back yard to work, as the engine of my employers, James Medicraft & Son's, is a stone's throw from my kitchen.

"I haven't decided what I am going to do with the money, but think I'll invest in real estate. I've struggled all my life and now that $1 invested in The Louisiana State Lottery has yielded me 15,000 times the original investment. I don't propose to have it turn my head."—Philadelphia (Pa.) Herald, July 30.

Out of the Fire

Only those who have suffered from salt rheum in the worst form, can know the agonies caused by this dreadful disease. Hood's Sarsaparilla has had remarkable success in curing salt rheum, as well as all affections of the blood.

"I owe the same gratitude to Hood's Sarsaparilla that one would to his rescuer from a burning building. I was tormented with salt rheum, and had to leave off work altogether. My face, about the eyes, would be swollen and scabbed, my hands and a part of my body would be raw sores for weeks at a time, my flesh would seem so rotted that I could roll pieces from between my fingers as large as a pea. One physician called it type poison, and gave me medicine accordingly; but salt rheum cannot be cured in that way. Finally I bought a bottle of Hood's Sarsaparilla. It helped me so much that I took a second and third bottle, and was entirely cured. I have not been troubled with salt rheum since." A. D. ROBBINS, Hagar Street, Jamaica Plain, Mass.

PUT ON THE BRAKES

If you find you are going down hill in point of health. Failing strength, impaired digestion and assimilation are the marks of decline. Check these and other indications of premature decay with the grand vitalizer and restraining tonic, Hostetter's Stomach Bitters. Beginning at the fountain head, the stomach, the Bitters remedies its inefficiency, corrects its errors, and sets it vigorously at work. The digestive organ is thus enabled to thoroughly separate from the food its nutritive principles, which the blood assimilating, is enriched. Thus is the system nourished, and being nourished strengthened, and abnormal waste of its tissues stayed. Appetite, the power to rest well, a regular habit are also re-established, and the various functions move once more in their natural and healthful groove. The Bitters, moreover, is a specific for and preventive of malarial complaints, rheumatism, biliousness and kidney troubles.

A pill manufacturer advertises on the label: "You take the pills, we do the rest."

GIVE THEM A THOROUGH TRIAL.

Hon. E. A. Moore, Member of Assembly, Richmond County, N. Y., writes:

"I have two afflictions which sometimes make life a burden. One is dyspepsia, the other is rheumatism. I heard that BRANDRETH'S PILLS, taken one or two at night on an empty stomach, would cure rheumatic pains. I gave them a thorough trial for three weeks, taking one or two every night. To my delight, not only was I cured of rheumatism, but dyspepsia, costiveness and biliousness. They did not interfere with my diet or business, and I really think them an incomparable blood purifier and cathartic."

P. HINKLE'S PATENT CENTRIFUGAL ROLLER QUARTZ MILL

THIS cut shows the New Hinkle Centrifugal Quartz Mill, with plates and shunmer. This is the only mill made that needs no oil for the inside working parts, as it is thoroughly lubricated with water, supplied from a circular tank, which is connected to the roller spindles, slides and drips by rubber hose. By this means oil cannot interfere with perfect amalgamation. Other features of superiority are: Simplicity of construction; the free discharge of pulp; the wearing parts are easily replaced at a small cost. The small amount of power required to run the mill will recommend it to all practical mill men, as well as the small cost of erection and transportation of mill to the mine. A 5-foot mill weighs 9,000 lbs.; pulverizers 38 in. diam.; run, 80 to 90 rev. per minute, with a capacity of 20 tons per day. This size mill costs $1,500. With Silver Plates, Shunmer and Ore Feeder, $1,800.

P. HINKLE'S PATENT ORE FEEDER.

Positive Feed and Ready Adjustment.

IN this Improved Ore Feeder the falling tappet of the mill causes a backward movement of the feeding-tray. As the ore comes from the hopper on to the tray, a transverse bar prevents the ore moving backward, and a small portion of the ore is thus forced off the front edge of the feeding-tray into the battery. The amount of movement of the feeding tray may be regulated, thus regulating the feed of ore. This feeder can be arranged for roller mill or stamps. It is strong and durable, and feeds wet or dry ore in regular quantities.

ODDS AND ENDS.

A man in Jefferson county, Pa., is said to have lost his sight from drinking too much ice water when heated.

M. Stambouloff, the premier and practical ruler of Bulgaria, is about 46 years old. He is short, rather stout, and with his round face, black mustache and small gray eyes somewhat resembles a Chinaman.

The Duke of Fife is one of the shrewdest of business men. All his investments turn out well. He took some founders' shares in a London trust company not long ago at $150 each, and they are now worth $4,500 each.

A writer upon birds says that in the fields and groves there are many old maids and bachelors who apparently never had any inducement to marry. There is no doubt that the rivalry in bird courtship is extremely keen, and the choice is a deliberate one.

They have a curious custom at the burial of unmarried women in Brazil. The coffin, hearse and the livery of the driver must be bright scarlet, the four white horses drawing the hearse must be covered with scarlet net, and scarlet plumes must deck the horses' heads.

Numbers of Hindoos were to be seen recently wandering about the Lahore bazars carrying bones of their deceased relatives round their necks. They were pilgrims going to Hurdwar. Most of them left the train at Jhelam to wash the bones in the sacred waters of Hydasnes, and then repurchased tickets for their onward journey.

Statistics of religious growth for the past year gathered by The Independent show that there are in the United States 151,261 churches of all denominations, 103,300 ministers and nearly 22,000,000 members. During the year there has been an increase of 8,500 churches, nearly 4,900 ministers and nearly 1,090,000 members.

At Bristol, England, are two young artisans who are the prize twins of the world. They are of the same height and weight; have eyes, hair and complexion of the same color; walk, speak, laugh, sing exactly alike; follow the same occupation; have the same religious persuasion and likes and dislikes; are both married, and have the same number of children, who are of the same sexes—three boys and three girls.

The captain of a schooner that lately arrived at Titusville, Fla., a few days ago captured near St. Lucie river two manatees or sea cows. Both of the creatures are females, the larger one measuring 8 1-2 feet in length and weighing 650 pounds. The other is 8 feet and weighs fifty pounds less. The manatee is a warm blooded mammal, an animal that suckles its young, and is a cross between a whale and a seal. It lives on vegetable food entirely, refusing flesh of all kinds.

The largest known springs are those bursting up from the ocean floor. Off the coast of Florida, in the Gulf of Mexico, a few miles from the shore, a large spring of fresh water rises to the surface, furnishing water to fishermen and sailors, who dip it up in the midst of the salt water of the gulf. A few miles from the eastern shore of Florida, nearly opposite Matanzas, a large spring of fresh water boils up in great abundance. So large is this spring that Lieut. Maury took his little coast survey steamer on the top of "the boil," and it was quickly swept to one side by the boiling spring.

Execution by Boiling.

It may be of interest to know that the English law formerly prescribed boiling where the culprit had committed a crime extremely revolting in its nature. The last person to suffer death by boiling in England was Rouse, cook to the bishop of Rochester, who had poisoned seventeen persons.—St. Louis Republic.

Ole Bull's Self Respect.

The late Ole Bull, the well known violinist, was perfectly fearless of consequences when his self respect was touched. As an example of this: The grand duchess of Mecklenburg gave the musician a letter of commendation to her father, then king of Prussia, afterward the Emperor William. With this he went to Berlin, where, as directed, he called first on the superintendent of the Royal Opera house, to whom he stated his mission. That gentleman was so patronizing that Bull could hardly stand it; but eventually an hour was fixed on the following day for another call at the opera house.

The violinist, with his usual punctuality, presented himself at the hour, determined to stand no nonsense. "Where is your violin?" demanded the superintendent. "In the case," responded Ole Bull, coolly. "And where is the case?" "At the hotel." "But did I not tell you to play for me?" "Excuse me, sir," was the answer. "I did not think you were in earnest. I play either for money or honor, and in this case neither is in question." The manager was piqued, and he replied sharply: "I cannot present you to his majesty without having heard you." "If the request of the grand duchess is not a sufficient recommendation to his majesty, her father, I am content to leave the city," which he did that day.—Chambers' Journal.

Two Antique Chairs.

When Mr. E. Edwards purchased of Mrs. Henry Yeaton the mansion on Clinton avenue built and formerly occupied by Mr. George A. Wells, he also came into possession of a part of the furniture, which comprises two interesting and valuable historical relics. These are two massive and elaborately carved chairs of state which Mrs. Yeaton brought to this country from France. A letter to Mr. Yeaton inquiring as to the origin and history of these antique and stately pieces of furniture elicited the reply that they had formed part of the furniture of Holyrood castle, formerly an abode of Scottish royalty, during the stay there of Mary, the unfortunate Scotch queen. This would make them something over 300 years old. Tradition says that the chairs came into the possession of the Yeaton family from an ancestor who was one of Queen Mary's wards of honor. It further asserts that Queen Mary was seated in one of these chairs and Lord Darnley, her husband, in the other, when certain of the courtiers followed Riccico, the queen's secretary, into the apartment and poignated him to death before the eyes of his royal mistress and her consort, who had instigated the deed.—Bridgeport Farmer.

An Ear That Was a Hand.

Rev. J. R. Folsom brought into the office a curiosity in the shape of a corn cob fashioned like a perfect hand. The ear of pop corn was plucked at Bingham, and when the corn was shelled from the cob there was revealed the perfect form of a child's left hand, fingers and thumb complete. Another feature of interest in connection with this is that the thumb shows to be double jointed, an exact counterpart of the left hand of the little girl living on the place where the corn grew.—Kennebec Journal.

Bridgeport's Ill Fated Suicide Club.

The Suicide club, of Bridgeport, formed five years ago in fun rather than in earnest, has been reduced to only one member by a remarkable faithfulness in carrying out the condition that one member of the club a year should commit suicide. When the annual meeting was held in January there were only two members to attend it, the secretary and the president. The former, Wendell Baum, committed suicide a few weeks ago in New York, and now the president alone remains. It was voted at this meeting by the secretary that the president should make away with himself during the year, and by the president that the secretary do so, and, there being no better way to settle it, it was mutually decided that the polls be held open until a new member was pledged and initiated.

A letter carrier named Mayby talked seriously of becoming a member, and the president and secretary had great hopes of him until one morning it was learned that he had committed suicide. He carried, however, a handsome silk umbrella, which he bequeathed to the secretary of the club, Wendell Baum, and it was accepted. But the more Baum carried the umbrella the more unhappy he became, and when his friends tried to cheer him up he said: "A cloud hangs over me; I am doomed." Finally he sold his property, turned the money over to his wife, and, going to New York, gave the umbrella into the charge of a friend, directing that it be sent to the president of the club. He then cut his throat. Since then the umbrella has been uncalled for, and the president of the Suicide club will probably disband.—Springfield Republican.

Improving Edison's Phonograph.

Gianni Bettina, formerly a lieutenant of the Italian army, has invented a new phonograph which he claims is superior to that of Edison. Indeed, the new Bettina machine reflects the human voice with surprising clearness and perfect sonority, and with such force of sound that it can be plainly heard by all the bystanders without need of placing the trumpet to the ear. As in the apparatus of the phonograph and the graphophone of Edison, the modulations of the voice are noted on the dial by the sonorous disk by means of needle points, with the difference that a quantity of needle points, arranged to form rays, gather the oscillations from various points of the sonorous disk to a common center, whence to transmit them together to the cylinder.

By this means are attained a fullness of sound, a clearness and a precision until now obtained neither by the graphophone nor the phonograph. Bettina maintains that by means of this apparatus he can render 60 per cent. of the body of sound communicated to it. At the distance of one hundred feet it can be heard clearly and distinctly. Bettina has invented a composition much more sensitive to the inflections of the voice, to be substituted for that of the wax cylinder.—New York Telegram.

Talmage on Church Choirs.

My chief objection to church choir singing is that I am a firm believer in a congregation doing the singing. To me a singing church is always a triumphant church. If a congregation is silent during the exercise, or partially silent, it is the silence of death. If when the hymn is given out you hear the faint hum of here and there a father and mother in Israel, while the vast majority are silent, that minister of Christ who is presiding needs to have a very strong constitution if he does not get the chills. He needs not only the grace of God, but nerves like whalebones. It is a constant source of amazement to me how some people with voice enough to discharge all their duties in the world, when they come into the house of God have no voice to discharge their duty of singing. I really believe that if all our churches would rise up and sing as they ought to sing, that where we have a hundred souls brought into the kingdom of Christ there would be a thousand.—T. De Witt Talmage in Ladies' Home Journal.

Sad Sport.

A gentleman stood in front of a furrier's store contemplating the seal garments that filled the windows. "I never see a sealskin coat," he said, "that I am not reminded of a day I passed among the seal killers." Then he told of joining an expedition when he was a young man, and going out for the sport of seal killing. The seals were so tame, affectionate and fearless that when the hunters landed they crowded round them like dogs, making their little friendly bark, and fawning upon the murderous hands that proceeded to stretch them as bloody corpses upon the beach. The man related how sick at heart he got, and how he tried to get away from the massacre of the innocents. To this day the sight of a sealskin coat recalls the wretched sensation he then experienced. This reminds us of Gilbert White, of Selborne, when he first shot a lapwing, and the remorse he felt when the bird dipped its bill in its mortal wound and looked up into his face.—New Haven News.

A Long Way Round.

A curious and unsatisfactory state of things has been brought about by recent changes in the mail service in the northern part of Somerset county, Me. As the service is now arranged, any person at the Forks wishing to send a letter to Jackman or Moose river, 12 or 15 miles away, must have it carried 40 miles by stage and 200 miles by rail, so that it traverses four counties in its roundabout journey.—Philadelphia Ledger.

A sparrow at Colestown, Pa., built a nest in the running gear of a farmer's wagon, and makes a trip to market every week.

Spring Song.

The swift is wheeling and gleaming,
The brook is brown in its bed,
Rain from the cloud is streaming;
And the bow bends overhead,
The charm of the winter is broken!
The last of the spell is said!

The eel in the pond is quickening,
The grayling leaps in the stream;
What if the clouds are thickening?
See how the meadows gleam!
The spell of the winter is shaken!
The world awakes from a dream!

The fir puts out green fingers,
The pear tree softly blows,
The rose in her dark bower lingers,
But her curtains will soon unclose;
The lilac will shake her ringlets
Over the blush of the rose.

The swift is wheeling and gleaming,
The woods are beginning to ring,
Rain from the cloud is streaming;
There, where the bow doth cling,
Summer is smiling afar off,
Over the shoulder of spring!

—Robert Buchanan.

Some Londoners Are Sensitive.

Some of the London newspapers have been inconsiderate enough to harrow the feelings of polite society by publishing the tale of an East End tragedy whereby a dock laborer died of starvation. Mark Valle was the victim's name, and his neighbors report him to be a temperate, steady man, who made every effort to obtain sufficient work to support his family, consisting of a wife and five small children. He had a little money due him on Thursday, and dropped dead at the paymaster's feet as he received it. The doctor who made the post mortem said death was due to starvation, and the man's stomach was entirely empty. The eldest boy told the coroner that their father had eaten nothing since the previous Saturday, though the children had had a little stew twice since then. Their father ate nothing in order that there should be more for his little ones.

The West End was quite shocked when The Pall Mall Gazette published this story, and more than one good citizen stopped the paper in order that his wife and children might not be annoyed by the perusal of such vulgar atrocities.—Cor. New York Sun.

Recent Developments of Yale Culture.

A novel fad has recently taken possession of the Yale juniors, and is causing much amusement about the college. Every afternoon and evening the members of the three upper classes gather round their respective portions of the new fence in front of Durfee and as a new man strolls up to join a group of classmates he is suddenly pounced upon, his vest is unbuttoned, and in spite of his struggles the tab on the bottom of his shirt bosom is cut off. This trophy is then tacked up on an elm, where are some fifty or more similar ones. The custom is peculiarly a junior one, and the members of the other classes look on and cheer while the struggle is in progress. As many of the tabs so taken have the owner's initials embroidered upon them they are easily recognized as they hang upon the elm, and among them can be seen the tabs once belonging to the best known men in the class.—New York Sun.

An Acoustic Tale.

A special to The New York World from Helena, Ark., dated April 24, says: John R. McGuire, of Modoc Landing, says that during the high water he has been compelled to fell trees in order that his cows might sustain life by browsing on the green leaves. The animals were always hungry and he had great trouble in driving them away to keep the oaks from falling on them. Two days ago there was a thunder storm and before it began to rain there was a clap of thunder that sounded exactly like a tree falling. Mr. McGuire's entire herd of cows rushed frantically towards the spot where it seemed the tree had fallen. Another and another clap followed in rapid succession and all of the cattle put to the hill country, where they supposed trees were being cut down. Not one of them has been seen since.

Cotton Over Twenty-five Years of Age.

A sample of cotton with a history has just been exhibited in Nashville, Tenn. It came from a bale raised near West Point, Miss., in 1863. The man who raised the cotton was offered forty-two cents per pound for it in 1864, but refused to take it. He has since been holding for a rise that never came, and on March 19 last he sold it for ten cents per pound. Estimating the bale to weigh 500 pounds, and counting simple interest on the money at 6 per cent., the planter lost $487.60 by not disposing of it twenty-six years ago. The cotton is perfectly sound, and as good as when taken from the field.—Exchange.

An Unfortunate Man.

Luther Waring, of Plainfield, N. J., has had a particularly unfortunate career. Some time ago he lost an eye from a gunshot wound; later he was compelled to undergo a severe surgical operation. The other day he caught a trouser leg in the spokes of his bicycle and was hurled headlong to the pavement, striking on the back of his head. He was senseless several hours and is in a critical condition.—Philadelphia Ledger.

The Louvre is about to become the possessor of Millet's "Glaneuses," which has been bequeathed to it by Mme. Pommery, who died recently at Rheims. The "Glaneuses" was painted two years before the "Angelus," and was first exhibited at the Salon of 1857. It is a much more important work than the more widely known canvas, and is by many connoisseurs considered to be greatly superior to it.

The bashaw of Tangier, the same who jeered at our war ship Enterprise, has become so corpulent that he is unable to walk abroad. He is only 5 feet 2 inches in height and must be about the same in breadth, as he weighs over 400 pounds. He has been advised by his thirty-two physicians to fast for a month.

A recent patent applies to a machine for dusting poisonous powders on growing plants, such as cotton or potatoes, to rid them of insects.

THE PICTURE—THE ENGAGEMENT.

On a seat in the arbor the maiden was resting;
Her hat and her gloves by her side she had laid,
The soft summer zephyr her fair cheek caressing
Would toss from her brow her bright hair while it played.

Around her in chorus, earth's troubles unheeding,
The birds sang the freedom and gladness they felt;
While humbly before her so earnestly pleading
Her lover in sadness now ardently knelt.

His questioning eyes her half turned face were searching,
His answer to read in her sad, perplexed look;
A circlet of gold he upheld the while urging,
And into his own her shy fingers he took.

The rest you must guess, for I know not the sequel—
If Juno was with him when coming to woo;
Or if sadly the fates were against him I know not:
'Tis only a picture I'm painting for you.

—Chicago Herald.

Hon. Caleb Cushing's Timidity.

Hon. Caleb Cushing, who, with the exception of the Hon. Rufus Choate (par nobile fratrum), was the best man to sit and listen to I have ever been acquainted with, was substantially dumb in the society of women. He either did not not know how to talk to them, or he could not, and he could scarcely look in the face of one without blushing. He could not look them fairly in the eyes, in fact, nor could he men either, for that matter. There seemed to be an unaccountable timidity and shrinking about him, as there was even about Choate himself, great man as he was.

Mr. Cushing once, at an evening party in Newburyport, attempting to make himself agreeable, it is to be presumed, said to a pretty, bright eyed girl of 17 or 18 summers, and quite distinguished for her beauty and accomplishments in the circle of her young admirers: "Pray, Miss ——, can you tell me how love begins?" And she instantly replied with a merry twinkle and a smile: "With L, of course," thus discomfiting the distinguished scholar and statesman, and getting the laugh of the bystanders upon him.—Boston Journal.

A Gorgeous Head.

An entirely new style of hair dressing is threatened. In Paris the frizzy bang has meekly subsided to give the Javonaise headdresses a chance. Fashion appears to have gone daft on those peculiar ornaments, and the great jewelers of the Rue de la Paix have been ordered to reset the diamonds of more than one grand dame after the pattern of those flat metal ornaments. At the opera a few weeks ago a dazzling light in Parisian society appeared with her hair dressed perfectly flat to her head, on one side, right above the ear, an ornament as large and as flat as an individual butter plate, composed of diamonds and pearls, and medallions as large as an English penny, of the same gems, going round to the other ear, across the forehead just at the line of the hair. How those jewels were kept in place was a secret known only to madame's coiffeur and jeweler, but it was "Javonaise," and, therefore, a beautiful and distinguished innovation on the diamond star and butterfly ornamentations. Such is one of the results of the Paris exhibition, where the fashions of Java dancers were first introduced to western imitators.

Tarnished Gold on Fair Throats.

Since gold bead necklaces have again come into style dealers have been placed frequently in a very delicate position when some lady has come in to complain that the necklace sold her was of inferior quality, as it crocked or blackened on her neck. Recent investigation and the experience of prominent storekeepers has disclosed the fact that this is due entirely to the contact of the beads with a neck upon which face powder has been used. The smallest amount of powder, if the necklace be continually worn, is sufficient to cause this. To prove this let some jeweler make a jewel of purest gold, and write with it on a skin over which powder or fine dust has been strewn, and the result will be a distinct mark. It is a delicate thing to tell a lady that her fair neck is powdered, but the jeweler must either do this or admit the inferiority of his goods.—Exchange.

No Food for Nine Years.

There is at Bourdeilles, in the Dordogne, a woman named Bouriou who is said to have eaten nothing for nine years. The truth of this story is now being put to the test by a strict watch over the fasting woman, who has been under observation for the last fortnight. She is rather thin, but is described as being in no way emaciated.—Cor. London Standard.

Plume de soie is the name of a new trimming which will be much in vogue for diaphanous summer gowns, and is made of double bands of crepe, in any of the light shades, gathered and puffed up. This trimming is extremely appropriate on bodices, making a soft, becoming finish at throat and wrists, and is also used as a border for draperies.

Gaiters of finest, thinnest black cloth or of color to match the gown are much worn, as they are cooler and softer than boots. They are very carefully fitted, lined with satin and worn over hose of the same shade, which will be all in open work designs as soon as the weather becomes warmer.

TURKISH PUNISHMENT.

The Bastinado Abolished by the Present Ruler of the Faithful.

In Turkey twenty years ago men were hanged for trifles; tradesmen who sold short weight might be nailed by the ear to their own door-posts, and petty thieves, as well as men who were impertinent to officials or who refused to pay their taxes twice over, were bastinadoed on the soles of the feet. This last punishment, by the way, was light or cruel according as the patient was accustomed to go barefooted or to spend his life in debauches. The water carriers, porters, street fruit sellers and peasants generally, whose soles were like horn, cared little for twenty-five cuts with a bamboo; but to tradesmen, clerks and women the stripes were excruciatingly painful and brought weeks of lameness.

The present Sultan has abolished the bastinado in the European part of his dominions, and practically done away with capital punishment, except for brigandage and attempts of assassinating high officials. Even brigands, however, are only hanged when they have laid hands on foreigners and caused an outcry in the European press. Genuine Turks seldom find their way into jail, saving for murder or inability to pay taxes, and the murders are often committed under the influence of religious fanaticism, when the Mussulman, driven mad by the feast of the Ramadan or by the rejoicings of the Bairam holidays, runs amuck with a knife among a crowd of Giaours. Such offenders, however, are always leniently dealt with by the Pashas, unless, of course, they happen to kill a foreign Christian, having an Ambassador to avenge him.

In Turkish prisons the Mussulmans and Christians are kept apart, and the former, a grave and gentlemanlike-looking set of men, bask in the sun most of the day, smoking, and they perform frequent ablutions at the trickling fountain in the middle of their airing yard. They give no trouble, and wait with the utmost patience until it shall please Allah to open the prison doors for them. The Christians, a herd of Greeks, Bulgarians and Macedonians, with the most villainous faces, morals and manners imaginable, have to be ruled with a tight hand to be kept from strangling one another. When it becomes necessary to hang one of these gentry, the Greek goes to his punishment struggling and howling; the Turk makes no more ado about the matter than if he were going to have his head shaved. As the Turkish exchequer provides no hangman or ropes for executions, some curious things occasionally happen. Not long ago a Turk, who had to be hanged at Kirdjoli, walked about the town for an hour with two soldiers who had been ordered to execute him. These soldiers did not mean to buy a rope with their own money, and they failed to borrow one. Eventually they broke into a stable, stole a rope, and hanged their man from a nail over the door.—Temple Bar.

THE POODLE'S ESCAPE.

He Begged for His Life and Found a Sympathizing Audience.

A touching story comes from Paris. In a certain famous school of medicine the professor was about to illustrate the effects of a particular mineral poison. He placed a little white poodle upon the table, and then, fondling it caressingly, he explained to his audience in a few simple words the exact nature of the operations, and the symptoms of the instructive agony they were to witness.

Then, fastening the dog down into the torture trough, with the fine firm touch of the practiced vivisector, he skillfully laid open one of the veins of the neck. With a cry of pain the animal writhed for a moment helplessly under the calm hand of the professor, when suddenly by some misfortune one of the fastenings gave way, and then with a bound the poodle was free, and stood bleeding on the other end of the operating table.

The vivisector put down the phial containing the poison he was about to inject into the wound, and was stepping round to catch the poodle when the little animal stretched itself out flat upon the table, and began to crawl slowly towards him.

The whole attitude was expressive of penitence and submission, as though the creature were begging not to be punished any more. In another moment the dog would have been captured and put back properly into the torture trough, when it stood erect and turned head over heels.

The vivisector had before him a performing poodle, and the animal was saying as plainly as though it were in words, "See, you mustn't punish me any more, I will perform well." The antics over, the poodle resumed its attitude of submission, and crawling up to the professor began to lick his hands.

To him the incident was nothing—only a little delay in an interesting experiment, but before it could be resumed the students were on their feet, angrily telling the vivisector to put up his knife, declaring the poodle had earned its life.

The professor shrugged his shoulders at such a primitive display of emotion, but the students had their way.—Christian at Work.

—The bones of some prehistoric giants have been unearthed near Anniston, Ala. One of the thigh bones was sixty-two inches long, and the skulls averaged thirty-four inches in circumference.

—It appears that there are forty-seven bridges of upwards of 400 feet span in the world. The United States has by far the largest proportion of these, or twenty-nine in all. Of the total, nine are cantilever bridges, seven arch bridges, four stiffened suspension bridges, nineteen are truss bridges, two tubular girder bridges, and six drawbridges.

Red Heeled Shoes for Men.

French mashers have taken to wearing red heeled shoes. Under Louis XIV gentlemen wore large boots; the outside sole was in wood to protect against humidity. In the middle of the Seventeenth century the boots were replaced by shoes, with bows of ribbon and lace. The heels were three inches high and painted red. Ladies wore the high heeled shoe, and thought to add three or four inches to their stature. The shoe was in silk, embroidered satin or brocade. Under Louis XVI white stockings were in vogue. These necessitated white satin shoes.

The red heeled shoes that made their appearance under Louis XIV continued to be worn, but not so high, under Louis XV, so that about 1735 red heeled shoes were considered to be the mark of a gentleman. But while the lords lowered the heels of their shoes the ladies augmented theirs, so much so as to make them "ten inches high." It was under Louis XVI that the gold and silver buckle, ornamented with diamonds, replaced the ribbon bow. The Sans Culottes wore no stockings and patronized only wooden shoes. For a short time under the directory the sandal as worn by Roman ladies was the mode. Bands sustained the sole while showing off the foot, and on every toe was displayed a diamond.—Paris Cor. Pittsburg Press.

One Legged Newsboys Fight.

Among the hundreds of newsboys in New York city there are six with only one leg apiece. It would naturally be supposed that these maimed little fellows would be meek and inoffensive. On the contrary, they are among the most truculent and vicious of street Arabs. Each one of the boys carries a crutch, and in case of a quarrel the crutch is wielded with skill and vigor. Fights are frequent among the boys, and the maimed ones receive and expect no favors. A duel occurred the other day near the Franklin statue in which the weapons were crutches and the contestants had two legs between them.

One was known by the nickname of Timpsey, and the other bore uncomplainingly the title of Crutchy. They were equally matched as to size. The crutches were used both as bludgeons and rapiers. A sounding whack on the skull knocked Timpsey to his knees. While in that position he retaliated by shoving the end of his weapon forcibly into Crutchy's stomach, which evidently interfered with his digestive apparatus, for he dropped his crutch, placed both hands over his ragged vest and began to cry. Between sobs he blurted out:

"Dat ain't fair, Timps! I wouldn't try to make no hole in your dinner!"—New York Journal.

A Learned Woman.

Donna Ersilia was married to Count Lovatelli, of Ravenna, a marriage whose happiness was broken some thirteen years ago by the early death of her husband. Several sons and two charming daughters were the fruit of this marriage.

Intercourse with the great scholars who sought the Caetani palace resulted in setting her eagerly at work at the science of archaeology. The princess is as familiar with Latin and Greek literature as are our cultured academic philologists.

A series of archaelogical essays earned her admission into the Royal Academy of Science. She is also one of the Society of Friends of Early Christian Art, founded by Rossi and Bruzza. But above all, her house has become the rallying point for the archaelogical world of Rome—I might say of Europe. Donna Ersilia has withdrawn entirely from the time taking and frivolous pleasures of high life. She has made her salon a rendezvous for those whom study has attracted to Rome. There the greatest scholars may be found discussing the rendering of an old text or the interpretation of a word on an antique sarcophagus. In knowledge of these things the beautiful and majestic lady of the house is equal to her guests.—F. X. Kraus in Chautauquan.

Queen Victoria's Surname.

Henry M. Merridew, Southbroom, Devizes, writes: "At a dinner at which some distinguished notables were present the conversation lapsed as to the correct surname of the royal family. The question was put to a celebrated historian who happened to be present, who replied: 'Guelph, of course.' It was pointed out that although the royal family are Guelphs by descent, Her Majesty's marriage with Prince Albert must have the effect which the marriage of a lady has in all other cases, and that the surname of the present house must be the Prince Consort's. 'But what is the surname of the Prince Consort's family?' Simple, but staggering. No one knew. All guessed and all were wrong. It transpired, however, that the correct name was 'Wettin.' Of course, no one had heard of it before, and all smiled at the idea of the Guelphs being reduced to 'Wettin!' The point was referred to Theodore Martin. 'You are quite right,' said the biographer of the Prince Consort. 'Wettin is the family name of the house of Saxony to whom the dominion of Saxony came in the year 1420.'"

An Unkind Cut.

"I hear that you are engaged, Mamie?"

"It is true."

"Then mother was right."

"What about?"

"She said you would be engaged before leap year was over."—Boston Courier.

To Keep Machinery from Rusting.

In order to keep machinery from rusting take one ounce of camphor, dissolving it in a pound of melted lard; take off the scum and mix as much fine black lead as will give it iron color. Clean the machinery and smear it with this mixture. After twenty-four hours rub clean with soft linen cloth. It will keep clean for months under ordinary circumstances.—Philadelphia Record.

ANECDOTE OF HANNIBAL HAMLIN.

How a Vice President of the United States Served as a Private Soldier.

"Did you ever know," asked a gentleman at the Union League club banquet, "that Hannibal Hamlin once served this government in a dual capacity, holding a position near the top of the ladder and another near the bottom at one and the same time?"

The reporter admitted that he had never heard of the incident.

"Well, he did," said the club man. "While he was vice president of the United States he served for a time as a private in the volunteer army. Queer idea, wasn't it? I'll tell you how it happened.

"You see he was an honorary member of a little company of militia in Bangor, Me., and when Lincoln issued his call for troops it promptly responded and came to Washington. There it was ordered to the navy yard to do guard duty, and to the surprise of every one Mr. Hamlin announced his intention to go with it. The officers rather rebelled at the idea of having a vice president under them, but Mr. Hamlin was determined.

"'Why not?' he asked. 'If I'm a good enough man to be an honorary member of the company I guess I'm good enough to be a private.'

"And he shouldered a gun and went with them. Well, at the navy yard there were, of course, more complications. The officers decided that it would not do to put the distinguished private on guard duty, but he objected again, and pertinently inquired:

"'What am I here for—to look pretty?'

"And the result was that he marched up and down as a sentinel in his regular turn. Odd, wasn't it? Imagine the vice president of the United States receiving orders from a sergeant of a militia company.

"Then when the company was mustered out he was offered the regular pay of a private for the time he was at the navy yard, but he declined to accept it.

"'Why?' he was asked. 'You served with the rest of us.'

"'Well,' he said, 'I don't think it's right for a man to draw pay twice from the government, and, taking all things into consideration, I believe I'd rather draw the vice president's salary.'"—Chicago Tribune.

Toads and Snakes.

Toads in the presence of snakes usually remain perfectly still; in this is their only safety, for did they make the least movement they would immediately be caught. I have known a hungry snake lie in waiting over an hour for a frog to move, and even push with the nose to stir him up. This has been called "snake charming," and indeed it looks like it, but the toad is the charmer, the snake the charmee.

I remember one day I dropped a toad in the midst of a pit of snakes I had in my back yard. He at once became perfectly still, though surrounded by more than a dozen hungry snakes. There was a circle of fierce heads and glaring eyes around him, but he would not move. The circle narrowed, until the protruding tongues almost touched him, yet he was immovable. Just then I was called away for over half an hour, but on returning found the toad, in grave dignity, still holding the fort by most masterly inactivity.

The senses of seeing, hearing and smelling are very defective in garters; they can see but a few yards at most, and even at short distances of but a few inches they are often at fault.

A snake was seen pursuing a frog in a saw mill yard. The sawdust and open space were greatly in favor of the snake and against the frog. The frog made long jumps and the snake made a direct line to the spot where he alighted, but before reaching it the frog had again jumped in another direction, and so the hunt went on for about half a minute; the snake quite unable to trace the frog in his aerial progress, was directed only by the disturbance made in alighting.

At last the frog, more by accident than design, alighted on the flat surface of a rough board, which stood leaning against a pile of lumber at an angle of about 80 degs., and sat perfectly still, about ten inches from the ground. The snake was quite puzzled; he looked, listened, sniffed and poked about for several minutes, passing close to the end of the board several times, but the hunt was an utter failure, and he slunk away toward the brushwood, a very mad and disgusted specimen.—Forest and Stream.

LIGHT AND AIRY.

Volapuk.

Take a teaspoonful of English,
A modicum of Dutch,
Of Italian just a trifle,
And of Gaelic not too much;
Some Russian and Egyptian
Add then unto the whole,
With just enough to flavor,
Of the lingo of the Pole,
Some Cingalese and Hottentot,
A soupcon, too, of French,
Of native Scandinavian
A pretty thorough drench:
Hungarian and Syriac,
A pinch of Japanese,
With just as much Ojibbeway
And Turkish as you please.
Now stir it gently, boil it well,
And if you've decent luck,
The ultimate residuum
You'll find is Volapuk!

Cautionary Signals.

Everybody is superstitious to a greater or less extent. Every man has a superstition of some sort, though they will not own it. One of the most common of the petty superstitions is involved in the answering of invitations. Some men do not hesitate to write positively that they will be there, but the great majority modify this by saying, "God willing," or "if nothing happens," or something of the sort. These men firmly believe in the old saying that "Man proposes and God disposes," and they are taking no chances. Those who have occasion to receive responses to invitations will notice that these "cautionary signals" prevail.—Chicago Herald.

Religious Services.

Reverend H. J. Winter will preach at Lone Pine at 11 a. m; Georges Creek 2:30 Independence at 7:00 o'clock in evening. Sunday School at Independence and Lone Pine at 11 o'clock a. m.

Mr. N. T. Piper of Oasis came to Independence on Wednesday.

E. Robinson is shipping a good many dressed hogs to Candelaria, Lone Pine and Keeler.

George Thorpe and Isaac Wilmot came in from Sylvania last Tuesday. The force has been a good deal decreased at that camp.

Mrs. George Collins went north last Tuesday to join her husband at Candelaria. Mr. Coolbs is doing a good butcher business at Candelaria.

A new roof is being put upon the M. E. parsonage. Mr. H. P. Carter and Mr. D. Cotter very kindly did a good part of the work as a gift.

From the Mollock mines the supply of ore continues undiminished. On Monday Mr. Eutzgerald succeeded in getting another team on the road hauling to Keeler.

Mr. A. M. Given of Bishop was at Independence several days this week. His firm bought the fruit crop of J. W. Symmes the present season and has rented the orchard for three years.

There is good reason to believe that Mr. Lusky will rebuild a bisiness house at Lone Pine. The building will likely be much larger than the one destroyed by fire some months ago.

Jack Curran and his partner have got out a large lot of ore at Panamint and will work it at the mill there. Jack has stuck to Panamint a long time and his faith in the camp is as strong as ever.

Bertrand Raine came back to Independence last Wednesday after a long absence in the lower country. Bert will be glad to see all his former customers at the store and if anybody can sell goods he can.

Miss Lee of Fort Churchill, Nevada, returned here on Wednesday. After a stay of several months here she had gone home a few weeks ago but was forced to return on account of impaired health.

A number of the friends of Mr. D. C. Grunow were invited to a farewell supper at Barnes' hotel at Keeler on Monday evening. After supper the dining room was cleared and a dance was begun. The entertainment continued till after midnight.

Four or five car loads of ore are sent down from Cerro Gordo every week. The Dauphy—O'Keefe mine yields most of this. Good reports come from the Union mine and the expectation is strong of striking a large ore body speedily.

The total area of the State is generally given as 100,218,560 acres; but the last report of the General Land Office stated that the State contained 72,027,613 acres of surveyed, and 25,900,027 acres of unsurveyed land, making in all 100,992,640 acres.

Mr. D. C. Grunow who has been in charge of the United States Signal Station at Keeler a little over four years, has been relieved and ordered to take charge of the station at Carson. Mr. A. T. Wilkinson, who has been in charge at Carson, arrived at Keeler on Monday and is now on duty there. He is accompanied by his wife and two children.

At each trip from the Defiance mine at Darwin J. V. Skinner brings in ten tons of ore. The mine is looking very well and improving as more opening is made. The new water works is nearly completed. Water is now run to the tanks in town. Mr. Reddy is still at the mine pushing on the work of development and getting the water works finished.

It is announced that a railroad is about to be built from Denver to Salt Lake City. This road will be 286 miles shorter than the Denver and Rio Grande route. The new route is designed to reach the Pacific and will, most likely, take a southern direction from Salt Lake as that is by far the shortest way of reaching the ocean, the grades are easier and the heavy snow belt being avoided.

Mr. J. H. Bulpit is erecting a building that will be the best improvement of the kind yet made in Bishop. The walls are two feet thick and the material is stone that has been tried by fire and proved almost equal to fire brick in standing heat. Mr. Bulpit says the first cost of the structure will not be greater than a wooden building would cost. Doubtless other buildings of the same kind will be erected at Bishop. The stone is found near the town and the supply is inexhaustible.

Where the new survey is being made for the proposed canal to Salt Well Valley, the canal would not irrigate more than a small fraction of land in Owens Valley. This would cause very serious complications in connection with the large area of land yet remaining unirrigated in Owens Valley. The surveyors say, that to run the canal on the new line a cut of thirty-nine feet in depth would have to be made through the divide south of Olancha. It may prove that it would be cheaper to make the canal on the original Seely survey, as this gives more fall and would leave at least five feet to spare in crossing the divide. This question will be fully investigated before work should be begun. The Surveyors will this week strike the river close to Independence bridge, and this will finish this part of the work.

Figure It Out.

The Great Register contains 1087 names. This is an increase of 152 over the list of two years ago. During the past two years there has been a loss of about thirty Republican votes by deaths and removals. It is estimated that of the increase of 152 there will be a Republican majority of 25. This would be a net loss of five votes from the majority of two years ago. Copies of the Great Register have been sent to all the precincts in the county and all parties interested have a chance to do some figuring.

A Grand Monument

A Spanish architect, Alberto M. Palacio, offers a grand design for a monument to Columbus. It is proposed to erect a monument at Chicago as part of the great exposition of 1892. A base of iron work is to be built 262 feet high. On top of this is a sphere of nearly one thousand feet diameter. On top of the sphere is a model of the vessel on which Columbus sailed. The total height of the structure is 1312 feet. A platform more than half a mile long will go around the sphere at the equator. At night the sphere will be illuminated with lines of light forming the outlines of the continents and islands of the world. The Scientific American says the pyramids of Egypt, the sphinx and the Colossus could lie in the hollow interior like jewels in this case. In the base under the great rotunda will be placed a gigantic statue of the great discoverer surrounded by the navigators and missionaries who made his discovery fruitful. In the remaining spaces of the compartments in the base a large Columbus library will be distributed; auditorium for the cultivation of the natural sciences, museums of zoology, mineralogy and botany of America, rooms for the Spanish Geographical Society, a great naval museum in the interior central compartment, a meteorological observatory in the hull of the caravel. All this is independent of the promenades, cafes, and restaurants for the public. In the interior the celestial sphere can be exactly reproduced. It can also be used for magnificent panoramas, because the spherical form is the best for obtaining illusions of perspective. There will be a place for public entertainments. This astonishing monument can serve as a perennial remembrance of the first Spanish-American and Colonial exposition. The total cost of the structure including machinery, will be $6,290,200. If this design should be carried out the result will far exceed everything of the kind that ever existed upon the earth.

Voters of Inyo County.

The undersigned respectfully asks the attention of the voters of the county to the following: As is well known, at the Republican County Convention I was nominated for the office of District Attorney. The nomination was made without the slightest effort on my part to secure it. It has long been a part of my political creed that the office should seek the man. Since the Convention I have not made personal solicitation for votes nor shall I do so. If you, the voters, think proper to elect me, it will be my steady purpose to discharge all the duties of the office with zeal and fidelity and do all that should be done by an officer in that position. Every voter may with full assurance believe that nothing would deter me from the discharge of any duty pertaining to the office.

Respectfully,
C. MUTH-RASMUSSEN.

Opinion of An Expert.

Mr. H. J. McLerie, the gentleman who recently came from San Francisco to examine the marble quarry in the interest of D. O. Mills, appears to have been entirely satisfied with what he saw. To the hearing of the Editor of this paper, he said that in his judgment the quarry will supply the finest building material in the world. The presence of even a small proportion of iron in building stone is very objectionable as the iron rusts and ruins the appearance of polished surfaces by its ugly blotches. The Inyo marble is free from iron and will never be injured that way. Mr. McLerie said the quantity, quality and variety of marble that can be supplied from the Inyo quarry exceeds by far what he had ever expected to see.

For Sale.

The ranch known as the "Rittgers place" near Lone Pine is offered for sale together with the the farming implements and stock. The ranch contains 320 acres of excellent land. The stock consists of thirty head of cattle and twelve brood mares. There is now sixty tons of hay on the place and feed enough to winter 200 head of stock. The winter pasture has been rented five years past at $300 a year. The soil is a rich loam and excellently adapted to vegetable raising. There is plenty of outside range, making it a good stock ranch. For further particulars address

JAMES JENKINS.
Lone Pine, Inyo County, Cal.

A Card.

Reports having been circulated that if elected Road Overseer the undersigned would not give personal attention to the work of the office. I hereby assure the voters of Independence Road District that if elected to said office I will faithfully and personally attend to the care and improvement of the roads of said District and discharge every duty of the office to the best of my ability.

Respectfully,
JOHN KEEGAN.

Entertainment.

This evening a social entertainment will be given at the Masonic Hall. It is for a very worthy purpose, is managed chiefly by the young ladies, a good entertainment is prepared and pleasure will reward all who go. A good supper will be served, and admission to the whole will cost but half a dollar, children a quarter.

New Livery Stable.

Mr. A. C. Harvey has opened a livery stable at Lone Pine, in the building opposite Stewart's hotel. Mr. Harvey will give careful attention to the business and treat all customers well.

Bar silver is quoted at 104. Soon after the passage of the silver bill the metal was quoted at 121½ and it was expected that it would go to 129½. It is evident that silver is yet but a commodity and subject to speculation and fluctuation in price like any other product. It is a great wrong that a metal used as coin should be subject to the tricks and schemes of speculators, making its value uncertain and inflicting loss upon those who are least able to bear it. What is needed is a free coinage law and agitation should never cease till this is granted. The silver bill has already been of very great benefit to the whole country and shows how much better a free coinage law would be.

Consolation.

A lady dressed in deep mourning and having a look of Bostonian refinement and reserve, got on a Chicago train bound for Denver one day last week. Away out in Kansas, near Deadwood creek, there boarded the train a native of the soil in the shape of a woman in a green delaine dress, a blue and red shawl and a yellow nubia. She dropped easily and gracefully into the seat in front of the lady in black, turned round, stared hard for a moment and then said:

"Widder?" "I—I—did you speak to me?" asked the lady in surprise.

"Yes'm—widder?" "Yes."

"Thought so. Quite recent, eh?" "Yes."

"What ailed him?" "Consumption."

"Linger a good while?" "I—I—yes."

"Much ag'ny?" "Yes, indeed."

"Coughed a sight, hey?" "Oh, yes; but I?"—

"I know what'd cure him in less'n a month. Never knowed it to fail, an' I've seed it tried in cases where they'd been give up by five doctors. Yes'm. But it ain't no use talkin' 'bout that now. Any children?"

"Yes, three."

"His folks got 'em?"

"No; but really, I?"—

"Two boys an' a girl, or two girls an' a boy?"

"Two girls."

"Oh! D'd you get your thirds out an' out?"

"Really, madam, I?"—

"Or did he leave a will?"

"Excuse me, but?"—

"The law gives a woman her thirds, but t'ain't often she gits 'em out 'n' out. I think she'd ort to have half, don't you?"

"I—I—really, I don't know."

"Well, I do. Was you made gardeen of the children?"

"No—that is?"—

"Well, I bet I'd be gardeen of my own young uns if my man was to die. These gardeens git the prop'ty half the time. Did he have money in bank?"

"I beg your pardon, but?"—

"You ort to made him put it in your name. It makes it lots easier when the man dies to settle things up. His kin try to break the will?"

"Excuse me?"—

"A man cayn't die nowadays 'thout a pack o' his folks tryin' to break the will, no matter how many wives and children he has. You goin' to wear crape all the time or only a year?"

"Pardon me, but?"—

"It's becomin' to you, but kinder expensive for common wear. But dear me, you ain't more'n 36 or 37, are you?"

No reply.

"I don't know how you feel 'bout second marriages, but I?"—

"Oh, madam, please?"—

"You'll marry agin, now I'll bet you do. Oh, I know how you feel now. My sister Cindy felt and talked jist so, an' she married agin in six months, an' done well, too. I'd wait a year, if I was you. It looks better, shows respect and all that; but if I was young as you an' had only three children I'd?"—

But the lady in black had fled to the next car, and her consoler turned to the man on her right and said:

"Talk 'bout her not marryin' agin! I've an idee she's goin' west a-purpose to see if she kin do well there, and I don't blame her." —Detroit Free Press.

Don't read! Don't think! Don't believe! Now, are you better?

You women who think that patent medicines are a humbug, and Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription the biggest humbug of the whole (because it's best known of all)—does your lack-of-faith cure come?

It's very easy to "don't" in this world. Suspicion always comes more easily than confidence. THE DECLINE OF POKUMVILLE.

Pokumville stood on the hill,
One school-house and a store.
Enough to eat of corn an' wheat,
An' didn't want nothin' more.
We had enough of garden stuff,
An' sometimes sass an' pie,
An' Pokumville stood on the hill
An' let the worl' go by.

Pokumville stood on the hill,
Its boys an' girls were wed
An' settled down, an' tilled the groun'
As their forefathers led,
An' children grew, as children do,
Boys lived at home until
They took 'em wives, then all their lives
They lived in Pokumville.

We lived up there in pure air,
Upon the good ol' hill,
Till the railroad came with smoke and flame,
An' cut through Pokumville.
We caught the strice of the worl' outside,
Our young men heard its roar,
An' they left the hill of Pokumville,
An' we see our boys no more.

An' all the girls, with smiles an' curls,
Hev gone an' followed the boys;
The big worl's din there's magic in,
There's music in its noise;
They've felt the charm an' left the farm,
They won't come back again,
An' Pokumville upon the hill
Is a village of ol' men.

The engine shrill through Pokumville,
With its demon screech an' cry,
Has carried away our hope an' stay,
An' left us here to die.
But one thing will stay an' not go away,
One ol' man's tired bones,
Upon the hill in Pokumville,
Shall rest beneath the stones.

A JOLLY BRICK.

Dick's Death the Turning Point of Little Cove's Fortunes.

Business? Well, it hain't been what you'd call rushin', so's to speak. We'd got our plans all laid fur retirin', an' goin' on a trip to Urop; but I guess, 'cordin' the present outlook, we may hang 'round 'til next month. 'Hit's mostly luck, this kind of work. We has our ups an' downs, same as Jay Gould, an' the rest of the kind; an' jest now its down. Easy there! Shure, an' I'm givin' yer boots a shine so yer can use them to see the curl of your mustache in, all the way down the street. 'Fellers stay 'round in this kind o' business very long?' Sometimes they do, an' sometimes they don't. I hed one pard in the city for the matter o' three years, but he's gone now. Tain't 'xactly up to bein' alderman, you see. The wind an' sleet is bad for our seal-skin cloaks an' white kid gloves, so we has to leave 'em off. An' the same with our buttonhole bouquets. But—'What become of my chum?' Dick Corwin? Well, now, look a here, ain't you gittin' a little inquisitive? Who be yer, anyhow? A newspaper reporter? Yer needn't be tryin' that game here. Billy Smith was writ up in the paper once: 'A specimen of the New York bootblack;' an' never a cent did he get to pay fur the laugh we had on him. If you want somethin' to fill up, though, boss, an' is willin' to pay reg'lar fur the information, I'll put yer onto some stories that'll make yer eyes stick out. But they won't be about Dick Corwin. No, sir. Why, ther ain't a feller 'round that wouldn't knock another sky high if they tried to make money tellin' of him. 'Fond of him?' We-el, yes, we did have a pretty good likin' fur the chap. But—'you ain't a newspaper man?' Well, then, look a here, boss, as long as it's a rainy day, an' you give me your word fair an' square, you ken sit down an' listen, an' I'll tell yer all about him. Ready now? All right. I ain't jest used to tellin' stories. A leetle out o' practice 'c writin' editorials, so to speak. But I'll rattle it off as I think on't, an' you can fill up the chinks.

"Good lookin'? Naw! If you think yer goin' to hear 'bout one o' yer swell kind, why, then, you've got to the wrong place. Red hair an' turned-up nose an' squint eyes! But yer see our palaces where we sleep nights ain't hung with lookin'-glasses from top to bottom. We read in the Urop news that 'twas old style, an' so we pitched 'em out; an' it don't make much odds how a feller looks, since then. An' my!—I tell yer what, if you like a feller that can jest knock another into the middle of next week when he says a word against him, then you'd ort to seen Dick. Wrastle? Why, ther wa'n't one o' the boys could come anywhere near him. An' none o' them as much as dared to open their mouth 'gainst that little cove of a Jamie he was lookin' out fur. That was one o' Dick's queer streaks. If he'd ben a wrastler, or his brother, or sumthin', we'd stood it better. But Jamie—he was one o' them softy boys that never know nuthin' 'til it's knocked into 'em, an' no relation at all. Come to think of it, he was more like your swell kind, though. Kinder whinin' 'round an' alwers makin' a fuss if hit didn't happen he could wash his face ev'ry day. But, mister, if yer want to find some one to make a story out o' him, 'twon't be me. I never did take overmuch of a fancy to the little cove, an' ther ain't one o' the boys could bear the sight of him after—

"Well, they always worked together, them two. Jamie, he was one o' them wouldn't push out for himself (no sand, yer know), an' if he ever made out to sell a paper, 'twas hangin' onto Dick's elbow. His mammy was one o' them swell kind herself, Dick said, an' used to do sewin' 'til she dies all to once with the heart disease; so I s'pose 'twa'n't his luck to take to it as if he'd ben raised ther. But ther wa'n't no sort o' use makin' a gentleman of him, an' seein' he alwers had a comb for his hair, the way Dick did.

"But his lookin' out fur the little cove was the only queer streak Dick had, an' he was my pard off'n on fur three years. Fun? Well, now, yer shoutin'! The cops was after us more'n half the time for disturbance an' such. But we wa'n't no softies to be caught by them. The minute they was huntin' Dick an' me would start fur the dock; an' it didn't take long ter lose track of 'em. Run? We-el, you jest hold up yer bottom dollar on that. Why, mister, you never see such a runner as Dick was. An' he could jump equal to a circus-rider. That was what he was alwers layin' out to be. An' he'd hev gone, too, if it hadn't ben fur that bloomin' little cove. He said ther wouldn't be no place fur him without 'twas the clown's baby; an' he was a gentleman, an' wouldn't take to such work. But me an' Dick jest made things lively fur the teachers down ter the mission chapel, you'd better believe. They'd alwers light on him the first thing to answer some of their questions; an' he'd draw his face down sober, an' pretend he could'nt quite make out what they said; he'd alwers ben hard of hearin'. Jest turn the words 'round a little so the whole school would git to laughin', an' the teachers would holler till they was red in the face tryin' to make him understand. We took Jamie 'long with us once or twice; an' there was one of the teachers there—a reg'lar swell she was, with her silk dress, an' feathers on her hat—she said he had a face like a Rafer's angel, an' she wanted to paint him. But Dick, he said he'd promised his granny that boy shouldn't go out of his sight till she got back from her trip to Urop, an' if she took Jamie she'd hev to take him, too. An' she didn't say no more about it. But she was a swell, though! The countess, we used to call her; an' pretty near every day we'd see her drivin' through Broadway with a widder lady in crape an' a hoss that held up his nose as if he wanted to sniff the stars out of the sky. Lots of go that hoss had! He got scart at sumthin' one time an' come t'arin' down the street like all possessed, with she a hollerin' whoa, an' pullin' back on the reins, an' the next minute they'd gone whack into another team if it hadn't been for Dick. 'My eye!' he yelled to me, when he saw her comin', 'she do' know nothin' about a hoss. Jest wait till you see me stop him!' an' the next minnit he was in the road, grabbin' hold of the bridle; an' before he let go he'd brought that hoss down into a walk. Stopped him quick as that! But Dick w'an't none o' them softies to be babied fur what he'd done. 'My boy,' says the widder lady, a-takin' out her pocket-book, 'will you tell me what is your name? An' how could you be brave enough to stop our horse?'

"'We-el,' grinned Dick, 'yer see, ma'am, I couldn't help it. I was shet up in a lunatic 'sylum once jest fur stoppin' hosses. Whenever I see one goin' out of a walk sumthin' takes hold an' pushes me right in front of 'em, an' I've got to catch hold o' the bridle to save bein' run over. As fur pay, a quarter 'll about make up fur the damage done. Thankee, ma'am.' An' then he turned an' took off his hat to the countess as perlite as yer please. 'Good-afternoon, ma'am. May be you don't recognize me, but I'm of the opinion you're the lady I've noticed down to the mission school. I have a class there myself. Glad to see yer enterin' into the good work.' An' with that he tipped his hat again an' walked away as solemn as an owl.

"'The worst boy in my class,' says the countess, talkin' to the other woman. 'But did yer notice the little lad with him? His face reminds me so much of little Georgie's.'

"'Faith, Jamie,' grinned Dick, when he told him, 'they're takin' such a fancy to yer they'll be takin' yer ter live with them next. If 'twan't that the countess ain't any too fond of me.' An' after that, whenever he see her a-comin' he'd wink to me an' say: 'D'ye mind how I'm spilin' the bye's prospects with the countess?'

"If I'd ben standin' in his shoes I'd clared out fur a few days, an' see if she wouldn't got him off my hands. But Dick aiwers was the queerest fish. He liked that little cove 'round, an' treated him like a king, when he didn't rake in enough to pay fur tryin'. He wa'n't no chum o' mine. No, sir. Tell yer what it is, boss, when Billy Muran goes hunks with anybody it ain't with a milk-an'-water baby. Jamie couldn't see anybody look at him without a snivelin', an' he hadn't the sand of a cat. If he had 'twouldn't hev—well, I'm a-comin' to it.

"We'd ben havin' a reg'lar smash-up that Sunday down to the Plain. 'Twas too hot to go to Sunday-school, even to rattle the Countess, an' I s'pose our raisin' such rim made us tired, an' we slept a little harder than usual come night. Me an' Dick an' the little cove we had a room up in Old Marm Sally's attic (we'd been flush that week) an' was sleepin' there as swell as yer please. I guess 'twas the smoke that woke me. We'd ben havin' so many fires 'round them parts I'd got to feelin' sort o' shady of the smell. But the old shell was jest a-blazin', an' all the folks puttin' in their best licks a-hollerin' 'fire!' when I got to know any thing. 'Git up!' I yelled to Dick. 'Git up! Can't yer see the house is on fire?' An' in less'n a minute we was jest a-sailin' fur them rattley old stairs. They'd jest begun to kindle, an' the smoke was comin' up like a hurricane. 'Come along!' I yelled to Dick. 'We'll make 'm!' He was follerin' tight to my heels with the little cove hold of his hand, an' he grinned. 'Drive ahead,' says he. We got half way down all right, an' then—well, I s'pose 'twas the smoke an' the blaze scared Jamie. It kept comin' up thicker an' faster, an' first thing we knew he'd pulled away his hand. 'I'm not goin'!' he yelled, an' went tearin' back like all possessed an' as if the room was the safest place in the world, instead of where you was sure of bein' roasted. Dick stopped. 'I'm goin' back after him,' says he, turnin' white 'round the gills.

"'Yer bloomin' idiot!' yelled I, 'can't yer see yer won't git down these stairs if yer don't come now? The little fool's hid under the bed. Yer can't git him out.'

"He looked down to where them stairs was beginnin' to blaze, an' then grinned a little. He wa'n't no coward. 'Well, I'll try,' says he, 'an' if I don't, good-bye, Billy;' an' the next second he'd given one of his tarin' leaps right into the smoke.

"'Went down?' Me! 'Course I did. 'Twouldn't made it no easier fur him my stayin' there, or mebbe I would; but I ain't none o' the kind what throw up the sponge fur nothin'. I went out an' rushed up the road yellin' fire with the rest of 'em, an' most crazy 'till the ladders come, an' then I showed 'em the winder—the only place he could git out of, an' helped fix the ladder. A fireman was jest startin' up when I saw him a-standin' there by the winder with that same grin he alwers had when he'd done a good thing, an' fooled the cops out of a job. He stood there lookin' like a soldier, with the little fool a-cryin' an' screamin' in his arms. He'd wrapped him up in his coat, or sumthin', so he wouldn't git scorched, an' jest as he reached down an' handed him to the fireman he see me ther in the crowd, an' give his hat a wave—the way we'd 'greed on to let the other know if things was goin' all right with us. An' then there come a crash—the floor he was standin' on give way, an' that's the last I ever see of Dick.

"We-el, I do' know as—hold on, boss, what yer givin' us? I wa'n't snivellin'. I ain't one of them kind that goes 'round cryin' like a gal; but when you talk of bricks, he was a jolly one, an' no mistake. 'Jamie?' The Countess took him to live with her, same as Dick said she would. Said he made her think of her little boy that died. Naw. Ther wa'n't nothin' said about it in the papers. I was the only one knew what made him go back, an' I didn't blab. Dick wa'n't the kind that wanted any swell made over what he did. But I told the other fellers, an' we're gettin' him up a stone, with his name on an' the year. Ain't goin' to have no slouch of a thing fur a brick like he was. But it makes us stick to business pretty close, an' keep on a lookout fur the well-dressed coves we think— Shine, sir?" —Pauline Phelps, in Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper.

GEOLOGICAL MYSTERIES.

Supposed Origin of Some of the Precious Stones of Commerce.

Geology has been a revelation to mankind and has told us wonderful things of the past history of the earth. But geology has secrets of its own that are as hidden from comprehension as the atmosphere of the moon or the belts of Saturn. Certain things have been done, says the geologist, through volcanic action or the agency of fire, and that is as near as he can come to it. So that, after all, we see effects, but know little or nothing of the causes. There is a rock known as amygoaloid, one of the igneous rocks, which in some of the gigantic transformations of nature, we will say in cooling from a melted state, formed within itself cavities from the size of a marble or bead to that of the closed hand. Now, as nature abhors a vacuum, she set to work to fill these cavities, and in doing so she used other materials, and these combinations produced some of what we call the "precious stones of commerce." Exactly how this was done we can not tell, but we see some hint of the operation in every subterranean cave where stalactites and stalagmites are found. Every student knows that this is the result of dropping water which contains carbonate of lime. The water evaporating, leaves a minute particle of lime, which takes something to itself from the earth or atmosphere, and in the course of ages bodies are formed of a most remarkable character. In probably somewhat the same fashion have these cavities filled in the igneous rocks, and then come time and storms and other agencies, earthquakes, perhaps, and the rocks are rent apart, and out drops a bead or a bowlder, and a curious man picks it up and hammers and breaks it, and then he puts a polish on it by some process more or less advanced, and lo! he holds in his hand an agate or an onyx. Many of the stones used in the arts have no other origin and are deposits of silica, alumina, oxide of iron and other coloring substances. It is the color or arrangement of colors that gives the name, and thus we have agate, onyx, chalcedony, carnelian, sard, chrysoprase, sardonyx and others, all members of the quartz family and all having a family resemblance. The agate has veins of different shades of color in parallel lines. Sometimes these are very close together, as many as fifty to the inch, but this is unusual. When there are alternate bands of color and a transparent medium we have the onyx; but the latter may be obtained by cutting the stone in a different way. Agates are used chiefly for ornamental purposes, such as cups, seals, rings, handles for parasols, swords, table and mantel ornaments, but the material is so hard that it can only be worked by those who have practiced skill. The onyx was valued by the ancients for its application to cameos and intaglios—the first an object in relief, the latter a "cut in" process; and these objects are still made. Nature produces some very strange forms occasionally, and agates are found with exact resemblances of moss and other natural objects and figures, which are very curious and often very valuable.—American Analyst.

Toads as Insect Traps.

Not a single creeping, crawling or hopping thing is to be seen in our tomato hot bed of four sashes, except one toad, which in reality is nothing else than a wandering (hopping) insect trap, and gobbles up every hapless small creature that gets into it. Of course we make a pet of our living insecticide, and have almost learned to admire its handsome color and its intelligent eye. Sometimes we give it an especially dainty morsel, such as a large May beetle, or even a potato beetle, a centipede, etc. Our guest takes them all with equal gratitude and appetite. There can be no doubt that toads may be colonized and put to good use in cucumber, melon and squash patches. We intend to assign to them the duty and responsibility of keeping the vines free from bugs this year, and believe it will be safer to trust to their watchfulness than to depend on poisonous applications.—

HEADACHE AND DYSPEPSIA.

William E. Rockwell, No. 512 West 57th Street, New York, says:

"I have been a martyr to bilious headache and dyspepsia. Any indiscretion in diet, overfatigue, or cold, brings on a fit of indigestion, to be followed by a headache lasting two or three days at a time. I think I must have tried over twenty different remedies, which were recommended as certain cures by loving friends, but its was no use. At last I thought I would take a simple course of purgation with BRANDRETH'S PILLS. For the first week I took two pills every night, then one pill for thirty nights; in that time I gained three pounds in weight, and never have had an ache or a pain since."

Disease in one part of the body will eventually fill the whole body with disease. Every year or two some part of the system grows weak and begins to decay. Such part should be removed at once, and new matter be allowed to take its place. There's no need of cutting it out with a surgeon's scalpel. Purge away the old, diseased and worn out parts with BRANDRETH'S PILLS.

The Chicago Fair is still out of site, and may soon be out of mind.

PUT ON THE BRAKES

If you find you are going down hill in point of health. Failing strength, impaired digestion and assimilation are the marks of decline. Check these and other indications of premature decay with the grand vitalizer and restraining tonic, Hostetter's Stomach Bitters. Beginning at the fountain head, the stomach, the Bitters remedies its inefficiency, corrects its errors, and sets it vigorously at work. The digestive organ is thus enabled to thoroughly separate from the food its nutritive principles, which the blood assimilating, is enriched. Thus is the system nourished, and being nourished strengthened, and abnormal waste of its tissues stayed. Appetite, the power to rest well, a regular habit are also re-established, and the various functions move once more in their natural and healthful groove. The Bitters, moreover, is a specific for and preventive of malarial complaints, rheumatism, biliousness and kidney troubles.

P. HINKLE'S PATENT CENTRIFUGAL ROLLER QUARTZ MILL

THIS cut shows the New Hinkle Centrifugal Quartz Mill, with plates and slummer. This is the only mill made that needs no oil for the inside working parts, as it is thoroughly lubricated with water, supplied from a circular tank, which is connected to the roller spindles, slides and drips by rubber hose. By this means oil cannot interfere with perfect amalgamation. Other features of superiority are: Simplicity of construction; the free discharge of pulp; the wearing parts are easily replaced at a small cost. The small amount of power required to run the mill will recommend it to all practical mill men, as well as the small cost of erection and transportation of mill to the mine. A 5-foot mill weighs 9,000 lbs.; pulverizers 38 in. diam.; run, 80 to 90 rev. per minute, with a capacity of 20 tons per day. This size mill costs $1,500. With Silver Plates, Slummer and Ore Feeder, $1,800.

P. HINKLE'S PATENT ORE FEEDER.

Positive Feed and Ready Adjustment.

IN this Improved Ore Feeder the falling tappet of the mill causes a backward movement of the feeding-tray. As the ore comes from the hopper on to the tray, a transverse bar prevents the ore moving backward, and a small portion of the ore is thus forced off the front edge of the feeding-tray into the battery. The amount of movement of the feeding tray may be regulated, thus regulating the feed of ore. This feeder can be arranged for roller mill or stamps. It is strong and durable, and feeds wet or dry ore in regular quantities.

Curling the Mustache.

"How long has the custom of crimping the mustache been in vogue?" was asked of a dapper little barber, who runs a shop on Washington street.

"It was first introduced into the United States about four years ago," he replied, "but it was known in Europe half a century back."

"Does the crimping of the mustache injure its growth in any way?"

"Yes, very seriously. You see human hair is naturally oily, which indicates a healthy growth. If a single hair is placed under a powerful microscope, it will be found to resemble a pipe stem, that is, a little tube runs its entire length. Through this channel flows a current of oil. Now, if this is dammed up, it has the same effect as binding the stalk of a plant, the ripe sap is cut off and decay follows. Therefore, in ninty-nine cases out of one hundred, where the mustache is crimped, it finally begins to fall out, much to the grief of its owner. Where there is unusual vigor this result does not obtain, which accounts for the exceptions named."

"Do all your customers have their mustaches curled?"

"Oh, no; it's the middle aged and young fellows who carry the style. When a man begins to wrinkle up and his knee joints begin to rattle he cares very little for those finer points in his personal appearance."

"Do the dandy police officers like to have a curl put into their whiskers?"

"Do they? Well I should think so. There are some very handsome men who wear the uniform of the city, and when they go on duty they look as neat as wax. A low, hanging mustache would not harmonize with the ensemble of these stoical guardians of the peace. It is seldom one of them goes out on an ostensible hunt for crime with his mustache in the condition described."—Boston Globe.

Life in Ocean Abysses.

Dr. Regnard has raised the question as to whether a corpse which sinks to a very great depth is preserved indefinitely or otherwise from putrefaction. According to his researches, published in the archives of the Biological society of Paris, putrefaction does not take place in decomposable substances submitted to a pressure of 600 to 700 atmospheres. These figures correspond to a depth of 6,000 to 7,000 meters at sea. From these experiments it must not be concluded, according to Dr. Regnard, that there is a total absence of putrefaction in the greater depths of the sea. The curious "abysmal" fishes discovered in the Challenger and other expeditions appear to rise after death, so that they are sometimes found on the surface, though, as a rule, they go to pieces, as the surrounding pressure diminishes long before they reach the air. Still, there is no proof that bathybial or abysmal micro organisms do not exist; and, if so, they could cause decomposition in the corpses of men as well as in the dead bodies of abysmal fishes. The question is of considerable medico-legal and yet greater biological interest, and it is far from settled.—British Medical Journal.

New Oil Spreader for Stormy Seas.

A difficulty experienced in the use of oil in a storm at sea is that when spread on the surface the wind blows it to leeward and the effect is lost. This difficulty is now overcome by a new device, consisting of a mortar and bomb. The latter is a nearly globular shell of cast iron filled with oil. On the side toward the muzzle as it lies in the mortar is an aperture closed by a hinged cover, fitting tightly and fastened with a sort of latch. The latch is so constructed that when the mortar is discharged the pressure of the air releases it. But the aperture in the shell is not opened until it strikes the water and sinks beneath the surface. The shell is so weighted that as it sinks the aperture is uppermost and the cover is lifted by the pressure of oil upon it. Thus the oil is released well beneath the surface and rises through the waves, producing most effectual results.—New York Commercial Advertiser.

What Mrs. Jewell Has Done.

Another Connecticut lady is preparing for admission to the bar—Mrs. Annie S. Jewell, of New Hartford, who is pursuing her studies with the advantage of daily association with legal matters in the office of her husband, Probate Judge Frederick A. Jewell. With the single exception of Miss Hall she is the only lady in Connecticut who is a commissioner of the superior court. Her appointment dates Oct. 2, 1889, and was made by Judge John M. Hall on motion of Lawyer S. A. Herman, of Litchfield. It was also desired by her husband, as it qualified her for official acts in his office during his absence, such as administering oaths to persons filing papers.

Mrs. Jewell has virtually been the clerk of the probate court for a long time, and has done all the recording, but fearing that a question might be raised as to the legality of appointing a woman as clerk of the court, no actual appointment has been made. However, she performs all the duties of the clerkship except signing her name. Her office duties require about half her time, and the remainder she devotes to legal studies at her residence. She has been studying in this way for the last two years, and after two years more will apply for admission to the bar of Litchfield county. Already she is frequently consulted in legal matters by ladies who prefer to unfold their grievances to one of their own sex. Mrs. Jewell is a fine appearing lady, of very pleasing manners and highly intellectual. She is 23 years old and was born at Fort Selden, New Mexico, where her father, an officer of the regular army, was stationed.—Hartford Letter.

Dresses for Young Princesses.

The common sense idea of dressing children with a view to their health rather than their looks has received a noteworthy exemplification at the hands of their highnesses of Spain. Some dresses recently made for the young princesses were simple little frocks of French muslin, pure white, with tucks above the hem and rows of perpendicular insertion above that. The bodices were of a piece with the skirts, which were provided with invisible tucks to let them down as the children grow.—Chicago News.

Fishing in China.

Curious and ingenious are some of the Chinese contrivances for catching fish. In Swatow is used a shallow boat, on one side of which is a narrow plank painted white, which in the moonlight the fish mistake for water and jump over it into the boat. At Ningpo cormorants are systematically trained to fish, while at Ichang a wild animal, such as the otter, is trained, not to fish, but to frighten the fish into nets.—Arkansaw Traveler.

WOMAN'S WORLD.

SOCIAL CLUB OF THE FASHIONABLE WOMEN OF NEW YORK.

Work of Two Young Women—Whom Should Newspaper Women Marry?—That Boy's Stockings—Stylish Spring Bonnets. Getting Ready for Summer.

It will be interesting news to most women that there is right in the heart of the city a completely equipped woman's club house that provides for the gentler sex the accommodations, comforts and social amusements as gratifying to their tastes as the attractions that their husbands and brothers enjoy at their various social club houses. This particular woman's organization is the Ladies' New York club, which has been thriving prosperously for the last six months under the guidance of an enterprising woman president, with the aid of a man to look after the money matters when need be in the capacity of club treasurer.

The club headquarters is the neat English basement brown stone front dwelling at 134 Lexington avenue, almost opposite the home of the late President Arthur. It is a four story house, entirely unpretentious externally, but it is safe to say that there is not in the whole town another club house that is more cozy and homelike, and its members claim that it is far ahead in this respect to the Alexandria, the woman's club of London, which suggested its establishment, and the facilities of which its officers have improved upon. These officers are: Mrs. Henry Wright Shelton, president; Mrs. W. W. Shipman, recording secretary, and Mr. F. G. Brown, treasurer. The latter is a broker on the Cotton exchange.

The club was started early last November, and at the outset had a membership of about twenty-five. President Shelton said that the idea of the club at that time was to afford to women of moderate means, who were living in the suburbs or out of town altogether, a resort that would duplicate the comfort and privacy of their own homes, where they could stay for a day or two while on a visit to the city without escort. It was to be practically a hotel, but freed of the incidental discomforts that make a public house distasteful to a woman.

By one of those whimsical freaks of popular fancy that is the privilege of the gentler sex women of wealth took a sudden liking to the notion of a woman's club of this sort, and in a month's time over a hundred of them had joined the club and had made it fashionable. To-day the club has a membership of about 350, and members are being added at the rate of from three to five daily. Of this number 200 are New York women, and, what is more, the majority of the 200 are married. They go to the club often in the afternoons while their husbands are down town.

The club quarters are divided into a restaurant, parlors and reading rooms and lecture rooms and dormitories. The restaurant is on the ground floor, the parlors and lecture rooms on the second floor, and the dormitories occupy the rest of the building. It costs $20 a year in dues to belong to the club, and for the money a member can secure many privileges. There is an English cook attached to the club, and he will furnish meals at any time at restaurant prices to women who intend to go out to a matinee, and who do not like to eat at a restaurant. Theatre luncheon parties of this sort are, indeed, one of the popular features of the club. Any member who wants to go out shopping can get a special maid at the club to accompany her. Out of town members who are visiting the metropolis alone can secure cab service and other accommodations without the annoyance and bother of hunting them up for themselves.

The president of the club resides in the club house, and keeps it open both in the daytime and at night up to a reasonable hour for the use of members. For members living out of town rooms are provided at a cost of $1 per day. Application has to be made for them a day ahead. It is a custom for members to frequently bring their own maids with them, and meals to order are provided for those staying there. Non-members, when accompanied by a member, can obtain luncheon at restaurant prices. Any member who may desire to entertain her friends at a luncheon party can have a private room for this purpose. Children of members may be left at the club house in care of nurses or guardians whenever members want to go visiting. Messenger service is provided; telegrams and letters, if addressed to any member of the club, are received and cared for, as well as parcels.—New York Sun.

Whom Should Newspaper Women Marry?

"Should Newspaper Women Marry, and if so, Should They Marry Newspaper Men?" was the weighty problem for discussion which occupied the time of the Women's Press club at their fortnightly meeting, held at No. 24 Union square. About fifty women were on hand to express opinions on the matter. Mrs. E. Mitchell Tyng presided and introduced the speakers of the evening. Four special guests of the club were present. They were Miss Elizabeth Bisland, Mrs. Sara Lemoyne Cowell, Mrs. Mary Gale Humphreys and Mrs. Merrill (Jean Kincaid), of The Boston Globe.

Mrs. Tyng read the opening paper, which was strongly in favor of affirmative answers to both queries. Grace Greenwood voiced similar opinions, but Mrs. Mary E. Bryan, who followed, thought that marriage narrowed the sphere of the newspaper woman's work, and that if she was going to do her duty to her profession she would better remain single. Mrs. Eliza Putnam Heaton and Mrs. Townsend Percy also thought that newspaper men made congenial life mates for newspaper women. — New York Tribune.

Work of Two Women.

Miss Jane Potter, daughter of Bishop Potter, is a young lady of quiet taste, refined beauty and charming manners. Much of her leisure is devoted to the interests of the working girls. With Miss Helen Islin she has charge of a division of the Working Girls' club in Newark, and the two young ladies take turns as presiding officers. Miss Islin gives talks on practical cooking, housework, dressmaking, millinery and the purchase of flannels, shoes, bonnets, dress goods, furniture and the wisdom of economy, neatness, temperance and system.

Miss Potter can talk delightfully about the amenities and those sweet, simple, womanly ways that are better than beauty to a girl. She tells "her girls," as she calls them, the kind of books to read, the kind of associates to make, the kind of words to speak when foremen are abusive, comrades are unkind, employers are unjust and friends are false. She tells them how to stand, how to walk and how to breathe correctly; tells them how to keep their hands from getting rough and how to care for their hair, sight, clothes, shoes, health and morals.

Miss Islin is a pretty, graceful girl, with brown hair and eyes, a sweet voice and a captivating little lisp in her speech. A little more interest of this sort from the refined young women of New York would be the salvation of our shop girls. —New York World.

Getting Ready for Summer.

Remember that these are the days when the early hot iron, the insect powder and the napthaline cube and other discouragers catch the early grub or moth fly. Napthaline is a pretty white substance, one of the latter day rivals to camphor for making woolens and furs secure. An ounce of prevention for the next week, by scouring out all closets and thoroughly beating the woolen clothes that must still hang there, until May is established in warmth, will be worth pounds of camphor and fretting by and by. Use a stiff wing instead of a stick for scraping in any cracks there may be. Some of the chicken or pigeon wings that, dyed in masquerade colors, have done duty in hats, could be put to no better use than in these researches into insect life.

Also, do a great deal of brushing about this time upon the clothes you wear. From the street one brings in on the clothes quantities of germinating dust, and a thorough shaking and beating out of a window of all articles of the day's wear should take place night or morning, whichever is most convenient. Clothes not only look better and wear better for this process, but it removes considerable actively mischievous dust from the house itself.—Philadelphia Ledger.

The Boys' Stockings.

Down on their knees, unmindful of the dirt, Tom, Joe and all the rest are happy playing marbles. This is fun for the boys, but the stockings all out at the knees which greet the mother bring to her thoughts of mending and patching which but few enjoy. A writer in Godey's tells how these unsightly patches and darns may be avoided by knitting new knees into the stockings. Unravel top and bottom of the rent until you have on each end a clear line of stitches, take up on a knitting needle the upper line; then pull tight the jagged edges on either side of the hole, and with a worsted needle and wool just sew them over very lightly and neatly. This done, you have a space to fill up, and you proceed to knit the row you have ready on your knitting needle until you have a flap of knitting done the exact size of the hole. Then take up on another needle the lower row of stitches, and knit it together with the upper row, on the inside of the stocking, just as if you were fastening off the toe of a stocking. Once more thread your worsted needle and sew the sides of the flap, on the inside, to the sewn over jagged sides of the rent, and, instead of an ugly darn, you have an almost imperceptible repair.

Three Stylish Spring Bonnets.

Pale blue and black is the favorite combination in hats and bonnets of the latest importation. Here are three of them:

A wide brimmed hat of shirred lace, turned up at the back with an exquisite bow of pale blue gros grain ribbon, in the center of which is a tiny bow of black velvet ribbon; drooping from this all over the crown, are bunches of pale blue sweet peas, with black velvet bow on the brim in front.

A Marie Stuart capote is of black braid, with fine wreath of pale forget-me-nots under the edge all around; a pert looking bow, of pale blue gros grain ribbon, stands on one side of the pointed front; there is a smaller bow or knot of ribbon at the back, from which depend the long ties of blue ribbon.

A hat with projecting brim, narrow at the back, is of black open work braid; the brim is faced with shirred pale blue crepe; the crown is of black point d'esprit over a puff of pale blue; at the back is artistically arranged a bunch of beautiful, nodding, pale blue tips, from which depends a scarf, of the point d'esprit, a yard and a half long, to be wound about the neck and fastened on the left shoulder.—Ladies' Home Journal.

Mrs. Paulison Is a Hunter.

Three miles from Jacksonville, Fla., on a high bluff overlooking the St. John's river, and near enough to inhale the salt air from the Atlantic, stands the ancient historical house built by the Marquis de Talleyrand and once occupied by the family of the famous Frenchman. The pretty villa is nestled among magnolia and live oak trees, with a fleecy drapery of moss clinging to their massive branches, while orange groves and pine forests are a part of the possessions.

The traditional dwelling is now the winter home of Mr. and Mrs. Richard B. Paulison. Mrs. Paulison, who has many friends in the Garden City, will be remembered as Mrs. Annabel Wells Liggett, one of the most beautiful and accomplished women of Detroit, and daughter of the Hon. Alfred Russell, of that city. Mr. Paulison is the son of the late Judge Paulison, of New Jersey. Mrs. Paulison is called the best lady shot in the south, and, like her predecessor, the Marchioness, wears a hunting costume on these expeditions. In the winter of 1888, while at Sanford, the lady cut off a coot's head with a rifle at 200 yards, killed an eagle on the wing, and bagged thirty birds with her shotgun. While on her wedding journey up in the Canadian forests, where it was her fancy to spend the honeymoon, she hunted side by side with Indians, who acknowledged her superior skill; so she was a marvel as well as a rival hunter to the red men. It was an original wedding journey, and her life spent up in the wigwams of Canada was delightful.—Cor. Chicago Inter Ocean.

A Noble Charity.

The organizations for aiding the sick, needy and helpless in this city are numerous and generally deserving of confidence and support. Among them is one which is not as well known to the public as it deserves to be in view of the good work it is doing. It is the New York Infant asylum at Tenth avenue and Sixty-first street. Other cities have foundling asylums which care for abandoned babies, but this asylum aims to save the babies and their mothers as well. Needy women of previous good character, from this city and county, are received for care. They receive the most skillful medical attendance, and are treated with a kindness and Christian charity which frequently save them from desperation and abandoned lives.

This asylum is a home, not a prison. Its inmates are treated not only as human beings, but as sisters—not as criminals.—New York Press.

Where to Hide Your Money.

Women have always had curious ideas about where to keep money when traveling. I know one who traveled from New York to Florida with $2,000 between the sole of her foot and her stocking, and she slept with her stockings on. Another one always pinned her money just inside her corsets, until she was told that if she fainted anywhere the first thing a good Samaritan would do would be to unloosen her bodice and stays, and then some wicked Pharisee would discover the ducats and grab them. Since she has heard this she has taken to pinning the fortune to the back of her corsets, claiming that, even if she was taken ill, as she would be laid flat on her back, insensible or not, she would be sure of her treasure.—Exchange.

A Rapid Telegrapher.

Miss Kittie B. Stephenson, who won the first prize of $50 for the ladies' class in the telegraphic contest in New York, is said to be a hustler with a telegraphic key. She is only 18 years old, but the experience she has picked up during the last three years that she has been an operator has given her an unconscious confidence that is refreshing to behold. She has always been told that she was a very fast sender, but she didn't believe it. She entered the tournament to please her friends. She works in the city line department, and her fame as a sender extends to all branch offices in the city. —New York Herald.

Women at the Capitol.

You meet numerous women with claims in the Capitol corridors, and there are a couple of old ladies who have been here for a generation awaiting the settlement of a cotton claim. The claim is probably a just one, but congress does not get at it, and they will be in their graves before it is settled. Their faces were fresh when they came here. They are wrinkled now, and there are crows' feet at their eyes. They bring their knitting with them, and sit together in the galleries waiting and watching, and watching and waiting, session in and session out.—Cor. New York Star.

She Was Smart.

A rich St. Louis widow who was engaged to a wealthy attorney recently tried a peculiar scheme with success. She sent for her betrothed and asked him to sign an ante-nuptial contract allowing her to keep control of all her property. He refused point blank, and she declared the wedding off, accusing him of mercenary motives. She had seen somebody she liked better than the lawyer and wished to withdraw in such a way that he would not be likely to bring action for breach of promise.—New York Telegram.

"Sunset" Hair Brought Out.

Pontifical violet is to be worn still. It is uncommonly becoming to some women, and they will, therefore, be sure to cultivate the color with assiduity. It also shows off the fashionable "sunset hair" to great perfection. There is to be a revival of magenta, too, so the tide seems setting toward the resurrection of bright tints. With a little toning down, magenta can be made rather nice, a sort of "ashes of roses shade."—New York Journal.

President at Mount Holyoke.

The interesting announcement is made that the vacant presidency of Mount Holyoke college, South Hadley, Mass., has been offered to Mrs. Lizzie Mead, widow of Professor Hiram Mead, of Oberlin, and recently an instructress at the Abbott Female seminary, Andover. Her late husband went to his chair at Oberlin from the pastorate of the church in South Hadley. She is at present in Germany.—Hartford Courant.

Disease from Bad Teeth.

I have seen the most violent convulsions caused by decaying teeth in a child's mouth; in fact, I do not exaggerate in the least when I say that two-thirds of all the diseases which prey upon children from five to twelve years, and often longer, are the direct result of defective teeth, and could be entirely avoided by filling the teeth as rapidly as decay appeared.—Interview in Good Housekeeping.

A Popular Dancer.

Carmencita, the Spanish dancer who is the sensation of the hour, is enchanted with her American trip. And well she may be, for she is making plenty of money. Besides her regular engagement, she is in constant demand for private houses at $200 a night. By the way, her name is pronounced as though it were spelled Carmen-theta.—New York Commercial Advertiser.

Built by English Captives.

The Sma-Hassen tower at Rabat, Africa, is a superb structure, and although in parts unfinished and damaged by lightning is still lordly and beautiful. Built of hewn stone brought from Spain and by the hands of Christian captives, and 180 feet from base to summit, it presents on the outside three tiers of large and elegant arches over comparatively small windows, and above the topmost arch a deep honey comb of exquisite carving. It has a simple grandeur of proportion that is peculiarly its own and very impressive. The ascent of the tower is made, not by stairs, but by a series of inclined planes, up which a horse might be ridden three horses abreast, as Leo Africanus asserts.

The lowest of these inclined planes, which are made of a concrete of lime and sand, very hard and durable, was broken away in the time of the Emperor Sidi Mahomet, and by his order, so that now a ladder has to be used before a footing can be got. As the ascent is made a number of spacious stone chambers, chill, solemn and tenantless, except by owls and bats, are passed, and when the top is reached a magnificent view is obtained of the restless Atlantic. The tower is not merely a stately sentinel of the great mosque, but a lookout station and a beacon for ships at sea. An idea of its greatness may be derived from the dimensions of the great underground cistern, which supplied water for the lustrations of the worshipers who frequented it, and which can even now be clearly traced out.—Exchange.

A Costly Golden Lamp.

The interior of the grand cathedral in the City of Mexico is, even at the present day, after having been successfully plundered, most magnificent. It contains five naves, six altars and fourteen chapels, which contain the bones of some of the viceroys and departed great men of Mexico. The "Glory of the Capola," virgin and revered saints were painted by celebrated artists. A balustrade surrounds the choir of a metal so rich that an offer to replace it with one of equal weight in solid silver was refused. This weighs twenty-six tons, and came from China in the old days of Spanish dominion, when the richly freighted galleons of Spain sent their cargoes overland from Acaputo to Vera Cruz on the way to the mother country.

The high altar was formerly the richest in the world, and yet retains much of its original glory. It contained candlesticks of gold so heavy that a single one was more than a man could lift, chalices, cruets and pyxes of gold incrusted with precious metal, studded with emeralds, amethysts, rubies and sapphires.

The statue of the assumption (now missing) was of gold, ornamented with diamonds, and is said to have cost $1,000,000. There was a golden lamp, valued at $70,000, which it cost at one time $1,000 to clean, but, according to a French writer—and the joke is his—the liberal troops cleaned it for nothing, and it has not been seen since.—New York Journal.

Cheap Flash Lamp for Photography.

Take an ordinary clay pipe, a wad of absorbent cotton and a piece of string. Wrap the cotton around the outside of the bowl and tie it with the string. Take a piece of bulb rubber tubing and draw it over the stem so that you can place the tube in your mouth and blow through the pipe. Next weigh out the amount of magnesium you want for your flash, then place it in the bowl of the pipe. Take some alcohol and saturate the absorbent cotton. When you have focused your subject, and decided where to have your light, ignite the alcohol. The flame will stand up six inches over the bowl of the pipe. Blow through the pipe stem and your exposure is made.—New York Commercial Advertiser.

Clearly Proven.

At the matinee.

Fair Country Cousin—Oh, Jack, how bewitchingly Miss Hicee does sing!

Jack (witheringly)—H'm—well, tolerably. But the poor girl is utterly destitute of stage presence.

F. C. C. (scornfully)—Stage presents! You blind boy. Why, she got a basket and two bouquets after that last encore.—Pittsburg Bulletin.

Tips.

"Golly, boss!" said the waiter as he set down the tray, "I came near tipping over the dish that had your tipsy pudding in. Tip top weather, ain't it?"

"Yes," said the guest, "if you have no antipathy to a cold day." And when he went out the waiter closed his hands on the tips of his fingers.—Detroit Free Press.

Good Little Children Change So.

Little Maude (reading a Sunday school book)—Do all good children die young, ma?

Ma (who has returned from the matinee)—No, my child. They used to die young, but nowadays they go on the stage instead and play Little Lord Fauntleroy for years and years. —Chatter.

While prospecting in the Okefeenokee swamp, Georgia, a man killed an animal in the swamp of which natural history gives no account. It resembled a turtle in some respects, but was four and one-half feet long and twenty-four inches across. The back was covered with a hard, scaly substance, somewhat like an alligator's hide, and the animal had a long, hooked beak.

ODDS AND ENDS.

There are natures so gracious that the patience and kindliness of good breeding seem theirs by inheritance.

Mrs. J. H. Taylor, of Poquetannuck, decided to discard an old pin cushion, but curiosity prompted her to disembowel it first. She recovered just 434 needles that had been lost therein.

A western Massachusetts dentist is said to have a small boy sit in his office and yell at the top of his lungs occasionally. It lends an air of business to the establishment.

Sydney Smith, in his youth, was very shy. He cured himself of the disease by making two discoveries: first, that people were not employed in observing him; and next, that the world estimated a man at his true value.

An Astoria man is 73 years of age and a capitalist, and is willing to run a mile race with any man of his age for a purse of $10,000.

The projected railway up the Jungfrau goes to a height of 13,000 feet, far above the lowest limit of perpetual snow, and it is proposed to tunnel the mountain the entire distance.

Howard Taylor, the expert tennis player and winner of this year's Waterbury cup, is still young, despite his length of service on the tennis field. He is but 24, having entered Harvard at 16. He graduated in 1886.

Rev. Dr. Wayland, who has been called the Chauncey Depew of Philadelphia in the matter of after dinner speaking, is six feet one and one-half inches in height, has a dark complexion and heavy eyebrows. His physical appearance is much like that of Abraham Lincoln.

Waterbury, Conn., has adopted an economical plan for securing new sign boards on the principal thoroughfares leading into the place from the adjoining country towns. The selectmen have authorized an advertising agent to erect thirty-six of these boards, on condition that the town is put to no expense. The agent has sold the advertising space on twenty four of the boards to two merchants.

Of the three prizes offered by Public Opinion for the three best essays on the importance of the study of current topics as a feature of school and college education, the first prize, $50, was won by Rev. Hamilton Bartlett, of Providence, R. I.; the second, of $30, by Rebecca Shively, of Chambersburg, Pa., and the third, $20, by Frank Morton, of Clarksville, Tenn.

A Greek woman who died at Limferopol, Russia, lately, is said to have been 112 years old. She was working in her garden to the last moment. Becoming tired she lay down to rest, and passed away without a struggle. There are many centenarians in the Crimea. Three years ago there was in Kertch an old soldier whose dismissal from the army dated from the time of Katherine II, and whose authenticated credentials put his age at 128 years.

A little 2-year-old girl of Brooklyn, while playing on the second floor, managed in some way to fall out of the window, and would no doubt have been severely injured but for the fact that she pulled two pillows with her that were on the sill. She turned over in the fall and struck with both pillows underneath her. After a short cry she got up and resumed her game, this time, however, in the street.

Although Rev. Sam Small is a D. D. and the president of a university, he can't get a certificate of church membership. He lost his membership in the Methodist church when he joined the Episcopal church, and then he lost his membership in the Episcopal church when he went back to the Methodist church. Consequently he has no papers of any kind to show, and may have to join the local Methodist church in Ogden, Utah, on probation.

The Albert medal of the English Society of Arts has been awarded to Dr. W. H. Perkin, F. F. S., "for his discovery of the method of obtaining coloring matter from coal tar, a discovery which led to the establishment of a new and important industry, and to the utilization of large quantities of a previously worthless material."

A pretty story comes from England about a poor shepherd who was also a geologist, geographer and an admirer of Stanley. Stanley's publisher met this man while walking on Beachy Head, and was charmed with his learning. The shepherd offered the publisher a pound—pretty much all his hard earned savings—and asked if it would pay for Stanley's book, promising to send the balance of the money as soon as possible. The publisher says the shepherd shall receive his money back again and a copy of "Darkest Africa" with Stanley's autograph in it.

Women Who Make Harnesses.

Mrs. Caroline Overst stands at the head of the women harnessmakers. For the past twenty years she has lived on Washington street in one of the many cottages of the Trinity church estate. She employs a couple of men in the shop and works with them steadily. She can make a harness or trim a carriage. She is quiet, serious and businesslike. She doesn't do any visiting in the neighborhood, because she hasn't the time and doesn't care the snap of a whip for gossip.

Among the craft to which she is an honor are Ellen Ferguson, of Second avenue; Margaret Gilbert, of Farms road; Ellen McCarthy, of Albany street, and Theresa Roche, of Ninth avenue. Lena Hilborne is interested in the Chambers street wholesale saddlery firm.—New York World.

Many or Few.

There is no cheerfulness in the world comparable to that afforded by the daily life of a large family. There may be an equal amount of happiness in a small family, there may be a depth of bliss where only two are together of which the life lived by ten or a dozen could afford no idea; but for the cheer of varied interests, of lively voices, of going and coming, of song and laughter, of moving figures, of the sense of action and life, what can be desired better than a family where father and mother and grandmother, aunts and children, made the round dozen? In a small family it is difficult to keep up the wide interest in people and neighborhood which does a great deal to promote cheerfulness; it is difficult to keep up such interest in more than a very few, from the mere want of time, from the difficulty of getting about, and the impossibility of being in more than one place at a time, if from no other reason. But where there are a number of people under the roof, that answers every purpose, as each one bringing in keen feeling for the affairs of several other, the whole together maintain a wide and deep connection from which cheerfulness is precipitated like a salt from its component gases. But, apart from the cheer derived from intercourse and relationship with the outside multitude by means of a large family's varied acquaintance, comes that derived from other sources in consequence of our full circle.

This member of the large household is the one devoted to charity; all the rest do a great deal of vicarious charity, as we may call it, through that channel, and feel content with satisfied consciences in a sense of duty done, which sense, whether it contributes to virtue or not, does, at any rate, to cheerfulness, and it is cheerfulness of which we are speaking. This other member is the student of science, and out of the chance conversation, the books, plates, experiments, and experiences of this individual the rest hive a sufficient amount of scientific honey for their own uses, and are enriched with learning without the least exertion of their own, receiving it, as it were, through the pores. These others, again, do the gay society business; and those of the remainder who are quietly inclined go to all the routes and drives and sails in the gay ones' enjoyment, see what the belles wear and how the beaux behave, and never have to leave their tranquil corner at all. And this last one, with scraps of singing and scraps of piano playing, and mornings of practicing and evenings of mirth, welds everything together in a sort of perpetual ringing of joy bells. In short, in a large family the whole world comes to every member of it, and in a small family only a narrow segment of it can come.—Harper's Bazar.

Reptiles as Curiosities.

You would scarcely suppose that such things as tarantulas, centipedes and Gila monsters had a market value, yet they are quoted as regularly by curiosity dealers as feather work, grasses, etc. People collect everything, and there is always a demand for the animals and reptiles named. A good specimen of the tarantula or centipede, alive or mounted, brings $1. Live specimens are sent in boxes, only by express, as they are not allowed to go by mail. Stuffed specimens are ordered for collection, but I cannot imagine why the live ones are wanted. Quite a trade is done in them, however, through the curiosity shops of the country, which order from the stores in Mexico or on the border. What is more surprising is the sale that exists for Gila monsters. Zoological gardens want them, of course, but there are private parties who also order them. Fine specimens bring from $5 to $10. They come from Arizona, where the Indians collect them for the dealers. This is the most repulsive looking reptile to be found in any part of the world.—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

Clearing Away Dust.

For some time it has been known that dust, as well as fine particles of commingled water vapor and carbon, which make up the London fogs, can be removed from the atmosphere by means of a brush discharge from an electric engine. It is now seriously proposed to make use of this interesting principle in removing the flour dust from mills, in which experience shows that explosions are likely to occur, to the clearing of tunnels from smoke, and even to the diminution, if not the removal, of those curious and destructive fogs which affect cities where bituminous coal is used in large quantities.

Although this method of condensing dust and smoke is doubtless practicable on a small scale it does not seem likely that it can be used in an effective way to combat the evil out of doors. Nevertheless, it is interesting as one of the many varied practical experiments and suggestions which have been brought before us by the marvelous progress of electrical invention.—Boston Herald.

Whose Voice Warned Her?

Sunday night, while the snow and wind storm was at its height, a Bluman street lady was awakened by a buzzing sound in her ears, and was startled by a far off voice repeating in melodious tones: "Wake up!" "Get up!" The lady obeyed the strange summons, and was terribly frightened on discovering that the house was on fire. The soot in the old fashioned fireplace in the kitchen, which was over a foot deep, was burning, and the flames were shooting out through the fireboard. The lady soon aroused the household and the fire was extinguished before any serious damage was done. That the warning was given no one who knows the lady will doubt, and but for the warning it is probable that the house and some of the occupants would have been burned.—New London Telegraph.

A SPORTSMAN'S TROPHIES.

Mr. Von der Wettern's Collection of Deer Horns, Guns, Etc.

Mr. W. Von der Wettern, Sr., who resides at No. 413 West Saratoga street, is one of the best posted sportsmen in Baltimore. He was originally a forester in Germany. The rifle is his choice gun, and, while he is fond of small game shooting, large game has been his favorite sport. That he is a master hand at rifle shooting a case of twenty gold medals attests.

Like all ardent sportsmen Mr. Von der Wettern has preserved many trophies of the chase, his collection of deer and other horns being one of the finest, if not the finest, in this country. The horns number over 300 pair, and are valued at over $10,000. They were all beautifully mounted by Mr. Von der Wettern, and, as he keeps them for his own pleasure, the immense amount of work which he has spent on them has been a source of pleasure.

On reaching the fourth floor of Mr. Von der Wettern's dwelling the visitor finds himself confronted by a passage, the walls of which are studded with mounted horns, under which are a lot of cages filled with song birds. The horns are of all kinds and so arranged above and about the cages as to remind the looker on of a rose bush with its thorns guarding the roses. In two rooms leading from the passage are neatly and systematically arranged nearly 300 pairs of horns. The mounting is artistic. Each pair is a true pair, being attached by the frontal bone of the animal to which they belonged. By the means of screws passing through this bone the horns are attached to the shield shaped wooden panels, the size of the panels being in conformity with the horns. The panels are attached to the walls by hooks, so that they may be easily handled.

There are horns that would have been the pride of old hunters in the days when rifles were loaded from horns and pouches; horns that would adorn the halls of a mansion; horns that the dude would give up his last dollar for, so that his cane and umbrella handle might be the envy of his fellow chappies; horns, big and little, straight and crooked, of normal and abnormal growth, from foreign shores and different parts of America, some with and some without a history; some that would make corkscrews, some that would make gimlets, some that would make boat hooks and others that would make baseball bats and battle axes. In fact, it would be hard to find a more varied or beautiful collection. Besides the horns the sanctum contains a collection of pipes and canes of rare designs, gathered from different parts of the world.

Mr. Von der Wettern has not as yet catalogued his collection of horns, but on each pair he has attached a ticket which bears the name of the animal from which the horns were taken. The most striking of the horns are those of the elk. One pair of these came from an Oregon elk, and attached to the horns is a portion of the skull of the animal, neatly fitted into a life sized head carved from wood. The horns are nearly as tall as a man, and it takes a lengthy pair of arms to be able to span the distance between the top prongs. One horn contains nine and the other seven prongs. Another pair from a Montana elk, though containing but twelve prongs, weighs thirty-six pounds. The lightest pair weighs eighteen pounds. Deer horns from different species of deer naturally form the larger part of the collection. The finest specimen is from a black tailed deer killed in Colorado. It has fifteen prongs. The others range down to one prong. Among the deer horns those of the German noble deer are the most beautiful, the colors ranging from light brown to a seal brown and black, the tips of all being polished white. The largest of the collection has fourteen prongs.

Mr. Von der Wettern's firearms are all adapted to the sport to which he is devoted. Besides a regular target rifle, he has a case of guns of foreign and domestic patterns, generally of smaller bores, from 12 down to 16. Some of them are combination guns for shot and ball. One fowling piece has two sets of barrels of different caliber which fit the same stock. A handsome leather case sheathes a collection of his hunting knives.—Baltimore Sun.

Game Sparrows in the Pit.

The colored sports of Jeffersonville, Ind., have discovered a new amusement, which is attracting considerable attention and is causing a good deal of money to change hands. At a house on Indiana avenue is located what is termed a sparrow pit. A large round table, on which is a wire cage, is placed in one of the rooms, and into this two cocks sparrows are put and allowed to fight until one of them is conquered—sometimes killed. Pieces of silk thread of different colors are placed around the birds' necks to distinguish them, and the interest taken in the battle is as good as a cock fight. It is said that in proportion to their size the birds make a harder combat for supremacy than two game chickens.—Louisville Courier-Journal.

Facts About Smokers.

By close observation I estimate that 50 per cent. of the men in this city smoke or use tobacco in some form. I am in a position to see it, being behind the desk of a restaurant all day. Every one knows a cigar tastes better after a hearty meal than at any other time of the day, and is less injurious then, if injurious at all. This accounts for the cigar cases in restaurants nowadays, but there was a time when it was not the rule. I have noticed time and again that a smoker who is short of cash will not take enough food, but will buy a cigar when he has finished eating. There are many men who spend more for their cigars than they do for their food, and some double the amount.—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

Diamonds in Fortnightly Review.

The Cause of Their Estrangement.

It transpires that the estrangement between Crown Prince Rudolph and the present emperor of Germany grew out of a remark made by the latter some years before his accession to the throne. He and Rudolph had been on very friendly terms and one day in conversation William stated that if he ever became emperor his policy would be conducted on the same lines as that of Frederick the Great. To this Prince Rudolph retorted that Frederick's schemes always included the destruction of the Austrian empire. Prince William did not disclaim his intention to imitate the great emperor, and hence a coolness arose between the two heirs to crowns which was never dispelled.—San Francisco Chronicle.

A Famous Trio.

They were all Boston boys, and neighbors, playmates and constant comrades. Appleton was a man of remarkable wit and quaint originality, with strong literary and artistic tastes, which, however, did not reach the point of high creative power. A sybaritic temperament, favored by prosperous circumstance, held him satisfied all his life within the conservative circle of the most delightful social companionship, in which the wonder was that the latent forces of his nature took no definite and enduring form, so that "Tom Appleton" remains only a marvelous memory, a man tenderly beloved in life, and now affectionately remembered.

But in him, as in the others, were the stern old Puritan conscience and truthfulness, a scorn of dishonor and indirectness, yet blended with such suavity and accomplishment, such grace of mind and rectitude of life and delight in refined enjoyment, that in no other group of friends in New England, probably, were the characteristics and engaging qualities of Puritan and Cavalier more happily combined. Their careers were widely severed, although Boston was always their home. Phillips passed on to the renown of a great orator and leader in one of the noblest causes in history; Motley won the highest laurels of literature in the works which record the defense and development of liberty in Holland; Appleton placidly drifting with the current of his time, watched with the keenest interest and admiration the cause of both, and if perhaps he sometimes felt, with Browning's Pictor Ignotus,

I could have painted pictures like that youth's men praise so.

there was no hint in word or manner that he regretted any prize he had not won. Long after the college days, and after Motley's first unprosperous literary ventures and his diligent study in Europe, he sent Appleton the sheets of his "History of the Dutch Republic." Appleton received them in Newport, where he read them with delight, and one morning, bursting into the room of a friend, he exclaimed, with unwonted enthusiasm, "I've read it all, and, by Jove, Motley has done it at last!"—George William Curtis in Harper's Magazine.

Mr. Sullivan's Philosophy.

"I've heard," said John L. Sullivan,
As his massive right he hurled,
"That the hand that rocks the cradle
Is the hand that rules the world."

"But since I struck this foreign land—
And it's prince—all of a heap,
I'm inclined to think I've got the hand
That puts 'em all to sleep!"

Reverend H. J. Winsor will preach at Lone Pine at 11 a. m.; Georges Creek 2:30 Independence at 7:00 o'clock in evening. Sunday School at Independence and Lone Pine at 11 o'clock a. m.

Messrs. J. C. Crocker and James Herod were down from Big Pine yesterday.

Mr. J. H. Stontenborough came down from Bishop on Wednesday and was in town a few days.

Potatoes are selling at Independence at a dollar and a half per sack. The sacks contain about 110 pounds.

It is claimed that South Dakota will soon supply all the tin needed in the United States.

Next Monday the Supervisors will meet in regular session. They will then canvass the election returns of the county.

It was a very close race between Jerry Mairs and old John Keegan for Road Overseer. John got there by just two jumps ahead of Jerry.

Mr. J. H. Roberts came over from Saline Valley to Big Pine on Monday. There is a good deal of activity among the borax operators in Saline Valley.

Charles E Sherman, Republican candidate for State Senator was given a majority of 233 in this county. This is much the largest majority given for any of the candidates.

Mr. Frank Fitzgerald gives notice that all bills due by him it presented not later than the first day of each month will be paid on the 5th of each month. See the card.

The danger of a famine in the west of Ireland is reported to be real and horrible. Disease as a consequence of the scarcity of food has already broken out and is very fatal.

The new water pipe at Darwin was all laid and the works completed last week. There is now an abundant supply of good water; much more, in fact than is needed for the town.

Mr. J. Harrington got in from Long Valley with about seven hundred head of cattle belonging to Mr. J. N. Evans of Reno. The cattle are now pasturing near Independence.

Mr. Frank Fitzgerald came in from Modock this forenoon. He is buying a large stock of supplies for his camp and reports the present condition of the mines in that locality as excellent.

Mrs. Winsor, wife of Rev. J. H. Winsor, arrived at Independence last Monday from England. She was accompanied by three children. The whole party got over the long journey very well.

There were six delegates from Independence at the Republican county convention. Of these at least four scratched their tikets on election day. Yet all expressed themselves satisfied when the nominations were made.

There is a great deal of confusion in the election returns from many precincts. It is certain that a recount will be demanded. It is beyond doubt, however, that the Republican candidates for the principal county offices are elected.

On Wednesday there came a change in the beautiful weather we had for many weeks. Never was any part of earth blessed with calmer and lovlier days than we had through those weeks. Now we have blustering winds, flying clouds obscure the sun and the trees are stripped of most of their foliage.

At Independence 71 Republican votes were cast. On 31 of these the name of the party candidate for Superior Judge was erased and that of the Democratic candidate inserted. The number of Democratic votes cast was 60, and of these 17 were scratched against the party candidate for Judge and in favor of the Republican.

The recent decline in the market price of silver is due entirely to the influence of mono-metalists and speculators. There has been no appreciable increase of the production of silver from the mines and the need for silver currency is increasing. Silver is the money of the masses and should not be left to the mercy of sharp speculators to change its value at their pleasure and for their benefit. It is the uncertainty of any fixed value for silver as money that works such injury to the people at large.

A Dangerous Character.

Last Sunday Manuel Leon got to brandishing a pistol and threatening to shoot somebody at Lone Pine. Mr. R. C. Spear went to him and quietly advised him to go away and behave himself. Leon pointed his pistol at Mr. Spear, who, knowing the man to be dangerous, got out of the way. Later in the day Leon was arrested and brought to Independence, where he is now in jail, a complaint having been entered and a warrant issued for his arrest. The citizens of Lone Pine have been greatly annoyed by a few bad characters, who have been growing bolder and more reckless lately. Some check must of necessity be placed upon this lawlessness and perhaps a temporary sojourn in San Quentin may serve the purpose.

A Frontier Incident.

Last Sunday Mrs. Henderson, who keeps the boarding house at Sylvania, was taken very ill with inflammatory rheumatism. Dr. Outhalt was within reach but he had no medicines. Mr. R. S. Starret, Superintendent of the mines, started from the camp at midnight for Big Pine, fifty miles distant. There he changed horses and went to Bishop, sixteen miles further, got what medicines were wanted, returned to Big Pine and again changed horses and left that place about seven o'clock Monday evening, arriving at Sylvania early Tuesday morning. Here was a continuous journey of one hundred and thirty-two miles, a good portion of the way over deserts and mountains, without stopping longer than to eat at Big Pine. This is a sample of frontier life.

Louisiana, as usual.

Maryland, solid Democratic.

Massachucetts, Democrats gain 2 Congressmen.

Nevada, complete returns from 76 out of 174 precincts in Nevada give for Colcord 3661, Winters 2953. Congress, Bartine 3602, Cassidy 2898.

Connecticut, legislature Republican on joint ballot. Democrats elect 2 congressmen. Representative in fourth district is uncertain.

Delaware, Governor, State ticket and legislature Democratic.

Florida, as usual.

Indiana, Republicans struck a land slide. Democrats elect full state ticket by 15,000 majority and 11 out of 13 Congressmen.

Illinois, Congressional delegation stands Republicans 7, Democrats 11.

Iowa, incomplete returns indicate election of entire Democratic ticket.

Nevada, Republicans elect Governor, Congressmen and have majority in legislature.

North Carolina, Democrats elect state ticket and 9 Congressmen. Republicans claim 2 Congressmen.

Texas, Democrats gain, Republicans not in it.

Virginia, Democrats gain; elect 10 Congressmen.

West Virginia, Democratic; tidal wave sweeps everything.

Wisconsin. Governor and legislature is Democratic; they also elect 6 out of 9 Congressmen.

Michigin, Democrats elect Governor and 8 out of 11 Congressmen.

Mississippi, Democratic as usual.

Minnesota, shows Democratic gain; they elect 3 Congressmen; 2 yet in doubt.

Montana, both parties claim Congress; may take official count to decide.

Washington, Willson, representative reelected to Congress.

Alabama, full Democratic delegation to Congress.

Arkansas, Republicans claim election in first and second congressional districts.

Arizona, incomplete and scattering returns indicate very close vote for Congress; impossible to decide at present.

Colorado, such a close vote that full returns must be waited for.

Unprofitable.

Mr. J. R. Eldred will close his term of office as Sheriff having the respect of all the people of the county without regard to party. It is not to laud him but to use his name as a text that he is mentioned here. During his term in office he has lived in decent frugality and not wasted his salary in extravagance of any kind. We have not pried into his affairs but venture the assertion that he has saved nothing out of his salary and yet his is the best paid of any of the county offices. The man who is qualified by education, talent and experience to make a good county officer, will do far better for himself and family by devoting himself to some regular business or profession than by seeking political office. The office seeker is kept in a fever of anxiety from the day his name comes before the people as a candidate till the result of the election is known. If he makes a personal canvass for votes it is nearly certain that he will be forced to do and say things that will make him regard himself with contempt. From the day he goes into office till the day he goes out he is likely to be followed by leeches who regard him as their legitimate prey, and who think that as long as he has a dollar part of it belongs to them. The lying, treachery and general meanness that an office seeker sees is enough to make him hold most of mankind in contempt, and he would do so if it were not for some who are honest in professions of support or candid in frankly saying they will oppose him.

The social given at Masonic Hall last Friday evening was well attended and profitable as well as pleasant. The proceeds were given to the Pastor of the M. E. Church and enabled him to make necessary arrangements for his wife and children, who arrived here on Monday from England.

Passed Away.

For the first time since Inyo County was organized nearly the whole Republican county ticket has been elected. Regularly at each election a large majority was given for Republican National and State officers, but just as regularly nearly the whole of the county officers elected were Democrats. Of course such results could come only from agencies working within the Republican party itself. These agencies were as active as ever in the present election and far more open, but ability to ruin what can no longer be ruled has passed away, e us hope forever.

For Sale.

The ranch known as the "Rittgers place" near Lone Pine is offered for sale together with the the farming implements and stock. The ranch contains 320 acres of excellent land. The stock consists of thirty head of cattle and twelve brood mares. There is now sixty tons of hay on the place and feed enough to winter 200 head of stock. The winter pasture has been rented five years past at $300 a year. The soil is a rich loam and excellently adapted to vegetable raising. There is plenty of outside range, making it a good stock ranch. For further particulars address

I do not ask you to get out—to get out of the room, or the house, or the town, or the country, or the planet, or the universe. Do I make myself plain?" Mrs. Winks—"You couldn't possibly make yourself any plainer than you are naturally."—Demorest.

Too long deluded—the unhappy victim of catarrh in the head. He's been told that it can't be cured. Don't you believe it. It can be, and it is—no matter how bad or of how long standing. It has been done for thousands—by Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy. Other so-called remedies may palliate for a time; this cures for all time. By its mild, soothing, cleansing and healing properties, it conquers the worst cases. Its makers offer, in good faith, a reward of $500 for a case of catarrh which they cannot cure. They are able to pay it. Are you able to take it?

The symptoms of catarrh are, headache, obstruction of nose, discharges falling into throat, sometimes profuse, watery, and acrid, at others, thick, tenacious, mucous, purulent, bloody, putrid and offensive; eyes weak, ringing in ears, deafness; offensive breath; smell and taste impaired, and general debility. Only a few of these symptoms likely to be present at once. Thousands of cases terminate in Consumption and end in the grave, without ever having manifested all these symptoms. Dr. Sage's Remedy cures the worst cases. 50 cents, by druggists.

MANY MEN FIND THAT

Storms, snows, drenching rains, and furious winds are a part of the regular routine of life. Two-thirds of the sickness through life is caused by colds; you cannot be too well protected in stormy weather to avoid them. A man having a "Fish Brand Slicker" may be exposed to a storm for twenty-four hours at a stretch, and still be protected from every drop of rain, besides being shielded from the biting winds. No matter what your occupation, if you are liable to be caught in a rain or snow storm, you should have on hand a "Fish Brand Slicker." It will surely save your health, and perhaps your life. Beware of worthless imitations, every garment stamped with the "Fish Brand" Trade Mark. Don't accept any inferior coat when you can have the "Fish Brand Slicker" delivered without extra cost. INSECT TORMENTS OF BRAZIL.

Creeping Pests Which Lodge Under the Skin and Must Be Cut Out.

Insects in all countries often possess an extensive power of annoyance greatly in contrast with their diminutive size. They appear to combine the maximum of effect with the minimum of effort in a very scientific fashion. Brazil is specially favored with parasitic torments, and even if those who are to the manner born become case hardened, the traveler from climes where insect life is less offensive in its attacks can never be wholly reconciled to his lot. Even the most generous of Christians harbors a revengeful spirit against his bloodthirsty but minute assailants, which are at once puny and powerful.

Take the bush tick, for example. Of this diminutive monster there are three species, of which the largest is about three-quarters of an inch in diameter. We are told that this insect was known to the ancients, but it is very unlikely that they enjoyed its acquaintance. There are three varieties: Ixodes ricinus, Ixodes plumbeus and Ixodes reticulatus. The Latin name was derived from its supposed resemblance to the ripe bean of the Palma Cristi. The Brazilian name is carrapato, and when examined under a magnifying glass it is seen to be furnished with a weapon of offense in the form of a trident of teeth, which are serrated inward. It has also three pairs of legs, and each leg is provided with strong hooked claws. Enormous quantities of the eggs are laid upon the ground, and the young ones as they creep out climb up the plants and catch at any passing animal which brushes past, and fatten on it.

When Mr. H. W. Bates was in the highlands of Brazil, he had to devote an hour at the end of his daily rambles to picking off the carrapatos that clung to him by their incisive fangs. The infliction is so dreadful that horses and cattle sometimes die from the exhaustion caused by the bites of these creatures, which settle in swarms. The traveler soon has the appearance of a person suffering from shingles. Sometimes the attacks bring on ricinian fever, just as in Russia people may suffer from pulicious fever. The rainy season kills many of the carrapatos, and they also fall a prey to the birds; and the cirlema, in particular, is never shot by the natives, because they know the value of its services in thinning the ranks of the multitudinous blood sucking Ixodes.

Another insect torment of Brazil is the jigger, or Pulex irritans. Pulex subintrans, Pulex minimus, pulex Penetrans. These interesting creatures make their home chiefly in the human foot, and hence are known to the Brazilians as bichos do pe (foot beasts). Mr. H. C. Dent had five of these unwelcome guests from January to June, and they took up their abode in the following localities: The first on the right big toe, second on the right heel, third on the left heel and two under the sole of the left foot. He had to cut them out.

Still worse are the verne, which attack indifferently cattle and human beings. With animals they appear to raise a large, hard lump, so that they probably reside in the skin, after the fashion of the ox warble. Sir Richard Burton says that stories are current of negroes losing their lives from the berno. The grub is deposited in the nose and other parts of the body, and if squeezed to death instead of extracted, it festers and produces serious consequences. Children three months old may suffer from a visitation of the berno. Some of the natives, in the case of adults, apply a burning stick to the wound in order to destroy the worm. Mercurial ointment is also used. Mr. Dent's dog was one mass of sores from the bernos and bichos de pe, and it was pitiable to see him, when running about, turn round almost every minute and, with a pitiful whine, bite his wounds until they were raw. Such are some of the pleasures of the insect world of Brazil.—New York Star.

Destroyed by Bad Boys.

No one but a builder can realize what annoyance and loss he is compelled to endure from the depredations of mischievous boys. No sooner is the foundation for a building laid than the trouble begins. When the workmen leave the place then the boys take possession. They begin by throwing stones, sticks and everything they can get hold of into the mortar beds, sometimes entirely ruining them by shoveling in all the surplus sand and refuse that are left near the mortar vat. They break and otherwise destroy the finely finished bricks that are used in the fronts of residences, break up slate, carry away laths and do all sorts of devilish things.

When the house is nearly completed it is then the mischievous boy does his worst acts of vandalism. When the plastering is fresh on the walls it is his delight to take a stick and scratch and mar the fresh plaster as much as possible. Nothing pleases these boys more than to make rude figures and scratch names and initials in deep lines on the smooth surface of the freshly plastered walls. The loss to builders in St. Louis every year by the depredations of young hoodlums is simply inestimable. It is almost impossible to find out the guilty parties, and the builder has to bear his losses and annoyances with as good grace as possible.—William Cochran in Globe-Democrat.

Different Kinds of Courage.

Illustrative of the different kinds of courage observable in different races, Lord Wolseley tells us that at the storming of Lucknow our troops found themselves in presence of a gate house, from the upper stories of which a severe fire was kept up on them. The only access to the upper stories was by some very narrow winding staircases, hardly admitting one man at a time. The English soldiers shrank for a moment from what seemed certain death. But the Sikhs rushed in, went up the staircases without a moment's hesitation, and in five minutes had thrown every rebel out of the windows. Yet the Sikhs would not have stood up man to man against English infantry. There is also the courage peculiar to certain individuals and certain races which arises from contempt for death and the belief that it only leads to a better and happier life. This was Gordon's courage. This was the courage of the Ironsides. And this is the courage of the Turks.—London Standard.

—"My husband is a fore-handed man," boasted a woman to a neighbor. "All monkeys are four-handed," the latter replied.—West Shore.

—"Going camping out this year?" "No. I camped out last year." "Why don't you camp out this year?" "I just told you. I camped out last year."—Lowell Citizen.

From Top to Bottom.

A representative American thinker lately said to me, that, contrasting the operation of Anglo-Saxon institutions in England with those in America, the most important result, in his opinion, with which we may credit ourselves on this continent is the facility of individual movement from the bottom to the top of the social scale. This is a broad, patent fact, which underlies and largely causes that hopeful energy which permeates even the lower strata of society in America, and forms a striking contrast to the social inertia and consequent mental inactivity of the lower classes of England.

I think, however, that we are bound to qualify our satisfaction on this point by the equally manifest fact that the facility of descent from the top to the bottom of the same social scale is infinitely greater in America than in England. Taking our society as a whole, there is comparatively little conservation of force and culture along family lines. The weakening influences of wealth and high social position on the young have no adequate corrective. The ruling names in the society or politics of one generation seldom repeat themselves in the next. Each generation has to hew its best class out of rough material taken from beneath. Now, success in life which fails to transmit as an inheritance force or culture or superiority of some kind has failed in that point which makes success most of all desirable. Society itself is an immense loser where the results of success end with the individual. It is a national calamity when the grand advantages given by wealth for attaining personal excellence are thrown away.—George R. Parkin in The Century.

The Swell of Paris.

The swell in Paris does not need a title, though his blood must not be too recently mixed up with trade. He must, above all other things, possess an agreeable and taking manner, sharpened by wit and cleverness. The French laugh at the solemnity and stupidity of Englishmen of high social pretensions, and fail to understand how any man can succeed in society or in club life whose main object seems to be to render himself as disagreeable as possible to the people whom he meets. The popularity of the Parisian viver depends almost entirely upon his jollity of manner and brilliancy of talk. He invariably has some pursuit. He is a capital swordsman, rides skillfully, writes or dabbles in some of the arts—but whatever he does is well done.

His life is one that would kill an Anglo-Saxon. He breakfasts at 2 in the afternoon, dines at 8 and sups at 2 in the morning. The one pursuit in life which engages all of his energies is the chase for the favor of the woman who happens to have Paris by the ears for the moment, and he invariably runs several establishments, devoting a portion of his time with punctilious politeness to his wife and children. He plays bezique and baccarat with a nerve that would make a Mississippi gambler blush, and looks 60 years old before he has passed his 35th year.—Blakely Hall's Letter.

In a Human Hair Market.

There is a human hair market at Morlans, in the department of the Lower Pyrenees. It is little known, except perhaps in Paris, where it has a high reputation. The market is held every other Friday. Hundreds of trafficking hair dressers throng to the little place from far and near to buy up the hair of the young peasant girls. The dealers wander up and down the long narrow street of the town, each with a huge pair of bright shears hanging from a black leather strap around his waist, while the young girls who wish to part with their hair stand about in the doorways, usually in couples.

The transaction is carried on in the best room of the house. The hair is let down, the tresses combed out and the dealer names the price. This varies from three to twenty francs. If a bargain is struck the dealer lays the money in the open palm of the seller, applies his shears, and in a minute the long tresses fall on the floor. The purchaser rolls up the tresses, places them in paper and thrusts them into his pocket. Of course a maiden can rarely see her fallen tresses disappear into the dealer's pocket without crying. But she consoles herself with the thought that it will grow again and by looking at the money in her hand.—Emile Nouveau in Philadelphia Times.

The Tailless Manx Cat.

These tailless cats, by the way, merit a paragraph by themselves. The Listener is not aware whether they raise a special breed of these creatures in Vermont, but would not be surprised if they did. Vermont has a way of improving upon whatever animals she imports from abroad, and getting up superior breeds of everything, from human beings down through Morgan horses, Holstein cattle, merino sheep and shepherd dogs to (no doubt) tailless cats. The tailless cat is supposed to have originated in the Isle of Man, but if The Listener is not mistaken, he has also heard them called Cornish cats. The two individuals just referred to are in color something between a tortoise shell and a mulatto. One has a sort of rudimentary stump tail, like a rabbit's, and the other has not so much as the vestige of a tail. Both have a marked resemblance in the hinder parts to the rabbit, and when they run it is with a series of bounds like a rabbit. One would say that the Manx cat and the rabbit were at least distantly related. They are queer birds, take them altogether.—Boston Transcript "Listener."

Time for Bath Takes.

How long does it take to use the morning "tub?" Mr. Chadwick says twenty minutes, which is surely an excessive estimate. But for those who want to save time over the operation, here is the latest hint of sanitary science: "A French colonel ascertained that he could wash his men with tepid water for a centime, or one-tenth of a penny per head, soap included. The man undresses, steps into a tray of tepid water, soaps himself, when a jet from a two handed pump plays upon him tepid water, and he dries and dresses himself in five minutes, against twenty minutes in the bath, and with five gallons of water against some seventy in the usual bath."—Pall Mall Gazette.

—Terra alba, or white earth, is used exclusively for adulterating candies, yet no less than 1,000 tons of this substance were recently imported through New York. Lozenges made entirely of this earth are dipped in sirups flavored with peppermint and other essences, and then sold as genuine sugar lozenges. When it is known that terra alba is a mineral insoluble by the gastric juices, the extent of the evil of this adulteration may be understood. It means grave danger of incurable disease to thousands of young children.

TIPPLES OF OUR FATHERS.

Toddy, Grog and Other Libations of Early New Englanders—No Side Doors.

Those who enjoy the rum punch, gin fizz, or "sec" of today may be interested to know the manner in which our New England grandfathers indulged in the "cup that cheers" seventy or eighty years ago. In those days the Prohibitory party and other temperance organizations were unknown, even the famous Washingtonian movement being hardly dreamed of at that time. Nearly all persons—at least of the male sex—were in the habit of using spirituous liquors whenever their taste or inclination so suggested.

The favorite alcoholic drink of this part of the country was New England rum, which has been a favorite tipple from a very early period in our history. Perhaps the earliest record is when Governor Endicott, of Massachusetts, was charged five shillings for a quantity at an old tavern in Lynn in 1650. This rum was also the basis of several other popular beverages. Its sale reached a comparatively great magnitude, principally in the forty or fifty years that followed the American revolution. It was nearly all distilled in this section of the country and in towns in close proximity to Boston, hence the name of New England was affixed to the intoxicant.

A hundred years ago there were sixty distilleries in full working order in New England, the bulk of the product being from Salem, Medford and Newport, R. I. The "old Medford" of today originally gained its distinction from the town where it was made, and was not considered as good as that of Salem, which was especially noted for its good quality, and that town turned out a vast quantity also, being at the head of the list in regard to number and capacity of distilleries. Boston, too, had a small share in the fame of producing this liquid, but the Hub dealers, like those of to-day, were not distillers, but usually jobbers, who dealt in the suburban goods.

In those days it was not necessary for a man to enter any "little side door," nor was he ashamed to tell his wife that he was intoxicated and she must take care of him. Neither did he have to give a wink to the seller, nor did he ever call for Schiedam Schnapps, brandy cocktail, plum juice or even our every day lager, for those drinks were unheard of then. The right of tin pails and jugs filled with liquor was not at all uncommon on our streets. Cordials made from snakeroot and anise seed were sold largely, often peddled about the streets the same as lemonade venders ply their trade nowadays on the Boston streets.

The doctors of the old school were more liberal in prescribing liquor for persons in delicate health than at the present time, owing to the fact that there was virtually no objection to its use. The cordials of anise seed, etc., were mostly gotten up at Medford, Salem and Lynn.

There was another decoction known as "black strap," which was made of New England rum and molasses, mixed in proportion to suit the taste of the buyer. This was, of course, considerably cheaper than the straight article, and consequently was the favorite drink of those who could not afford anything better. Another drink was composed of rum and sugar, then known as "a horn," and rum dashed with hot water and called "toddy," often drunk by the well to do gentlemen on cold winter evenings along with the eating of apples, which was a favorite custom hereabouts.

A drink composed of rum and something else was called "grog." It originally meant rum diluted with water, but was more often with a cordial or something of that nature. The name of "grog" was derived in a singular way. It is said that once Admiral Vernon, in the British navy, and who was noted for his generous nature, was wont to deal out an allowance of this drink to his sailors. He wore what was called a "grogan" cloak in severe weather, and after a while the men jestingly designated him as "old grog," hence the name of the mixture.

Every event of more than passing notice called forth a goodly supply of liquor. One important occasion was on a day that somebody's pig was to be killed. Such an occasion required the services of three or four men, who took an afternoon to do the work, while the town took a half holiday. Such an important occasion as this would be an utter fizzle were not a large supply of rum on hand ready to use, and it sometimes cost the owner more than the pig was worth to furnish the drinks. Another occasion of note was election day, when every man drank for the good luck of his favorite candidate, and after the event was over, again drank on account of success or hoping for better luck next year.—Boston Globe.

Ornaments from Old Corks.

A cork, if cut into a cube or small brick, bears a close resemblance in miniature to many kinds of stone. When a number of these are combined they look like old specked and indented masonry. They abound in brown or brownish gray spots and little cavities. Therefore, if you take a number of such cork bricks and construct from them the model of a small house with care it will present a very pretty appearance. They are easily fastened together by passing wire or small rods through them or by gluing them together.

It often will be desirable to give the cork some other shape, or to round the corners. This can generally be effected with a sharp penknife and sand paper, but artists who make elaborate imitations of buildings in cork use a new keen file.—Charles G. Leland in St. Nicholas.

A Short and Tough Lot.

The lot of our criminal classes seems demonstrably to be a short one and a tough one. It has actually no ameliorations. "Out of 60,000 prisoners, more than one-half are between the ages of 17 and 30." It takes but three generations to use up a stock that runs to vice. The average life of vicious people is less than one-half that of people of virtue. A recent writer complains that science creates a code of morals that consists in health. Is that not precisely why we are so deeply indebted to science that it is enlarging and lengthening the span of life, and at the same time teaching us what valuable thing life can achieve?—Globe-Democrat.

A MOST VALUABLE AGENT.

H. ARMGARDT, M. D., 95 JACKSON STREET, BROOKLYN, N. Y., writes:

"Being familiar with the stimulating, healing and anodyne properties of ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTERS, I commend them as a most valuable agent in the class of diseases for which they are intended. The stimulating action when worn over the gastric region materially aids in restoring strength and energy to digestion, and the consequent building up of tissue and restoring tone to the general system."

SHAKEN OUT OF GEAR,

By malarial disease, the human machinery cannot half perform its office. Digestion, secretion, evacuation are disordered, the blood becomes watery, the nerves feeble, the countenance ghastly, sleep disturbed and appetite capricious. Terrible is this disease, fell its consequences. There is, however, a known antidote to the miasmatic poison, and a certain safeguard against it. In malarious regions of our South and West, in South America, Guatemala and on the Isthmus of Panama, as well as in transmarine countries where the scourge exists, this inimitable preventive and remedy, Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, has, during the last thirty-five years, been constantly widening the area of its usefulness, and demonstrating its sovereign value. Liver complaint, dyspepsia, constipation, kidney trouble, rheumatism and debility are all remedied by it.

It Was News to Him—"Why do you New Englanders invariable answer a question by asking another?" asked a visitor of a Maine man. "Do we?" replied the native, in a surprised tone.

P. HINKLE'S PATENT CENTRIFUGAL ROLLER QUARTZ MILL

THIS cut shows the New Hinkle Centrifugal Quartz Mill, with plates and slummer. This is the only mill made that needs no oil for the inside working parts, as it is thoroughly lubricated with water, supplied from a circular tank, which is connected to the roller spindles, slides and drips by rubber hose. By this means oil cannot interfere with perfect amalgamation. Other features of superiority are: Simplicity of construction; the free discharge of pulp; the wearing parts are easily replaced at a small cost. The small amount of power required to run the mill will recommend it to all practical mill men, as well as the small cost of erection and transportation of mill to the mine. A 5-foot mill weighs 9,000 lbs.; pulverizers 38 in. diam.; run, 80 to 90 rev. per minute, with a capacity of 20 tons per day. This size mill costs $1,500. With Silver Plates, Slummer and Ore Feeder, $1,800.

P. HINKLE'S PATENT ORE FEEDER.

Positive Feed and Ready Adjustment.

IN this Improved Ore Feeder the falling tappet of the mill causes a backward movement of the feeding-tray. As the ore comes from the hopper on to the tray, a transverse bar prevents the ore moving backward, and a small portion of the ore is thus forced off the front edge of the feeding-tray into the battery. The amount of movement of the feeding tray may be regulated, thus regulating the feed of ore. This feeder can be arranged for roller mill or stamps. It is strong and durable, and feeds wet or dry ore in regular quantities.

TRUE TO HIS WORD.

Good Advice That Was Followed and Recoiled on the Head of the Giver.

Giving advice is one thing, and feeling the effects of having it followed is quite another thing. Professor Julius Eichberg, the well known violinist, says that he once had as a pupil a promising little fellow of some 8 years, who would not study. As the boy was about to set out with his family for the country, where they were to pass the summer, Mr. Eichberg asked him what he should do there.

"Oh," said the boy, "I shall play and pick flowers and have a good time."

"Yes; but suppose you made up your mind to get up an hour earlier every morning to practice? You would still have time for sport, and in the fall you would be able to play those sonatas you admire."

The result of the conversation was that Otto flung himself upon the neck of his teacher, of whom he was very fond, and promised to do what was asked of him.

A few weeks later, as Mr. Eichberg was driving through the mountains with his family, he was one day delayed, so that the hotel where they were to pass the night was reached at a late hour of the night.

The accomodations were poor, and the night was warm, and it was near morning before the travelers fairly got to sleep, and it seemed to Mr. Eichberg that he scarcely closed his eyes before he was aroused by the doleful sound of a violin in a room overhead, where some one was at work upon an exercise with which the listener was only too familiar.

For an interminable hour he tossed about, hoping that the noise would cease; then he rose and dressed and hastened to the office of the hotel to protest.

"Yes, it is something of a nuisance," the clerk answered, coolly, "but we are used to it here. The boy has played every morning this summer, and it was in the bargain when they took the rooms that he should be allowed to do it."

It was evidently of no use to complain to the clerk, and Mr. Eichberg relieved his mind by declaring that he should at least like to see the player of the violin.

"Oh, you can see him if you want to," the clerk said. "He has just come downstairs. You will find him outside there."

Away hurried the guest, the more irritated by the way in which his remonstrance had been received, and before the door on the lawn stood a trim little lad with his face turned away.

"Are you the boy," demanded Mr. Eichberg, sternly, "that has been making such a noise on the violin for an hour?"

The boy turned and looked at him, at first with an expression of fright; then, with a cry of joyous recognition, little Otto flung himself impulsively into his teacher's arms.

"Oh, my dear Mr. Eichberg," he cried; "I am so glad to see you! I have got up and played every morning just as I promised!"—Youth's Companion.

Knights and Ladies.

The reports of the supreme secretary, supreme treasurer and supreme medical examiner showed the order to be in good physical and financial condition.

Completing Emperor Nero's Canal.

The Isthmus of Corinth canal is going ahead satisfactorily in the route mapped out about 1,800 years ago by the Emperor Nero. It will be about four miles long and nearly twenty-seven feet deep. It is expected that ships will be able to pass through it at the rate of six miles per hour. The soil is so shifty that it will be necessary to protect the banks with masonry for a distance of nearly two miles.—St. Louis Republic.

The Story of the Rose.

The name rose comes directly from the Latin, and through the Latin from the Greek. In its first form it is supposed to have been derived from the color red. In its different forms it has given its name to many lands. Syria or Suristan is thought to be derived from the name of a beautiful and delicate species of rose, the suri, which grows in that country. Gulistan comes from the Persian name, gul, rose, and Rhodes, the island made so famous by the valiant defense against the Turks by the Knights of St. John, means the land or the place of roses. The rose has popularly been supposed to be indigenous to oriental countries. "Born in the east, it has been diffused like the sunlight all over the world." Æsop told the gardener of his master Xanthus that "the earth is a stepmother to those plants incorporated into her soil, but a mother to those which are her own free product."

Where the wild rose flourishes, there all other roses will grow. And the wild rose, in spite of so much prating to the contrary, seems to be indigenous to all the world, in the temperate zones, except Australia and South America. These countries are among the youngest continents of our earth geologically and the Rosaceæ are the latest comers in time. It had not become rose time with them when man came. The Rosaceæ includes, besides roses, most of the hardy fruit trees and plants, the apple, peach, pear, plum, raspberry, strawberry, blackberry, as well as many ornamental shrubs.—Sophie B. Herrick in The Cosmopolitan.

Bravery of Benedict Arnold.

Now, as Burgoyne retreated to the British "great redoubt," leaving nearly all his cannon on the field, Gen. Ten Broeck threw 3,000 fresh New York militia into the American advance line.

Here the unrestrained ambition of Gen. Arnold showed itself in a series of daring achievements which touch the reader of history with admiration and pity. Refused a command in the morning by Gen. Gates, he could no longer keep in the rear. Mounted on a fine, brown horse, he led first a brigade at the right and then one at the left in impetuous charges on the British position.

"I'll soon put an end to it," he cried, and the soldiers followed him with enthusiasm. Riding up to Col. Latimer's Connecticut regiment, he accosted them:

"Ah! my old friends from New London and Norwich! Come on, boys; if the day is long enough we will have them all in hell before night!"

While charging over the rail breastworks on the British right Arnold received a wound in the same leg that had been struck at Quebec. As he fell under his horse, he shouted: "Go on, boys!"

They "went on," capturing the key of the English position and killing Col. Breymann. The spot is now known as Burgoyne's, or more properly Breymann's hill. The irony of fate gave Gates, in the rear, the laurels of victory, and destined Arnold, wounded, at the head of the American troops, to an infamous memory. Gates did not even mention Arnold in reporting the battle.—C. H. Crandall in American Magazine.

The Temples of Burmah.

Most Burmese temples, apart from any external differences of situation or surroundings, are a good deal alike. There are usually four gates, guarded by grotesquely painted giants or monsters twenty or thirty feet high, with staring eyes and open jaws. From each of these gates a steep stair of flat native bricks, roofed over with a bright red arcade of teak planking supported on gilded pillars, leads up to one of the four sides of the temple itself. The latter generally consists of a vast square platform smoothly paved with stone, along the sides of which are ranged numbers of small shrines and images of Buddha, while in the center towers a huge bell shaped pagoda, blazing with gold leaf from summit to base, and surmounted by a pointed open work cupola of gold and jewels.—David Ker in New York Times.

Worth More Than Gold.

A pair of bantam chickens were sold at the London Crystal palace for $500, which was almost exactly twice their weight in gold. This is believed to be the highest price ever paid for a single pair of fowls since the days of extravagant and luxurious Rome.—St. Louis Republic.

The Reason.

Juggler—Why is it that ladies call a bonnet they like "a duck of a bonnet?"

Muggler—I give it up.

Juggler—It is because when it is worn they feel that they are in the swim.—Chatter.

OLD LOVE SONGS.

Ah, love! dear love! what tender songs they sang—
Those poets to the women of their choice;
Yet none more tenderly than I to you
Had it pleased heaven to give me but the voice.

My heart stirs, but my lips are ever mute,
For all my common words have common ways;
And none are high enough that I should dare
Essay with them my lady's perfect praise.

Yet, when I hear these others sing I feel
Such passion as the poor gray weed well knows,
Condemned to grow in flowerless nullity
In gardens where there blooms full many a rose.
—C. A. Pratt.

Prosperity of the Maoris.

"New Zealand has more debt in proportion to its size and wealth than any other country in the world," said Father Wissel. "There was a great deal of faith in gold mining for a time, but the yellow ore failed to materialize in sufficient quantities to put the miners' business on a paying basis, and the mines were temporarily abandoned. The English have not given up hopes yet, and companies are beginning to take hold of the enterprise of hunting gold again. The Maoris, or natives, call their houses waoris. They raise potatoes and corn, dig gum or do anything for a living, and they are very intelligent people. The Maori people are better off almost than the whites, because they possess a lot of land that the whites do not. They have the king country, and their gardens, fruit farms and horse pastures are well taken care of. They are very fond of horses and keep lots of them. They buy vegetables, guns, coffee, tea and groceries in the towns. Their war dances are interesting, and at them they have all sorts of games. Sometimes they become warlike toward the whites and refuse to let them pass through the exclusive Maori country."—Globe-Democrat.

The Making of Fancy Candies.

In the big factories lozenges and mottoes are stamped in the sheet and then cut out separately with patent cutters. Wafer lozenges are more carefully prepared than the thick, round kind. The latter are fed into a machine like a job printing press, by the sheet, and come out round, hard confections. Wafers are cut by hand. Fruits are now crystallized to some extent by wholesalers in this country, but not as successfully as in France. Opinions differ on this matter. Some dealers declare that here the fault alone is in the quality of the fruit. Others assert that we have not acquired the French secret of preparing the syrups and getting them to penetrate to the heart of the fruit. The finish of fine candies is put on by wholesalers in the same way as in retail houses, where all work is performed by hand. The syrup used in the process of crystallization is used in the making of clear candies and stick goods.—Chicago Herald.

A Lack of Taste.

One of the most irritating of the recent idiocies of tourists is the fashion of leaving cards at the tombs of distinguished people. The bust of Longfellow in Westminster Abbey is constantly surrounded by these inappropriate bits of pasteboard, and the grave of "H. H." is said to be literally covered with the visiting cards left by tourists who climbed the lonely mountain near Colorado Springs to visit the last resting place of the poet and novelist. Nothing but an abundance of the most egregious vanity and absolute lack of taste could prompt an action so idiotic as the following of this absurd custom.—Boston Courier.

The Long Coach Whip Pennant.

Many people have wondered what is the significance of the long pennant carried at the main truck of all vessels of war in commission. When the Dutch Admiral Van Tromp hoisted a broom at the top of the mast of his vessel to indicate his intention to sweep the English from the sea, the English admiral hoisted a horse whip, indicating his intention to chastise the Dutchman. Hence the coach whip pennant was adapted as the distinctive insignia of a war vessel in commission for service.—New York Tribune.

Another Use for Photography.

The latest use to which the magnesium flash light has been put is the photography of the human eye. At the suggestion of Du Bois Reymond, a normal eye, after a quarter of an hour's rest in a darkened room, was photographed life size, the result being that the photograph showed the pupil of the eye dilated to its fullest extent. As these photographs permit of measurement, they cannot fail to be of great value to medical science.—Photographic News.

An Incentive to Industry.

While it is ordinarily the custom of carpenters, masons and painters to contract for their work by the day or by the job, there are occasional deviations from it. One expert carpenter in Philadelphia makes his contracts by the job, specifying that he shall receive a bonus if he finishes before a certain time. As he is a rapid workman he contrives to earn considerably more than he would if contracting in the customary way.—Chicago News.

DIMPLES MADE TO ORDER.

A Chicago "Doctor's" Method—A Frenchman's Process—A Bad Job.

The doctor, a pleasant faced young man, said: "I am a regularly graduated physician, and believe myself capable of performing any ordinary operation. Chicago needs a dimple maker and I want to be the man. There's money in it for me and beauty in it for the ladies. The process is practically painless and the after result as beautiful a dimple as the heart of man could desire to look upon or woman to possess. Dimple making is a regular business in New York and other eastern cities. I think I can introduce improvements into the art. I have been to Paris and have studied there under the great dimple makers, and think myself competent. The process is simple. Through an incision made in the skin I remove a small portion of the flesh sufficient to leave a cavity large enough for a dimple. The wound is dressed and nature is left to heal it. No, I don't care to go into particulars, because I do not want to be imitated. The charge will be from $25 to $50, and the time required about one week. The operation itself takes but a few minutes. Of course the healing of the wound is a matter of more or less time."

The first establishment of the business, if it can be so called, in America, was managed by a Frenchman named Le Compte, who introduced it. He had been a barber in his own country, and had learned dimple making as an adjunct to shaving, as the Italians learn how to use the lancet. He was not an expert, but he was shrewd. He knew that doctors of a certain class come cheap, so when he hired a first floor front in one of the old houses on Fourteenth street, New York, before the reorganization of that thoroughfare, he hired a young graduate to help him. This was in 1875.

Le Compte soon became the rage. He early achieved newspaper notoriety from the novelty of his calling, and this helped him. His process was not so simple or so free from pain as the present method. He applied a small hollow cone of silver to the cheek or chin of the would be dimpled. To the open small end of the cone was affixed a tube leading to an air pump. By exhausting the air from the cone the integument and flesh covered by the open flared end of it was forced up, filling the cone. A ligament was then tied around the base of the conical portion of flesh to prevent it sinking back to the level of the face. The cone was then removed and an opening made in the elevated particle of face, and enough of that flesh removed to cause the desired depression, when the ligament was removed. As none of the epidermis was removed, there was usually no difficulty experienced in causing the wound to heal with suppuration. To give the dimple its required shape, a solid cone was inserted in the depression and kept there until the wound had healed by means of a bandage. During this time it was presumed that the more or less fair patient was not at home to callers. Or, if seen, she had a bad toothache or the mumps, or any other complaint causing the muffling of the face.

Le Compte did quite a business at first, but it was soon discovered that his operations left either a scar or a permanent redness behind, which was more unpleasant than the lack of a dimple. He had imitators, of course, and some of them improved on his methods. It was not until local anæsthetics came into vogue that the business received a great impetus. With cocaine a new field was opened to dimple makers and the other improvers and benefactors of humanity. The process was then made practically painless, and establishments, usually as adjuncts to dental offices and manicure shops, were located in Boston and Philadelphia as well as New York.

It rested with a Yankee herb doctor named Swain to reach the pinnacle of the profession. Swain had been an itinerant medicine vender throughout New England, in which capacity he had pulled teeth and performed other minor surgical operations upon the natives of the districts through which he traveled. Becoming acquainted with one of Le Compte's assistants he soon learned all that the Frenchman knew, and he resolved to see whether American ways and newspaper ink would not improve on the methods of Europe. He chose the City of Brotherly Love as the field for his operations, and opened with the glare of brass and the fluttering of dodgers—"health and beauty" parlors, as he described his apartments on Market street. He chose as chief assistant a pretty young Quakeress with a natural dimple of surpassing beauty. She was exhibited as a specimen of his handicraft. He did not confine himself to dimples. He sold powders and rouges and lotions, and had certain infallible recipes for baldness and paleness and redness and all the blemishes, real and imaginary, with which the belles of the city thought themselves afflicted. He soon worked up a good trade, and at one time he is said to have kept two assistants busy dimple making, but an end came to his prosperity.

His method of making dimples was substantially the same as that now practiced. But familiarity breeds carelessness as well as contempt, and one day when the chin of a patrician Philadelphia belle was in the process of dimpling a rusty scalpel was inadvertently used with disastrous effect. In a few days the lower jaw of that beauty was far from heightening her attractiveness. Let a veil be drawn over the picture. Suffice it, her good looks were gone forever, and as she valued her appearance at $25,000 it was rather a serious matter. Swain was brought into court on a damage suit and mulcted for a moiety of that sum. It appeared in evidence that he gave a guarantee to each patient to make a dimple without disfigurement, and as in this case he had failed lamentably in both provisions of his bond, he was charged for the same. That ended his career as a beautifier of womankind.—Chicago Inter Ocean.

Machine Made Mortar.

An idea has been developed in Germany in the shape of the manufacture of mortar by machinery in large quantities to be delivered to contractors or individuals as required for use. About 2,000,000 barrels were disposed of in Berlin on this plan alone last year.—New York Star.

THE CAUSE OF LANGUOR.

Not to Be Confounded with True Fatigue. Cure and Prevention.

In ordinary states of health the strongest persons are apt to feel sensations or fits of languor which they call fatigue, and for which they can give no reasonable explanation either to themselves or to others. The weather largely influences this condition. A moist and warm atmosphere always increases the disposition to languor; a moderately cold and dry atmosphere always prevents it. The sense of relaxation and disposition to sleep must not be confounded with true fatigue, arising from hard or prolonged physical or mental work, but must be taken as simply due to a condition in which there is weariness without a sufficent reason for it.

When this condition is strongly present, it is marked by one particular sign, which is of itself characteristic: it comes on after repose. The affected person experiences it most on rising in the morning, and even after a good night's sleep is still oppressed by a sense of weariness, a feeling as if the day, with all its cares and anxieties, could not be passed through. The desire, almost irresistible, is to go to sleep again, a desire which, if gratified, increases the evil and makes the day heavier than it otherwise would be. That it is not real fatigue or exhaustion which causes the sense of languor now being described is clearly shown, not only by the fact that the feeling comes on after long repose, but that it is dispersed in the day, after it has been present in the morning, by the exercise and duties of the day. I have no doubt that it is caused by the accumulation in the body of some diffusible and light chemical substance, which acts after the manner of an intoxicant and is a true intoxicant to the nervous system. The probable physiology of the condition is plain, but what is to be the cure, and, above all, what is to be the prevention?

The cure is exercise and the wearing of clothing which will give free liberation to the exhalations of the skin. Every one who is affected with the sense of languor is soon conversant with the knowledge that if he resolves to throw off the load which oppresses him and takes a short, sharp walk or other good and wholesome exercise, he is always relieved, and many find this mode of cure so certain that they invariably follow it. Others, and I fear the majority, are so oppressed that they feel as if they could not bring themselves to the effort of throwing off the sense of weariness by resorting to anything like active motion. When the oppression is the strongest and exertion is most demanded, they try to balance betwixt the two modes of treatment, the sharp exertion and the seductive sleep. They give way to the sleep; the giving way becomes a habit; in a very short time the habit lapses into a confirmed method, and with the habit structural changes in vital organs of the body are soon set up, and add rapidly to the evil. The body becomes obese, the liver becomes inactive, the mind becomes dull, and a short life is, of necessity, determined.

The treatment of languor in the healthy consists, then, in taking exercise in due, but in moderate amount. To go in for desperate exercise, as some do, is to frustrate, not to assist, cure; for desperate exercise produces actual fatigue, which nothing except rest will cure, and then the weariness from actual work and the weariness from underwork get confused the one with the other, and all goes wrong. Rightly conducted, the cure is exercise, and the prevention is continued exercise carried out daily and regularly, whatever the temptation may be to give it up. Second to this is light and porous clothing, as I have many years taught. Whatever holds or takes up the fluid exhalations from the skin is not clothing fit to wear. Whatever cannot be easily breathed through is not clothing that is fit to wear.

No kind of clothing for the human body is so good as that which admits freely into and through its meshes the most perfect purifier and the most perfect non-conductor and healthy equalizer of temperature known — atmospheric air. Patients sometimes come to me literally borne down with the weight of their own clothing. They are coated with three or four layers of heavy and close materials. These materials are saturated with the moisture from the skin, are unduly heavy, are always damp, if taken off for a short time leave excessive cold, and if kept on too long induce oppressive heat; all round mischiefs of sure and certain development. A fairly healthy person who takes reasonable out door exercise daily, and who clothes himself lightly in porous material, will feel no weariness except that which comes naturally from healthy fatigue.—Dr. Richardson in The Asclepiad.

The Making of Cheap Books.

The cheap libraries have given amusement and instruction to thousands, but it is the opinion of the shrewdest men in the trade that they have injured book publishing. After all we are creatures of habit, and we have become accustomed to buying a novel for 20 or 25 cents. People are unwilling to pay 75 cents or a dollar now. At 20 or 25 cents, unless an enormous number of copies are sold, there is not much money for the author, nor, in fact, for any one. Out of the cheap reprint has grown the summer novel, cheaply but tastefully got up, and intended to pass away an idle hour. Some of the hundreds which are published are good, but the majority are beneath contempt. They make one simply weary while reading them, and yet the publication goes on. "Of the making of books there is no end."—Current Literature.

Waterproofing Process for Leather.

It will not be long before the shoemaker can add to his stock of raw materials a waterproof leather. The process, which has been recently perfected, is not only of service on the uncut leather, but can be used in rendering worthless leather valuable by plumping, stiffening and waterproofing it for insoles, counters, box toes, etc. Every part of a boot or shoe can be "waterproofed" either before or after it is finished.—Chicago News.

Wrapping fruit trees with cloth to keep them from being injured by sunburn and insects has proved disastrous to the trees in Shasta county, Cal.

Mexico's Dancing Nutmeg.

A gentleman recently returned from Mexico brought with him a curious object, which would be of great interest to lovers of natural history. He produced a segment of a Mexican nut, which was not unlike a nutmeg in texture, and placed it in the palm of his hand, closing his fingers closely around it.

After a moment's imprisonment the hand was opened and the little section of the nut rested on its rounded side, upon which it rocked convulsively. The hand was closed again for a few seconds. When it was opened again the mysterious piece of wood appeared full of animation and leaped as gayly as a toad. Then the gentleman explained the principle and cause of the movements.

"There is," said he, "a small worm in that nut, which is dormant until its temperature is raised to that of the human body—about 98 degs. When this is reached the little insect, which is not more than a sixteenth of an inch in length, is revived from its torpid state and causes the spasmodic motion. The nut is indigenous to Mexico, and is usually inhabited by the worm from the early part of August until the arrival of the following summer. It can be revived for nine months in a cold climate.—Philadelphia Bulletin.

Precautions for Solitary Tourists.

Solitary touring is open to the objection that if you fall sick, meet with an accident, or happen to be killed, you may be a nuisance to other people, and especially in the latter case expose your friends at home to some needlessly abrupt information. To avoid this I have been used to carry, not merely my name and address in my pocketbook, but clear instructions as to what should be done with the "body" in case of death. It is well to mention the name of some firm of, say, solicitors, to whom the needed information should first be sent, and who would be prepared to defray any expense incurred in paying the physician, post or undertaker.

Once I suddenly showed these instructions (given plainly in the fly leaf of my diary) to a chance (clerical) companion, and he was foolish enough to fail in perceiving the considerate common sense I thereby showed and to look on me as one who treated grave matters with too light a hand. I was to him a profane person, though the little entry in my almanac was written in the simplest words.—Cornhill Magazine.

Physical and Moral Welfare.

Huxley, in a recent article of peculiar value in The Nineteenth Century, calls attention to the "steadily increasing devotion which has been and is directed to measures for promoting physical and moral welfare among the poorer classes. The endeavor to improve the condition under which our industrial population live; to amend the drainage of densely populated streets; to provide baths, wash houses and gymnasia; to facilitate habits of thrift; to furnish some provision for instruction and amusement in public libraries and the like, is not only desirable from a philanthropic point of view, but an essential condition of safe industrial development. It is by such means alone that we can hope to check the constant gravitation of industrial society toward misery." But Mr. Huxley does not point out the fact that while a good deal of this sort of work went on in Rome, without saving Rome from moral degeneration, it is of exceeding value as an adjunct of moral effort of a direct sort in other directions.—Globe-Democrat.

Paper Fabric for Building.

The use of paper fabric for building purposes—by the term paper being meant broadly a flexible sheet made of vegetable or other fiber, which has been reduced to a pulp, and then pressed out and spread and dried—is now advocated by some builders on the following grounds: First, continuity of surface—that is, it can be made in rolls of almost any width and length, is flexible, or by gluing several layers together may be made stiff, and will stop the passages of air because there are no joints; second, it has no grain like wood, and will not split; third, it is not affected by change of temperature, and thus has an advantage over sheet metal as roofing material; fourth, whereas in its natural condition it is affected by moisture, it may be rendered waterproof by saturating with asphalt, or by a variety of other methods; fifth, it is non-resonant and well fitted to prevent the passage of sound; sixth, it is a non-conductor of heat, and can also be made of incombustible material, like asbestos, or rendered fire resisting by chemical treatment.—New York Sun.

The Quiet Flow of Tears.

The discharge of tears from the lachrymal gland is not occasional and accidental, as is commonly supposed, but continuous. It goes on both day and night—though less abundantly at night—through the "conduits," and spreads equally over the surface of the pupil, in virtue of the incessant movement of the lids. After serving its purpose the flow is carried away by two little drains situated in that corner of each eye nearest the nose—into which they run—and called the "lachrymal points." The usefulness of this quiet flow of tears, to both men and beasts, is manifest. There is such an immense quantity of fine dust floating in the air and constantly getting in the eyes, that, but for it, they would soon become choked. Very little is requisite to keep the ball free, and when some obnoxious substance—smoke, an insect or the like, that affects the nerves—does make its way in, an increased flow is poured out to sweep it away.—Herald of Health.

Commentary on Physical Condition.

Chewing gum has come to be considered the popular cure for dyspepsia, at least by those young dames who have reason to imagine that they suffer from the ill effects of midnight suppers and too long a series of dinner parties. In Newport last summer peppermint drops were introduced at a certain point in the meal and partaken of by everyone, and at an entertainment which was given recently, when ice cream was served, Jamaica ginger was passed, and a few drops recommended to counteract the effect of the ice. When the plates were changed for the last time at a gentleman's dinner given a few nights ago each one held a ticket for a Turkish bath, a sad commentary on the condition that the guests must have been in.—New York Press.

THE MODERN STONE AGE.

Many Implements Made of This Material Still Used in Virginia.

All over our country we find many interesting relics of the Indians. Stone spearheads, arrowheads, hammers, chisels, knives, scrapers, etc., together with pottery, some of burned or baked clay, some cut from soft stone, as slate, steatite, etc. Similar remnants of the so-called stone age of mankind are found in nearly every portion of the globe, and, besides their interest as curious survivals of a bygone time, they aid us toward a discovery of the prehistoric man. It is hardly of less interest, or of less historic or scientific value, to note how the stone age still survives among us to no little extent.

Here in Virginia, for instance, many people still scald their slaughtered hogs in hogsheads or barrels, as our barbarian progenitors boiled their meat in skins, by heating stones and putting them into the water until it is hot enough for the purpose. The stones ordinarily used in this way are roundish, hard, and very heavy black or brown modules, sometimes called "negro heads," or iron stones, although they are compressed lava, upheaved in strata through crevices in the rock crust of the earth at remote periods of geological time.

We sometimes encounter stones that are hollowed out in the center, often to a socket, and these not infrequently are treasured by their finders as an ancient Indian stone for mashing or grinding corn, with the aid of a stone pestle; yet they are nothing more nor less, for the most part, than discarded stones once used by our rural brethren for their gates to swing upon—many gates in all parts of the commonwealth being still thus pivoted.

Many a housewife in remote country regions still has her stone weights, more or less rough, but honest; wherever the old Kentucky rifle lingers there is likely to be found still a set of soapstone bullet molds; our log cabins yet have rough stone and clay chimneys, where they are not of mud and sticks; in many a humble household a thin rock, not always smooth, is the utensil for baking corn bread; and the stone "mash trap" is familiar to all our country boys. The stone pipe, believed by many to have gone out with the Indian, is made and used today by many colored folks and by no few white folks. Whenever soapstone, or steatite, is found, not only the stone pipe, but many other articles supposed to be archaic, are still manufactured and put to service by the ingenious and thrifty. In such localities stone pans, stone troughs for children, etc., are still common. Some day they will be dug up and attributed to the Indians, or even to their predecessors. A little inquiry and investigation would show much more of the stone age still here than we have adverted to.

It is not rare to see stone sinkers in use for lines and nets in fishing; the flint is not yet superseded wholly by the match; there are clocks in the land yet run by stone weights; stone hovels, with dirt roofs, are not unknown in our mountains; the colored ruffian, and sometimes the white one, carries a stone in a stocking, along with his razor, when on the warpath; many a cider press and tobacco press are still made effective by stones swung at the end of their lever; and our small boys are all in their stone age whenever they can give their natures full and free play.

We are not so far off from the stone age man as some imagine; many of the implements and relics supposed to be prehistoric, and doubtless so in many cases, have their modern duplicates, and in some instances are all in use among us.—Cor. Petersburg Index-Appeal.

The Multitude of Millionaires.

Since the civil war millionaires (the word means not those having a million, but those reckoning their wealth by millions) have steadily multiplied. Many men who were content to earn a decent livelihood, who had never dreamed of aught beyond a modest competence when Sumter was fired on, now count their income by hundreds of thousands. To be a millionaire is to be conspicuous ordinarily, but in New York there are millionaires wholly obscure. They are not known to be rich outside of their narrow social circle, and will not be until their obituary in the daily newspapers shall have mentioned the fact. There are so many and so excellent opportunities here for making money, to him who has pecuniary perception, that millionaires seem to spring up between showers. You hear of a man grown very wealthy whom you remember a short time before as dependent on a salary. You are not sure that the acquaintance you avoid, because he habitually wishes to borrow, may not soon be one of the monetary magnates of Fifth avenue.—Paul R. Cleveland in The Cosmopolitan.

Mammoth Japanese Crabs.

The greatest marine curiosity of Enoshima waters is the giant crab that trundles along a body as large as a turtle's, and sweeps out claws that measure ten feet from tip to tip. Formerly the fishermen threw these creatures back into the sea when they found their nets tangled up with them, but of recent years they clean the shells and sell them for foreign museums. The giant crabs are said to promenade the beach at night, and one version gives them phosphorescent eyes. If imagination cannot supply a picture of those crabs on the beach, it is all detailed in "Allan Quatermain." Rider Haggard, in his careful owning up to where he found the original of the remarkable things in that book, owns to having read somewhere about these horrible crabs, and so borrowed them to put in the canyon into which his canoe load of heroes emerged after their underground baptism of fire. These crabs and the six foot cucumber are the few things in nature in Japan that are enlarged.—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

Finding a "Lost Dog."

Every day you see one or more "lost dog" advertisements in the newspapers. If owners did not love their dogs they wouldn't go to the expense of advertising for them. Most of these lost dogs have been stolen. The thief sells them to somebody else. Then his "pal" goes to the rightful owner and obtains a handsome reward for recovering the animal.—Chicago Times.

FRIDAY NOVEMBER 14 1890

County Official Paper.

In Pennsylvania bitter personal quarrels determined the result of the election. Party success, protection to American industry, the force bill, the rulings of Speaker Reed—none of these, nor all of them, had so much to do with the election as the rancorous fight between the adherents and opponents of Senator Quay. Quay has the reputation of being a machine politician, a "boss" and the desire to down bosses is quite as strong in Pennsylvania as it is in California. It is very evident that mere party ties are no better than rotten wythes to bind the great body of voters, and men who aspire to be party leaders would do well to realize that it is only by wise and honest legislation and impartial execution of the laws that political power is to be retained. The men who would vote for a yellow dog if his name was on the party ticket are now about as scarse as the body servants of Washington.

The utter uselessness and stupidity of vile abuse of candidates were clearly shown in the result of our State election All the slander thrown at Mr. Markham but helped to swell his majority, and Mr. Pond is now more respected and trusted than before he was a candidate for Governor. Blackguardism in politics we still have in plenty, but decency is in a large majority and controls elections. No good American citizen will proclaim to the world the glaring and monstrous lie that men who aspire to high political office are devoid of honor and conscience and instead of being in office ought to be in jail. Yet this is what is done in all our political battles. Such work is being left to the camp followers, to Pistol, Nym and Bardolph of each of the great political armies. The wretches who abuse the candidate would lick the feet of the man in office.

The Democratic party was defeated and driven from power under the free trade leadership of Cleveland. Now the Republican party is overwhelmed under ultra protection leadership. Evidently the people know better what they want than politicians do. The trouble with both parties is that they have too many politicians and not enough statesmen. Political organizations have in great measure ceased to be parties and are now only factions. Principles are little regarded in political battles, and the struggle is merely to determine what men shall be able to grab the offices. The result of the election in the east shows that the great body of voters have a good understanding of the present condition of parties and are determined to do their own political thinking. There is but one man now prominent in politics who was able to predict what the result of the election would be. That man is James G. Blaine.

Sponging a Tiger.

When Pezon, the lion tamer, was at Moscow with his menagerie, he had occasion to employ a moujik, a fine specimen of a Cossack, to clean out the cages of the wild beasts. The Cossack did not understand a word of French, and the terms of the contract were settled in dumb show. By way of instructing him in his new duties, Pezon went through a sort of pantomime with the broom, sponge and water bucket. The moujik watched him closely and appeared fully to understand the details of the lesson given. Next morning, armed with a broom, a bucket and a sponge, he opened the first cage he came to and quietly stepped in, as he had seen his master step on the previous day into two cages of harmless brutes, but this one happened to be a splendid but untamed tiger, that lay stretched on the floor fast asleep. At the noise made by opening and closing the door the creature raised its head and turned its green eyes full on the man, who, all unconscious of his danger, stood in the corner dipping his big sponge into the bucket.

At that moment Pezon came out of his caravan and was struck dumb by the terrible sight that met his gaze. What could he do to warn the man of his danger? A sound, a movement on his part might enrage the great beast and hasten its attack on the defenseless Cossack. So Pezon stood awaiting developments, ready to rush to the scene when the crisis came. The moujik, sponge in hand, coolly approached the tiger and made ready to rub him down with the stolidity of a military bootblack polishing his captain's boots. The sudden application of cold water to his hide evidently produced a very agreeable effect on the tiger, for it began to purr, stretched out its paws, rolled over on its back and complacently offered every part of its body to the vigorous treatment of the moujik.

All the while Pezon stood there with his eyes wide open and as if nailed to the spot. When he had finished his job the Cossack left the cage as quietly as he had entered it, and it required the most energetic and expressive gestures on the part of the lion tamer to prevent his repeating the experiment on a second wild beast.—London Times.

A Reader at Dayton.

In answer to "A Reader" at Dayton, Nevada: The altidude of Independence is very close to 3,800 feet above sea level. The weather during the winter months is usually very pleasant, bright sunshine prevailing for weeks together. The thermometer rarely falls below 24 degrees Fahrenreit, being eight degrees below the melting point of ice. Last winter about half an inch of snow fell on Christmas eve, and his was all for the season.

Reverend H. J. Windsor will preach at Lone Pine at 11 a. m.; Georges Creek 2:30 Independence at 7:00 o'clock in evening. Sunday School at Independence and Lone Pine at 11 o'clock a. m.

Mr. W. Richards, late station agent at Mound House, has superseded C. Nolan as agent at Independence.

Judge Arick has been re-elected Superior Judge in Kern County. Henry Brogwardt is reported to be elected Sheriff.

Mr. J. N. Evans of Reno arrived at Independence at the end of last week. He is looking after his cattle in Owens Valley.

M. J. Cody has been elected Sheriff of Mono County. He will be lonesome in the Court House as he is the only Democrat elected in Mono.

Owners of stock running at large will do well to read the notice given by M. C. and A. C. Stevens. Disregard of the notice will lead to trouble and expense.

The American party disappeared almost entirely in the election all over the state. It is now like the Irish girl's definition of "nothing"—a footless stocking without any leg.

A convention of fruit growers will be held at Santa Cruz on the 18th to 21st inclusive of this month. This will be the fourteenth session. Matters of great interest to all fruit growers are discussed at these meetings.

A. R. Conklin Esq., Mrs. Conklin and their two daughters have gone to San Francisco intending to make a lengthy stay. Mr. Conklin, as Grand Master of Masons, intends making visits to Lodges in various parts of the state.

Messrs. Conn and Trudo were at Independence some days this week. They have applied for patents for over 1200 acres of land in Saline Valley. 160 acres of this is a pre-emption and the remainder is borax land.

General R. P. Keating of Virginia City came down last Monday to Keeler and went on next day to Darwin. He is one of the best known mine Superintendents of the Comstock and is examining mines about Darwin.

The Kern County Gazette says that of 230 Democratic ballots in a Bakersfield precinct all were scratched but two. The yellow dog is dead, sure, and Democrats have learned to scratch as viciously as Republicans.

Parties coming into Owens valley by rail frequently bring along a few apples to eat by the way. Many of these apples are affected by codlin moth. There is great danger that in this way the pest may be introduced here. It will inflict great damage and loss if it ever gets started in the valley.

Mr. Hyman Fredrick of Reno intends making a trip down along the line of the C. & C. road next week or the week after. He will show such a stock of watches and jewelry as will give every one pleasure to look at. He may not come any farther south than Candelaira on this occasion.

The members of the Independence Board of Election filed a written statement to the effect that in counting the ballots they had not given J. B Stewart credit for a single Republican vote cast for him for Supervisor. All the votes credited to him were eighteen where his opponent had been scratched and his name inserted.

Mr. J. J. Gunn left town at the beginning of the week for his mining camp near Modock. Mrs. Gunn went with him. The Minnietta mines are looking well, and ore will be taken out from the time work begins. There was plenty in sight when work was stopped at the time warm weather set in.

Mr. W. Walker of Olancha has been in very poor health for several months past. Doctor Woodin, O. I. Mairs and J. C. Irwin went down from Independence at the beginning of the week on a friendly visit. On their return they reported him some better. Pap has many friends here and elsewhere who hope he may still be spared for many years.

An incorporation called the Pacific Coast Borax Company has been formed and articles of incorporation filed in the office of the County Clerk at Independence. The capital stock is fixed at $1,500,000. There are five directors; F. M. Smith, C. M. Plumb and A. H. Clough of Oakland, and William Thomas and F. B. Prichard of San Francisco. The Company propose to do much other business beside borax and borax lands.

Discharged From Custody.

Manuel Leon was brought into Court last Saturday and examined upon a charge of pointing a pistol at R. C. Spear at Lone Pine. Several witnesses testified that he had pointed the pistol at Mr. Spear, that he had been drunk and had several times fired his pistol upon the street. There were some informalities in the proceedings, however, and these with other facts that were learned, convinced the Justice of Peace that the man could not be convicted before a jury. It was deemed useless to put the county to the great expense of a trial, when an acquittal would have been the result under the circumstances and the man was discharged.

For Sale.

The ranch known as the "Rittgers place" near Lone Pine is offered for sale together with the the farming implements and stock. The ranch contains 320 acres of excellent land. The stock consists of thirty head of cattle and twelve brood mares. There is now sixty tons of hay on the place and feed enough to winter 200 head of stock. The winter pasture has been rented five years past at $300 a year. The soil is a rich loam and excellently adapted to vegetable raising. There is plenty of outside range, making it a good stock ranch. For further particulars address

To Explore Death Valley.

It is announced from Washington that an expedition is about to be made into Death Valley and three months spent in exploring that region under the auspices of the Biological Survey connected with the Agricultural Department. Ten celebrated scientists will compose the expedition, and a thorough survey will be made of this hitherto unknown country. Naturalist Vernon Bailey, who is now in Nevada, will go soon, and Professor Theodore Palmer of the Biological Survey will go in from the south and proceed north to join Bailey. Whatever is found of interest will be sent to the World's Fair. The difficulty of making such an exploration is not near so great as was formerly imagined. Parties from Independence have been in Death Valley several times this year. There is no trouble about finding plenty of good water. There are springs among the mountains that bound the valley and mining prospectors who know the country are familiar with most of them. Recently it is reported that one or more fine artesian wells have been bored in the valley. From Independence to Death Valley the distance is about 125 miles. The road is good, and the water and camping stations at convenient distances. For years past many men have been employed in the valley taking out borax.

Masonic Relic.

The following letter from Lord Dufferin to his friend, Lord Clanmorris, will be of interest to the Masonic fraternity: Lord Dufferin was Governor-General of Canada a few years ago. The letter is copied from the Masonic Record.

CLANDEBOYE, Sept. 3, 1883.

MY DEAR CLANMORRIS:—At last I found the mallett, which I take pleasure in sending to you. Its great merit is its genuineness. On that you may rely, for I dug it myself out of a temple tomb erected by King Montu Hoteb, of the 11th Dynasty, a personage who certainly flourished before Moses. The mallet was buried beneath the sand and ruins with a number of other articles of the same date. Its handle still shines with the sweat of the Egytian masons, and I have great pleasure of presenting it to your honorable Lodge.

Yours sincerely,
DUFFERIN.

The mallet is kept under a glass case in a lodge room at Aberdeen, Scotland.

Saving Expense.

Judge Hannah ordered the drawing of a Grand Jury on Monday and it was done accordingly. This is several weeks earlier than in former years, and the object of the Judge in doing so is to save the county expense, if possible. Had the meeting of the Grand Jury been delayed till the usual time and any indictments been returned, the cases could not be tried before Judge Hannah would go out of office, and as the District Attorney is to be his successor, the latter would be disqualified to try the cases; consequently a Judge from some other county would have to be brought here to try them and at much increase of expense. Now if any indictments should be returned the cases can be tried and disposed of by Judge Hannah.

An Instrument of Robbery.

The San Francisco Stock Board has been the most useful instrument found by the swindlers of our state to rob the many for the benefit of the few. The Mining and Scientific Press says; "Of the confiding poorer classes, none have escaped—all have been victimized. Everything in sight has been raked in by this essentially thievish method—the small bank deposit and the widow's mite; the laboring man's savings and the children's dimes; the savings of the sewing woman and the servant girl; the outside lot and the family homestead; all the small sums amassed through overwork and comforts denied, all have gone to over-enrich these plotters against justice and humanity. But in all this, the methods for robbing the masses to which resource has been had have not here differed much from those elsewhere employed, the results reached having been much the same. Everywhere it has been the same system of plundering the trustful poor—the many hurtfully impoverished, that the few might be made hurtfully rich. Turnsevil, through the bitter experience of its victims has come to be much abated. Thankful for this, let us hope that it will soon become wholly a thing of the past.

Reading Canyon.

There are excellent mining prospects in Reading Canyon. The place is in the Inyo Range about six miles south of Bishop Station on the C. & C. Road. There is a switch near the mouth of the canyon. Last Saturday A. R. Jones struck a ledge of fine ore, and so far there appears to be a big body of it. O. H. Hill, proprietor of the Valley View Hotel at Bishop, and other parties interested with him, have been operating in the canyon for several months past. They have worked a good deal of ore in an arastra, and the yield has been ninety dollars per ton. The ore contains much sulphurets and this causes heavy loss of gold, the tailings, by repeated assays, showing from forty to sixty dollars per ton. A few days ago Mr. Hill brought several car loads of ore down to the Maxim mill and is now having it worked there. Mr Hill says that even with the heavy loss in the tailings they have a good thing in their claim. There is much probability that a mill may be built near the mouth of Reading canyon. Water from the McNally ditch is offered free and also a tract of five acres for a yard and buildings.

Newton Booth, ex-Governor and Senator, has begun suit at Carson, Nevada to get a partition of the Illinois, Sand Mound, Nevada, White Pine and Blumington mines in Nye County, Nevada. D. A Bender of Carson has been appointed receiver to take charge of the mines, and will keep as large a force employed as before suit was begun. The mines have been big producers and are said to be very valuable.

ANOTHER DRUGGIST SPEAKS.

Manufacturers of The Great Sierra Kidney and Liver Cure:

March 24th, 1890.

GENTLEMEN:—I noticed a great increase in the sales of your remedy, and judge that, by the repeated calls for it that it gives entire and complete satisfaction to the parties using it. It is the best selling Kidney and Liver Cure that I handle in stock. Respectfully yours,

JOHN WM. SALTER,

2445 Mission Street, Cor. 21st, San Francisco, Cala.

Turn your back on borrowed trouble, and you will be better prepared to face the real.

ERUPTION OF THE SKIN CURED.

Ed. Venney, Brockville, Ontario, Canada, says:

"I have used BRANDRETH'S PILLS for the past fifteen years, and think them the best cathartic and anti-bilious remedy known. For some five years I suffered with an eruption of the skin that gave me great pain and annoyance. I tried different blood remedies, but, although gaining strength the itching was unrelieved. I finally concluded to take a thorough course of BRANDRETH'S PILLS. I took six each night for four nights, then five, four, three, two, lessening each time by one, and then for one month took one every night, with the happy result that now my skin is perfectly clear and has been so every since."

Much as a man admires the truth, he prefers to have it told about some other fellow.

A Cough, Cold or Sore Throat requires immediate attention, as neglect results in some incurable Lung Disease or Chronic Throat Trouble. "Brown's Bronchial Troches" will invariably give relief.

A man will tell a lie to get sympathy, and a women will tell a lie to give it.

Sulphur and brimstone are on the free list; so is salvation. Now take your choice.

All the year round, you may rely upon Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery to purify the blood and invigorate the system. It's not like the sarsaparillas, that are said to be good for the blood in March, April and May. The "Golden Medical Discovery" works equally well at all times, and in all cases of blood-taints, or humors, no matter what their name or nature.

It's the cheapest blood-purifier, sold through druggists, because you only pay for the good you get.

Your money is returned if it doesn't benefit or cure you.

Can you ask more?

"Golden Medical Discovery" contains no alcohol to inebriate, and no syrup or sugar to derange digestion.

It's a concentrated vegetable extract; put up in large bottles; pleasant to the taste, and equally good for adults or children.

The "Discovery" cures all Skin, Scalp and Scrofulous affections, as Eczema, Tetter, Salt-rheum, Fever-sores, White Swellings, Hip-joint disease and kindred ailments.

LIFE IN FAR AWAY TIBET.

Things in That Strange Land as Represented by the Latest Explorer.

"The people of Tibet have the funniest way of making tea you ever heard of," said Lieut. Rockhill, that far away country's most recent explorer. "To begin with, the tea they use comes from western China in the shape of bricks, which are pressed into such convenient shape for carrying overland. All sorts of teas are made into bricks for purposes of transportation across Asia, it being very well understood by connoisseurs in the herb that a sea trip spoils it. But the tea imported into Tibet is of very poor quality as a rule. There is in it as much weight of twigs as of leaves.

"Having pounded a portion of the brick tea in some sort of mortar, the Tibetan housewife puts it in a large copper vessel and there permits it to boil over a fire made from dry manure. The resulting solution she pours into a queer looking wooden churn through a coarse willow basket that serves as a strainer. To the liquid in the churn, before proceeding further, she adds a portion of butter and some salt. The mixture is then churned up in ordinary fashion, and, when it is thoroughly mixed, is poured into a teapot of bronze. From the teapot it is dispensed into the little cup shaped vessels which each Tibetan carries with him or her.

"The cup shaped vessel I refer to is usually of wood, sometimes lined with silver. Tibetans employ it not only as their sole drinking utensil, but also as a dish for solid food. What they consume mainly as a substantial diet is parched barley. When a gentleman of Tibet feels hungry he sits down and, taking from a leather pouch a portion of barley, he mixes a little water with it, and, stirring it up into a dough, eats it in that shape. Thus hunger is satisfied, and he goes on his way rejoicing. In what we call the pleasures of the table the Tibetan takes no stock whatever. There never was a typical Asiatic yet who cared anything about amusement in the ordinary sense of the word. He doesn't go to the theatre—there is no such institution in the land of the lamas. Nor does he indulge in any other rational enjoyment of civilization, though he does not scorn what might be called the primary vices.

"Tibet is a very cold country, but its inhabitants do not warm themselves by the consumption of fuel. When the weather is chilly they simply put on more clothes in proportion as the mercury might fall, if there was a thermometer to register the temperature by. Their garments consist mainly for each individual of a voluminous cloak, with sleeves and a high collar, under which a shirt is sometimes worn. Boots, with soles of raw hide and uppers of cloth and cotton, are made for them in China. For rainy days a circular cape of felt is provided.

"The gun used by a Tibetan has a long fork attached to it, which is stuck in the ground for use as a rest for the weapon. Naturally the deadly instrument is of primitive pattern, intended to be set off with a priming, and the native wears attached to his belt a number of little brass cones, each of them containing an exact load of gunpowder. Those people of the country who live on the great elevated plains or steppes dwell in black tents; but the villagers reside usually in two story stone houses, the lower story being given up to a stable for the cattle. Not all of Tibet, as is popularly supposed, is actually subject to China. The country is divided up, politically speaking, into many tribes, and not a few of these tribes are governed by chiefs who owe no allegiance to anybody—not even to the Chinese emperor."—Washington Star.

Church Singers' Salaries.

A woman with a good contralto voice will begin at an annual salary of $200, which, if she is successful, may rise to an average of $300. There are two churches in Philadelphia, I believe, which pay their contraltos $400; but this, in cities outside of Boston, which average about $200 higher, is unusual. And even a genuine alto—that rarest of things in these days—will command but from $300 to $400 per annum. The Hub, of course, does better than this, by adding $200; but even with this addition, none of these salaries appear precisely extravagant, or to admit of much luxury in living, and salaries are rarely increased. Should a rival church make an offer for a voice, if the first church is desirous of retaining it, the rival's price is overbid and the voice retained. But this is the only reason of which I have any knowledge for increasing salaries.—Ladies' Home Journal.

The Formation of the Ear.

The ear is worth studying from an anatomical point of view. Beginning with the outer fold or ridge, called the helix, which forms the outline, the ear is composed of thin cartillage and integument. The next prominent ridge is the antihelix, which some people have very largely developed, but in a well formed ear projects very little beyond the helix. The little knob that projects from the foot of the antihelix is called the antitragus, and the corresponding knob on the other side the tragus. The deep well in the center of the ear, the concha, so termed from its shell like form, plays the most important part in reflecting the vibrations into the inner ear; in fact, all these projections and depressions are of importance to our hearing and play their own parts in conveying the undulations of sound to the drum of the ear.—Pall Mall Gazette.

An Automatic Chess Board.

Some of the monasteries of Italy and France sent curious inventions to the Paris exposition. A certain monastery in Brittany, France, contributed a plain looking mahogany table, with an inlaid chess board on its surface. The inventor, or any one who desires, sets the places for a game and sits alone on one side of the board. He plays cautiously, and the opposite pieces move automatically, and quite frequently come out the victor, no odds how scientifically the player plays. There is no mechanism apparent beneath the table top, which seems to be a solid mahogany board.—Philadelphia Review.

—Your business—you can not neglect that! Call to mind the story of the rich English merchant to whom Elizabeth gave some commission of importance, and he demurred to undertake it, saying: "Please your majesty, if I obey your behests, what will become of these affairs of mine?" And his monarch answered: "Leave those things to me; when you are employed in my service, I will take charge of your business." So will it be with you. Do but surrender yourself to Christ, and he, of his own free will, takes in hand all your affairs.—Spurgeon.

UTILIZING WASTE.

Economizing Materials Which Otherwise Would Be Thrown Away.

It is quite the fashion to speak of the French people as being the most economical of any in the world, as they allow nothing to be wasted which can in any way be utilized. But it appears to us that the people of this country are not far behind in the matter of economizing materials that would otherwise be wasted. Do we not use beef's blood for door knobs? Are we not putting doors and blinds into our houses made of wood pulp? We also use paper doors, blinds, etc., to say nothing of paper car wheels, paper boats, paper nails and other utensils too numerous to mention. Paper, as we know, is made of materials which would ordinarily be wasted if not thus used. Sawdust has become an important article of commerce, as it is largely used in plaster. Coal dust is now used in many ways as a fuel, yielding an intense heat, and very useful in some kinds of manufacturing.

The very dirt beneath our feet is transformed by the arts of various craftsmen into building materials, having fireproof qualities, or it is transmuted into the finest pottery, or the most delicate porcelain for crystal. Also from clay we extract a metal, which, by reason of new processes, bids fair to rival iron in usefulness in building. We refer to aluminum, which, while not a new metal, has heretofore been too expensive to come into general use. By a new invention, however, which renders its manufacture much easier and cheaper, it is likely to become the metal of the future for special uses in place of iron. It is a beautiful metal, resembling the brightest silver, and is very tough and durable. Alumina, as is well known, when found in its pure state crystallized, is that royal gem, the sapphire, next in hardness to the diamond.

From the slag of the blast furnace the skillful manipulator produces a fine, soft wool which is perfectly noncombustible, and, if properly applied, will render our houses practically fireproof. We might go on ad infinitum, but we will close the subject by mentioning one of the latest triumphs in the art of utilizing waste materials—that of manufacturing a composition which can be molded into any ornamental shape required out of the chips of granite from the stone cutter's yard. It is said that fine decorative stone work can thus be produced at about one-tenth the cost of cut stone ornamental work, and yet yield a good profit to the manufacturer. Also that this material may be vitrified so that it will take on a permanent polish as fine as that of polished granite.—Architectural Era.

Congressional Pages.

The boys who serve as pages in the house and senate are a lucky lot. There are 16 of them in the senate and 33 in the lower branch. Their ages range from 9 to 15 years, and they get $2.50 per diem for their services, which means about $800 a year. In addition to this regular stipend they pick up a good many odd dollars in the shape of gratuities from the senators and congressmen whom they serve with alacrity. They all wear knickerbockers and are bright lads. Senator Gorman, ex-Congressman William L. Scott and the late Richard H. Townsend all began their careers in Washington as page boys, and there is probably the making of numerous congressmen in the boys who are now running errands for statesmen.—Boston Herald.

A Jeweler's Superstition.

Nearly every jeweler lays down a rule never to credit anybody for a clock or watch or anything that keeps time. I don't know why this is and never heard any good reason assigned for it, but nevertheless it is a fact. And, moreover, we firmly believe that a watch or a clock that is brought to us for repairs or regulating will never keep good time if the owner does not pay cash for the job. You know we do a big credit business. I suppose jewelers do a larger credit business than any other class of merchants, and it no doubt seems surprising that we have a class of trade that is barred from the credit list on account of a superstition.—Atlanta Journal.

Something Burning.

One day little Polly was driving with the rest of the family, when a disagreeable odor penetrated the air, doubtless proceeding from one of the country houses which they were then passing.

"Something is burning," said one of the company, sniffing the air.

"Feathers!" suggested another.

"Hair!"

"Flannel!"

"I guess I know what it is," piped up little Polly, in all seriousness, "I've got a piece of peppermint in my mouth, and it burns my tongue awfully."—Youth's Companion.

Ten Dollars for One Word.

Professor Foster, of Waterville, recently received a dispatch from Swatow, China, consisting of but one word, "Good." It cost him $10, but he considers it cheap enough, as it announced to him the birth of a granddaughter, and that all were doing well. The dispatch came from his son, Rev. John Foster, and left Swatow 7 o'clock in the morning, and before noon was delivered to the professor at his house in Waterville.—Waterville Sentinel.

People Who Exist on Pills.

Recent investigation has shown that the people of Great Britain swallow over 5,500,000 pills daily, or one pill a week for every person in the population. The pill consumption for one year would weigh 178 tons, and would fill 36 freight cars, which it would take two powerful locomotives to pull. Placed in a row the pills would reach nearly 6,500 miles, or from Liverpool to New York and back again.

HOW GRANITE IS POLISHED.

Putting a Smooth Surface on the Hard Stone—Methods in Detail.

The form is given to the stone by the hands of skilled masons, in much the same way as is done with other stones of softer nature. Of course the time required is considerably greater in the case of granite as compared with other stones.

If the surface is not to be polished, but only fine axed, as it is called, that is done by the use of a hammer composed of a number of slips of steel of about a sixteenth of an inch thick, which are tightly bound together, the edges being placed on the same plane. With this tool the workman smooths the surface of the stone by a series of taps or blows given at a right angle to the surface operated upon. By this means the marks of the blows as given obliquely on the surface of the stone are obliterated and a smooth face produced.

Polishing is performed by rubbing in the first place with an iron tool and with sand and water. Emery is next applied, then putty with flannel. All plain surface and molding can be done by machinery, but all carvings, or surfaces broken into, small portions of various elevations, are done by the hands of the patient hand polishers.

The operation of sawing a block of granite into slabs for panels, tables or chimney pieces is a very slow process, the rate of progress being about half an inch per day of ten hours. The machines employed are few and simple. They are technically called lathes, wagons and pendulums or rubbers. The lathes are employed for the polishing of columns, the wagons for flat surface, and the pendulums for molding and such flat work as is not suitable for the wagon.

In the lathes the column is placed and supported at each end by points, upon which it revolves. On the upper surface of the column there are laid pieces of iron, segments of the circumference of the column. The weight of these pieces of iron lying upon the column, and the constant supply by the lathe attendant of sand and water, emery or putty, according to the state of finish to which the column has been brought, constitute the whole operation.

While sand is used during the rougher state of the process, these irons are bare, but when using emery and putty the surface of the iron next to the stone is covered with thick flannel.

The wagon is a carriage running upon rails, in which the pieces of stone to be polished are fixed, having uppermost the surface to be operated upon. Above this surface there are shafts placed perpendicularly, on the lower end of which are fixed rings of iron. These rings rest upon the stone, and when the shaft revolves they rub the surface of the stone. At the same time the wagon travels backward and forward upon the rails, so as to expose the whole surface of the same to the action of the rings.

The pendulum is a frame hung upon hinges from the room of the work shop. To this frame are attached iron rods, moving in a horizontal direction. In the line upon which these rods move, and under them, the stone is firmly placed upon the floor. Pieces of iron are then loosely attached to the rods and allowed to rest upon the surface of the stone. When the whole is set in motion, these irons are dragged backward and forward over the surface of the stone, and so it is polished.

When polishing plain surfaces, such as the needle of an obelisk, the pieces of iron are flat, but when we have to polish a molding we make an extra pattern of its form and the irons are cast from that pattern.—Stone Mason, England.

South America's Tall Volcano.

Cotopaxi is the loftiest of active volcanoes, but is slumbering now. The only evidences of action are the frequent rumblings that can be heard for a hundred miles, and the cloud of smoke by day and the pillar of fire by night, which constantly arise from a crater that is more than 3,000 feet beyond the reach of man. Many have attempted to climb the monster, but the walls are so steep and the snow is so deep that the ascent is impossible, even with scaling ladders.

On the southern slope of Cotopaxi is a great rock, more than 2,000 feet high, called "the Inca's Head." Tradition says that it was once the summit of the volcano, and fell on the day when Atahualpa was strangled by the Spaniards. Those who have seen Vesuvius can judge of the grandeur of Cotopaxi if they can imagine a volcano 15,000 feet higher, spurting flames and lava from a crest covered with 3,000 feet of snow, with a voice that has been heard 600 miles. And one can judge of the grandeur of scenery on the road to Quito if he can imagine twenty of the highest mountains in America, three of them active volcanoes, standing along the road from Washington to New York.—American Magazine.

Gladstone Fifty Years Ago.

The following is a description of Gladstone, published in a London paper of 1838, the date of his marriage: "Mr. Gladstone's appearance and manners are much in his favor. He is a fine looking man. He is about the usual height and of good figure. His countenance is mild and pleasant, and he has a highly intellectual expression. His eyes are clear and quick; his eyebrows are dark and rather prominent. There is no dandy in the house but envies what Trufit would call his fine head of jet black hair. It is always carefully parted from his crown downward to his brow, where it is carefully shaded. His features are small and regular, and his complexion must be a very unworthy witness if he does not possess abundant good health."—New York Commercial Advertiser.

Longest Piece of Ordnance.

A correspondent of The Army and Navy Journal asks: "What is the longest piece of ordnance that has ever been successfully fired?" and receives the following answer: "If you include in the term ordnance everything that carries a projectile, we should answer fourteen miles. This is the straight tube conveying natural gas from Murrayville to Pittsburg. To clear this tube out, a projectile known as the 'gum ball' was inserted in the end at the gas well, closely fitting the interior. The gas was then turned on full force and the gum ball fired through its full length, coming out at the further end in a few minutes."—Scientific American.

—Seth Low, the new president of Columbia College, has no respect for a rule that does not provide for a contingency. A young man not overburdened with wealth last fall entered the law school, paying what was for him quite a fee. After attending two or three lectures business exigencies forbade his continuance at study. He applied to the treasurer for a rebate on his cash payment only to meet with delay and hear a rule recited against such a demand. Then he dropped President Low a line. Within four hours the post-office brought a courteous reply and a check.

SHAKEN OUT OF GEAR,

By malarial disease, the human machinery cannot half perform its office. Digestion, secretion, evacuation are disordered, the blood becomes watery, the nerves feeble, the countenance ghastly, sleep disturbed and appetite capricious. Terrible is this disease, fell its consequences. There is, however, a known antidote to the miasmatic poison, and a certain safeguard against it. In malarious regions of our South and West, in South America, Guatemala and on the Isthmus of Panama, as well as in transmarine countries where the scourge exists, this inimitable preventive and remedy, Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, has, during the last thirty-five years, been constantly widening the area of its usefulness, and demonstrating its sovereign value. Liver complaint, dyspepsia, constipation, kidney trouble, rheumatism and debility are all remedied by it.

An offer to bet may be a fool's argument, but it makes the wise man shut up.

P. HINKLE'S PATENT CENTRIFUGAL ROLLER QUARTZ MILL

THIS cut shows the New Hinkle Centrifugal Quartz Mill, with plates and slummer. This is the only mill made that needs no oil for the inside working parts, as it is thoroughly lubricated with water, supplied from a circular tank, which is connected to the roller spindles, slides and drips by rubber hose. By this means oil cannot interfere with perfect amalgamation. Other features of superiority are: Simplicity of construction; the free discharge of pulp; the wearing parts are easily replaced at a small cost. The small amount of power required to run the mill will recommend it to all practical mill men, as well as the small cost of erection and transportation of mill to the mine. A 5-foot mill weighs 9,000 lbs.; pulverizers 38 in. diam.; run, 80 to 90 rev. per minute, with a capacity of 20 tons per day. This size mill costs $1,500. With Silver Plates, Slummer and Ore Feeder, $1,800.

P. HINKLE'S PATENT ORE FEEDER.

Positive Feed and Ready Adjustment.

IN this Improved Ore Feeder the falling jaspet of the mill causes a backward movement of the feeding tray. As the ore comes from the hopper on to the tray, a transverse bar prevents the ore moving backward, and a small portion of the ore is thus forced off the front edge of the feeding-tray into the battery. The amount of movement of the feeding tray may be regulated, thus regulating the feed of ore. This feeder can be arranged for roller mill or stamps. It is strong and durable, and feeds wet or dry ore in regular quantities.

A Vast Fortune in Furs.

"No one will ever be able to tell the real wealth of Alaska," said a furrier to a reporter. "It consists of the abundance of its skinned animals. The Russians used to value the country for its furs, and it was mainly for the furs that this country acquired it from Russia. The trade has grown very much since its annexation to this country. The shipments of sea otter and fur sealskins alone have more than doubled during the past ten years, and now average annually $1,500,000 in value. The list of furs produced in that part of the country is a long one. The land furs comprising otter, beaver, brown bear, black bear, red fox, silver fox, blue and white fox, mink, martin, polar bear, lynx and musk rat. Rabbits, marmots and wolverines are also common, but these skins are retained by the natives. The annual value of the furs, sea and land, now obtained from Alaska is estimated to average $3,000 000, and there is no sign of decrease in the yield. The competition of the traders for skins has stimulated the natives to greater industry in hunting, and the prices now paid to the hunters are from four to ten times more than were current during the Russian rule."—New York Mail and Express.

Death in a Blizzard.

Dr. Smith, the health officer of this port, a day or two ago spoke of death in a blizzard as being the result of suffocation, and explained his meaning by saying; "One of my clerks was two hours in coming to me on one of the days of the furious blizzard in this city. He was three hours and a half, he told me, in going back over the same distance, something like two miles. He felt no inconvenience beyond the exhaustion consequent on the fight with the wind. He slipped into doorways to catch his breath, and when the wind blew too sharply in his face turned around with his back to it. Death in a blizzard comes too often from attempting to breast the storm. The wind takes away one's breath. Suffocation follows. A man doubles up and drops down and is dead. He does not even know what ailed him. If he had turned his back to the blast for a moment he might have faced it again and have gone on for another struggle unharmed."—New York Tribune.

The Quaker's Peculiar Ideas.

The Quaker never makes oath. He avoids as far as possible coming where such procedure is necessary, but if obliged to make a declaration, the falsity of which would subject him to legal penalty, he affirms. Nor does he observe any holy days or feast days. He believes that the obligation to regard one day more than another ceased with the Mosaic dispensation. The visiting of theatres, race courses, dancing halls, or the investment in any kind of lotteries—grab bags in church fairs included—are declared to be incompatible with the teachings of the society, and are forbidden. No matter what station in life you occupy, a Quaker does not use the prefix "Mr." As soon as your Christian name is given you are addressed by it whenever necessary. All these things are of course known to the Quakers themselves, but not to the average Philadelphian.—Philadelphia Cor. Globe-Dem.

Send a Stamp for the Recipe.

A hod carrier named O'Farrell had a narrow escape from death the other day. He was carrying a hod of brick under the windows of Miss Lightbread's cooking school for young ladies, when an angel cake, evolved by a member of the class, slipped from the window where it had been carelessly placed. Had it fallen upon O'Farrell doubtless it would have killed him. But it wasn't that kind of a cake; it just drifted out into the sunshine and eddied and floated and danced away off into the dim blue ether, like the ghost of a thistle down—away—away—away—until it was lost to human sight. That's the kind of cake the girls in Brooklyn make, my son. Had this paragraph happened in any other town in America there wouldn't have been a whole brick left in that hod.—Burdette in Brooklyn Eagle.

Neatly Trapped.

Able Editor—Trapped a forger, eh? Good job. Write it up with a big display head. How did you catch him?

Reporter—He called at the office this morning and introduced himself as a newspaper man.

"Yes."

"Then, after he got acquainted, he asked me to cash a check for $50. I turned him over to the police."—Omaha World.

Satisfactory.

The expression, "The wind blew through his whiskers," has been traced by a Chicago philologist to the isle of Cyprus, where, a great many centuries ago, a gang of Moslem pirates had their beards blown into the sea by a blizzard that got split by the pyramids in coming over the desert. The explanation is considered perfectly truthful and satisfactory

DAINTY LITTLE MAIDEN.

Dainty little maiden,
Tripping forth each day,
Bearing weighty volumes
On your learned way;
This is from the one that passes
Going to his daily classes—
He that looks with longing eye,
As you lightly pass him by.

Dainty little maiden,
With the nut brown curls—
Would that I professor were
In your school of girls;
Passion plants I'd botanize;
Lecture on the heart, with sighs;
Or, just in a class of two,
Love's sweet art I'd teach to you.

Traits of the Phœbe Bird.

The phœbe bird with its cheery pee wee is already heard in the rural districts. In folklore the arrival of this early bird of passage is an omen that hard frosts are over, and that the farmer may proceed with confidence to his planting. Now it is known that they sail north on a March breeze, endure ice making weather and have no more relation to farming than a pewter half dollar has to trade. As nest builders they exhibit taste in variation of the style of their nests and the furnishing materials. The fiber of bark answers for some of them to line their nests with, others use moss, hair or wool, and one is recorded to have built a nest entirely of corn silk. These birds have greatly improved their nests within the memory of man, which suggests that they are guided by reason instead of the stupid instinct which is so often attributed to them.—Norwich (Conn.) Bulletin.

A Well Merited Rebuke.

First Actress—The impudence of these men is simply insulting. What do you suppose that front row baldhead sent me this morning?

Second Actress—Oh, what was it? Do tell me, quick.

"A great big floral heart with a love letter in the top and a diamond pin in the center."

"How rich he must be! What did you do?"

"I summoned a messenger boy instantly, and, after tearing the letter into bits, I scattered the pieces over the flowers and sent it back to the fellow. I didn't want to quite break his heart, though, so I retained the pin."—Omaha World.

Three Classes of Americans.

"In your travels through the country," says an Englishman, in speaking of the United States, "you are constantly running across two classes of people, the hifalutin' boasters who think they can whip all creation, and the apish imitators of European ways, who spend their time in apologizing for their country. But it is only fair to say that the vast majority of the people belong to neither of these classes. Unfortunately, however, a visiting Englishman is much more likely to meet the two classes spoken of than the larger class of self respecting Americans who really represent the genius of the country. And so he goes home with a false impression of the people."—New York Tribune.

The Supply of Quinine.

It is a curious fact that while the annual supply of quinine for the whole world is about 3,600,000 ounces, the consumption of this drug in the United States is more than 3,100,000 ounces, or nearly one-half the entire product. The price of quinine has been so low for the last three or four years that large plantations of the cinchona tree have been uprooted in Ceylon, and the tea plant is substituted. Ceylon produces a very large share of all the bark that is marketed, and the exports from that island declined more than one-third between 1885 and 1887.—American Agriculturist.

The Turkish Sultan's Laundry.

The laundry where all the linen from the Dolma Bagtche palace is washed is under the direction of a man, but the work is all done by women. They have no washboards and rub the garments in their hands. They do not boil the clothes at all, and they are white as snow. They wash the clothes through two waters and then pack them tightly in baskets, covering them with towels, which they strew thickly with wood ashes and sliced lemons. Boiling water is then poured over them, and the clothes remain thus all night and in the morning are rinsed and hung out.

In many homes a tooth brush would be a curiosity, and yet every child should be provided with one and made to use it. This is a duty which cannot be too strongly insisted upon. Unless the teeth are kept clean they will decay, and without good teeth perfect health is absolutely impossible.—Boston Herald.

'AN ODD MICHIGAN VILLAGE.

A Thousand Little Fishing Huts on Ice. The Fisherman's Methods.

"The oddest settlement, I guess, that can be found anywhere in this country," said William Cotter, of East Saginaw, "is Fish City, on Saginaw bay. When I say it is on Saginaw bay, I don't mean that it is on the bay in the sense that Chicago is on Lake Michigan, or that Albany is on the Hudson river, but that it is, in winter time, literally on the bay, and extends for several miles out over its surface. It is a city on the ice, consequently is not founded on a rock, and naturally its existence is not permanent. During the season just past there were 1,000 houses in Fish City.

"This queer town is not laid out with any idea of regularity, and it is not likely that the ordinary regulations for finding a given location in a city would avail there. The buildings in this interesting town are neither large nor imposing, as the biggest one among them is not more than eight feet high or more than six feet square. They are built of common boards, and cover the frozen surface of the bay almostly as thickly as the burrows of a prairie dog village cover the prairie. They are the huts of men who do the winter fishing for pike, pickerel, lake trout and white fish, and as soon as the ice forms on the bay their construction is begun. The fishermen live in their huts from the time they are built until the breaking up of the ice in the spring forces them to come ashore. The furniture of these huts consists of a sheet iron cylinder stove a little over a foot high, with a hole in the top, a stool and a shelf eighteen inches wide, on which the fisherman sleeps. There is a floor in each hut, and in the floor a trapdoor twenty inches square. When this is raised a hole of the same size through the ice is discovered. At the side of this the fisherman sits all day and a great part of the night watching for his game, which he captures in a novel manner.

"To decoy the fish to the hole in the ice he takes a herring, which he catches with a hook and line as he needs one, crams a piece of lead four inches long down its throat to make it sink, ties a long string to it by a slip noose over its head, fastens the other end of the string to the ceiling of his hut and lowers the herring to the water. The decoy fish will live an amazing length of time, notwithstanding its stomach and throat are filled with lead, and the ballast makes its efforts at swimming so peculiar that the game fish are quickly attracted to the decoy. When the herring dies the fisherman manipulates the string with one hand while he holds his spear in the other. The water over which these huts are built is from ten to fifteen feet deep, but it is so clear that the bottom is easily seen. To the end of this spear handle the fisherman has a strong string securely fastened, and the string is tied to a nail in one side of the hut, so there is no danger of the weapon being lost in the water in case of accident. A decoy herring will not be long in the water before up will dash some alligator jawed pike, or a big, graceful lake trout, or a glistening whitefish. Like a flash the spear shoots down through the hole in the ice, and it rarely misses its mark. The skill with which these Saginaw bay fishermen throw their spear is equaled only by the Indian spear throwers of the Sault Ste. Marie. The fish run in schools, and the favorite times for fishing are early in the morning and from nightfall until midnight. After dark a lamp with a strong reflector is used to light up the hole in the ice and the water beneath, and then the fishing is the liveliest and at its best. Sometimes a fisherman's wife and two or three children occupy his hut with him all winter long, and seem to suffer no inconvenience from the cramped and not altogether cheerful quarters. From 2,000,000 to 2,500,000 pounds of choice fish are taken in this way every season at Saginaw bay.

"In the spring, when the ice begins to threaten a break up, the prudent inhabitants of this queer city lose no time in taking down their houses and seeking the shore with them. There are always a great many among them, however, who brave the inevitable break up until the last moment, and every spring, in spite of past experiences, some of these are sure to be carried out into the lake by the shifting ice. Tugs are always dispatched by some one to rescue these reckless fishermen, but their sufferings are intense, and it sometimes happens that lives among them are lost before the rescuing parties locate and reach them."—New York Mail and Express.

Do Flying Fish Fly?

It has long been a question with scientists whether flying fish actually fly, or are only carried forward through the air by the impulse which they gave to their bodies while still in the water. Professor Mobius expresses an authoritative opinion, and claims that they are totally unable to fly, for the reason that the muscles which move the pectoral fins are not sufficiently large to bear the weight of their bodies in the air. In birds the average weight of the muscles which are concerned in the movement of the wings is one-sixth that of the entire body; in bats one-thirteenth, while in the flying fish it is only one-thirty-fifth. He affirms, therefore, that the impulse to the propulsion of the fish in the air is delivered while they are still in the water.—Globe-Democrat.

Freaks of the Storm.

Wind-rolled snowballs are often seen on the Dakota and Wyoming prairies. Sometimes millions upon millions of the balls are in sight at one time. Many are of the size of an orange, some as big as a cannon ball, while others reach the proportions of the prize pumkin of the county fair. These freaks of the storm leave a person under the fanciful impression that great armies of school boys have been battling over the snowy space.—New York Star.

GLIMPSES OF ALL NIGHT LIFE.

In Paris' "American" Restaurant—A Bloodless Spanish Duel.

At 3 o'clock we find an American restaurant fairly decorous. Between it and the closed cafe on the entresol we shall soon hear rival pianos issuing complex melodies, and, if we went through the richly furnished rooms, we would see many a devil's dance, danced humorously enough, too. The restaurant is one of the richest, as go the trappings, in the city. It has the incandescent light, which is only intermittently discharged, after the idea of the galvanic battery. When conversation ebbs or the spirits of the guests are evidently oozing, the watchful guardian of the plant touches the electric key, and instantly the immense room, with all its scintillating objects, is ablaze like a fairy palace. The exhilaration produced begins with a chorus of awakening, long drawn "Ah's!" breaks into a tempest of talk, and immediately there are renewed orders for refreshments, and a replenishment of the frappe decanters all around. Then the light is graded imperceptibly to its minimum, insensibly carrying the hilarity of the crowd off with it into the dynamo, and exploded again with the same result, repeated and repeated, until the night's indulgence is finished.

Meanwhile, as the hours grow on, there are certain sputterings like to quarrels. Two obstreperous Frenchmen, at different times, are thrust down the stairs, persuasively. Rarely does a downright fisticuffs occur, the garcon tells us. The tables are occupied, except two at the door. Near us, on one side, is an actress from the Comedie Francaise, enjoying lunch with three critics and a deputy. To disconcert eavesdroppers the conversation is chopped up into French, Russian, English, German and Italian. Could some of the Parisian stars listen their fingers' ends would itch. On the other side, at a double table, are three young Spaniards, two Spanish women, and two French women, the latter plainly distressed at their inability to keep pace with the liquid cross fire of their companions. Frequently we hear "Antonio" appealed to—a handsome youth, dreamy-eyed, though active, who is evidently the host, for he is circling the empty champagne bottles about the table in a most lavish way. Another lad, of Morocco cast, small as a church mouse, and fussy, has been crushed by Antonio so often, in his fits of generosity, that between his wounded vanity and his want of brains, he is dangerously irritated.

At this moment two black bearded men and two sallow women enter and take seats near the door. Instantly, like a gunpowder flash, the two Spanish groups have flared up. An old feud! The women cling, while the men fire volley upon volley at one another—of words. This is exactly what the Morocco warrior pined for. Up he goes on to the table, and down crash the bottles and glasses, he after them. Nothing short of a duel will do. He rushes over to our table. Are we his friends? Of course we are. Will we second him? Nothing would give us greater pleasure, unless, perhaps, his fall. His card! He searches frantically, but to no purpose, for one of the women pushes him away, and they all implore us not to encourage a duel, which we assure them we hadn't the remotest intention of doing. And during this little negotiation something very singular has come to pass, for as we look off into the room, behold there in the center is the aspiring duelist and his intended opponent hugging in a hysterical, tearful friendship, and Antonio playing a similar engagement with the other enemy. Bah! they even fall to kissing, and then the two belligerent parties, all wet smiles now, seat themselves in one group and resume pleasantries.—E. D. Cowen's Paris Letter in Chicago News.

The Nutriment in Oysters.

Speaking roughly, a quart of oysters contains, on the average, about the same quantity of actual nutritive substance as a quart of milk, or a pound of very lean beef, or a pound and a half of fresh codfish, or two-thirds of a pound of bread. But while the weight of actual nutriment in the different quantities of food material named is very nearly the same, the quality is widely different. That of the very lean meat or codfish consists mostly of what are called, in chemical language, protein compounds, or "flesh formers"—the substances which make blood, muscle, tendon, bone, brain and other nitrogenous tissues. That of the bread contains but little of these and consists chiefly of starch, with a little fat and other compounds which serve the body as fuel and supply it with heat and muscular power. The nutritive substance of oysters contains considerable of both the flesh forming and the more especially heat and force giving ingredients. Oysters come nearer to milk than almost any other common food material as regards both the amounts and the relative proportions of nutrients and their food values, of equal weights of milk and oysters—i. e., their values for supplying the body with material to build up its parts, repair its wastes, and furnish it with heat and energy would be pretty nearly the same.—Professor W. O. Atwater.

Another Prodigious Sham.

For "sweet charity's sake" covers another prodigious sham. If a woman desires to become a shining light in society charity is made the ladder for such an ambition. She finds the poor orphans and the nameless women and children very interesting and pitiful, and offers her services and her dollars for their relief. The patrons of the institution find her assistance useful. By and by, through such companionship, madam's name is added to their visiting list. It was a woman of this kind—an arrogant, unconventional, and tasteless person, who, after earning her own bread, became the wife of a millionaire and edged herself into society through various charities—that snubbed a young author in her own house, who had gone there by invitation to read or recite. The occasion was for a charity. The poor fellow's shoes were dusty and his clothing of an unfashionable cut, so madam, not being acquainted with literary folk, eyed the young man with distrust and asked him to take a back seat. Ah! who of us can forget how his eyes fairly flamed and his cheeks burned when he was called forward to recite "Misunderstood," a genuine touching little poem of his own.—Brooklyn Eagle.

GENIUS AT WORK.

Oddities of Noted Authors—Queer Ways of Statesmen.

Voltaire had in his room sometimes five desks, at which he pursued different tasks.

The great romancer, Balzac, after a frugal dinner at 6 or 7 o'clock, was called at midnight, when he took a cup of black coffee, or green rather, and extremely strong, and worked till noon.

Turgot never worked but when he had dined heartily.

Pitt never ate but at his own table, which was frugal; only when he had some important affair to discuss he took a little port wine with a spoonful of Peruvian bark.

Addison speaks of an advocate who would never plead a case without having his hand to the end of a thread drawn tightly round one of his thumbs all the time his speech lasted. The wags said it was the thread of his discourse.

Dr. Shapman relates that a celebrated advocate of London always applied a blister to his arm whenever he had an important case to plead.

Girodet never loved to work during the day. At night, when inspiration came to him, he arose, lighted candles, and, half muffled up, painted.

Michael Angelo did nearly the same, but with a single candle.

The historian, Mezeray, would work only with a candle, even at midday and midsummer. He never failed to wait on his visitors, even to the street, with a candle in his hand.

Gretry, to animate himself when composing, breakfasted and took coffee, and then applied himself day and night to his piano.

Bossuet worked in a cold room, with his head warmly enveloped.

It is said that Schiller, before composing, put his feet in cold water.

Guido Reno painted with much pomp. He dressed himself magnificently, and had his pupils attend him in silence ranged around him.

Sarti, the musician, composed only in darkness.

Michael Angelo, Leonardo da Vinci, Titian, Rubens, passed from the chisel to the pen or the brush. The change rested them from the preceding work; and thus, during long life, they accomplished marvelous works.

Some persons can think only standing, or in walking the room with swift strides. Some, like Montesquieu, compose in a postchaise. One has need of complete isolation, profound calm; another of the open air and the noise of the crowd.

Buffon wrote in lace ruffles; Alexandre Dumas in shirt sleeves.

Milton composed his "Paradise Lost" on a large armchair, with his head thrown back.

When Fox had eaten heartily he would retire to his study, envelop his head in a napkin soaked in vinegar and water, and work sometimes ten hours in succession.

Jeremy Bentham jotted his ideas on little squares of paper, which he piled upon each other, and this pile of little papers stitched together was the first forms of his manuscripts.

Napoleon had his particular mode of meditation and work. When he was not in council he stayed in his study, talked to himself and sung, or, like a child, cut the arms of his chair; then suddenly rousing up, would give the plan of a monument to be erected, or of one of the great military movements which astonished the world.—New York Commercial Advertiser.

Musical Talent in Tyrol.

Musical talent is, without comparison, the gift of nature most widely diffused in Tyrol, and to a stranger, particularly an Englishman, it is amazing to find a finely developed ear and a capital voice in the commonest country lout, who scarcely knows his A B C, and to whom Bismarck is an unheard of being.

To be able to join with a second or third voice in a song which they have never heard before is a very common accomplishment. For instance, a lady of my acquaintance was one afternoon playing and singing a Viennese air. The windows were open, and two country lasses passing along the road stopped and listened for a little time. Presently, when at my request my friend repeated the song, the two girls fell in, one with the second and the other with the third voice.

Being a stranger in the country, my friend would not believe that the girls were common peasant lasses, unacquainted with the piece of music which she played; and so, in order to convince her, I sent down for them and made them accompany her in a number of songs which she sang to try them. Their intonation and expressive voices excited her admiration no less than the piano did that of the buxom lasses.—Youth's Companion.

South African Snake Charmers.

Col. Nicholas Pike gives some very interesting experiences in the matter of snake charming.

"I have seen a native of Cape Town, South Africa," he said, "take the deadly puff adder and play with it as you would a riding whip. He would take the deadly cobra, also, and make them stand on their tails and sway their bodies back and forth, keeping time to the music of a small instrument like the clarionet. There are men in India who go about charming snakes out of the thatched roofs of the huts. I have seen them do it. They would sit down and commence to play, and in a little time, if you watched, you would see a large snake come out of the roof and crawl down to the floor of the hut. Then a basket would be put over him and he would be made a prisoner. The shriller the music the more satisfactory it seems to the snake."—Brooklyn Eagle.

Irrigation in India.

There are districts in India where the rainfall is over 100 inches a year, and yet not far off there are other districts which suffer greatly for water. The fields are irrigated in these by water drawn from wells by oxen, lifting it in great skin buckets. Fields so irrigated have wheat waving in as great beauty as I ever saw, while just over the irrigating ditch there are thousands of acres of land which produce scanty crops in the hot rainy seasons, but are desolate at this time, which is the best for good crops under the burning sun of India.—Chicago Times.

THE ETHICS OF SUICIDE.

A Mysterious Inconsistency—The Animal Kingdom—Moral Cowardice.

A very mysterious inconsistency in human nature lies in the contrast between life which makes self preservation its first love, and that utter contempt and intolerance of it which induces self destruction. By all human laws, the man who takes another's life in defending his own is held guiltless of murder; his deed is accounted justifiable in recognition of the self saving instinct with which the creator has accompanied the gift of life to all his creatures. With the earliest consciousness of young animals this instinct appears in timidity and shrinking from danger, real or imaginary; and down to the lowest order of beings, a wounded thing will exert its last strength to escape having its existence blotted out. As for the human species, we have it on Scripture authority that "all that a man hath will he give for his life."

In view of this, who that is unaware of the facts would expect to so constantly hear of men and women, and even children, finding life unbearable and ending all? What a surprising violation of this innate principle it seems, when for this or that cause, and often for no cause that is evident, some choose death rather than life!

Suicide is not entirely confined to the human species. There are numerous well authenticated instances of different animals deliberately killing themselves when circumstances rendered life no longer desirable. A recent traveler in the tropics tells of coming at various times upon the skeleton of a species of poisonous serpent within a circle of leaves of the prickly cactus, and later the riddle was solved by his seeing some monkeys engaged in surrounding a sleeping reptile with the spinous vegetation. Upon awaking and finding itself imprisoned and all its attempts to escape futile, the serpent presently took refuge in stinging its own body and dying at once. It is commonly reported that the same thing happens when a poisonous snake is hemmed in by fire, in a spasm of desperation at finding no chance of escape, it turns its means of self defense into means of self destruction.

The animal kingdom is a law unto itself. Not so with man. He is subject to the higher law of duty and accountability; and no environment can be called hopeless to one who believes in a gracious overruling power and the better life to come. A portion of the alarming number of current suicides, it must be confessed, awaken only the sincerest pity in every susceptible and benevolent heart, and probably there are very many more cases of this kind, were the secret causes that have actuated the victims brought to light. Yet wherever human law is founded on the divine law, self destruction must necessarily be regarded as a crime. A man's buildings are not his own in the sense that he can set them on fire and burn them down with impunity; much less is his life—a possession which cannot be restored—so exclusively personal that he has the right to end it by violence in an hour of discouragement or disgust.

The yearly list of suicides in some of the countries of Europe is appalling to contemplate. The waters of the Seine give up their dead daily, and drowning is but one among the common methods for shuffling off this mortal coil. Passion, impetuosity and, above all, infidelity, are prominent factors in recruiting the army of suicides. Statistics of all nations show that occasionally there occurs what has been called an epidemic of suicide; though whether this is an illustration of the force of example, or the result of some general impelling force, such as temperature during the exhausting heat of summer, remains an unsettled question. That the month of July has long been noted for the large number of its suicides favors the latter conclusion. Of direct causes among young people, affairs of the heart, love matters that have taken an unfortunate turn, must be reckoned the leading one. Very often, too, the circumstances attending these cases are unspeakably pathetic. Next come losses of money and business, friends and health. Of criminals who have recourse to dagger, bullet or rope to evade just penalty, it is unnecessary to speak.

There is a moral cowardice in fleeing from the battle of life, which strikingly contrasts with the patient, heroic endurance of multitudes of men and women in every land and in all sorts of hard conditions. To the tempted it might serve as a tonic to read history on this point, or better, to recall events. Think, for example, of the crew of the Jeannette in their frozen fastnesses, and of Capt. DeLong and his men in the Lena Delta, dying of slow starvation, yet brave to the last. But what need to go beyond the streets of a city, with its views of pinched and haggard faces and toiling decrepitude, for heroes and heroines that shall be forever nameless?—Lavinia S. Goodwin in Boston Globe.

As Old as the Exodus.

A most interesting experiment culminated the other day in the raising of some wheat grown from seeds as old as the Exodus. The experimenter is David Drew, who last year received from a friend in Alexandria, Egypt, some grains of wheat taken from a mummy exhumed near the ruins of Memphis, and belonging, it is believed, to the period of the Ninth Dynasty, which would make it grown about 3,000 B. C., or be nearly 5,000 years old. He planted the seed early in the spring, and carefully nursed it. It grew rapidly, and at the time of cutting measured from six and a half to seven feet high. The leaves alternate on the stalk like common wheat, but the product of the plant is the most singular part of it, for, instead of growing in the ear like modern corn, there is a heavy cluster of small twigs in place of the spindle which hangs downward from its weight, and each twig is thickly studded with kernels, each of which is in a separate husk. From what is threshed a larger crop will be grown next year, as the result proves this ground to exceed in quality anything that the modern grain can grow.—Plymouth (Mass.) Cor. Cincinnati Enquirer.

Bird fanciers say that the voices of American bred canaries become harsher in each generation. German birds must be constantly imported to preserve a mellow note.

The Voice of Niagara.

In an article on Niagara Falls, an evening paper observes, anent the mighty roar of its waters: One can never forget the effect of listening to this mighty voice for the first time, nor is it an unpleasant sound which assails the ear. The roar is positively musical, they say, and a few years ago a distinguished American organist spent a long time in studying it, and trying to learn the measure and compass of its tones. He finally came to the conclusion that the deepest tone made by the falling cataract was that which would be produced by an organ pipe about 160 feet in length, and of proportionate dimensions as organ pipes are made. Now, 160 feet, which is about the height of the falls (this varies from 160 feet to nearly 180 feet), is much longer than any organ pipe is made, and the sound emitted by such a pipe would not be sensible to us as a musical sound. Therefore our ears could not apprehend the music of the deepest tones; and as our ears are at fault, we give this deep tones music such discordant epithets as noise and roar.

This story, according to one account, seems incorrectly stated. The organist in question suggested a sound not nearly three octaves below thirty-two feet C, but about F sharp below that note. The present writer tried to define the vast harmonic hum of the great waterfalls, and came to the conclusion that the task was all but hopeless, although a steady kind of tone seems to be maintained, and certainly the imagination might readily seize upon such a note as the authority in question named, but whether the indefinite sound could be described as of foundation or upper partial tone character it would be altogether impossible to say.—London Musical World.

Unusual Storage of Life.

From the facts at our command, there is evidence that individual storage of life may be far greater than the vast majority of people either expect or hope for. The mean duration of life in England may be taken at 41 years. But we have instances upon instances in which this storage of life is doubled, and some in which it is trebled. I recently had, in the consulting room, at the same time, three gentlemen, whose united ages reached the total of 262 years, or over 87 years each, and each with a fair promise of from four to five years of life at least. I also, within the present quarter, saw, on the same day, two gentlemen, whose united ages gave 186 years, or an average of 93 years each. I have seen, and carefully examined physically, a woman who had attained the age of 105 years, and who lived afterward for three or four years; and I once conducted an autopsy of a man who had passed his 93d year.

There was nothing in the social condition of the individuals concerned that could of itself account for such an unusual storage of life as that which they presented. Two of those specially referred to were men of the highest class of mental power; the other has come down from one of the oldest of the noble families of Europe; a fourth has fought his own way from the lowest position to one of affluence and power; while the oldest of all was, from first to last, in abject poverty and was in a workhouse.—Dr. Benjamin Ward Richardson.

The Origin of Ideas.

While Capt. (afterward Sir Samuel) Brown was occupied in studying the construction of bridges, with the view of contriving one of a cheap description to be thrown across the Tweed, near which he lived, he was walking in his garden one dewy autumn morning, when he saw a tiny spider's net suspended across his path. The idea immediately occurred to him that a bridge of iron ropes or chains might be constructed in like manner, and the result was the invention of his suspension bridge. So James Watt, when consulted about the mode of carrying water by pipes under the Clyde, along the unequal bed of the river, turned his attention one day to the shell of a lobster presented at table, and from that model he invented an iron tube, which, when laid down, was found effectually to answer the purpose. Sir Isembert Brunel took his first lessons in forming the Thames tunnel from the tiny ship worm. He saw how the little creature perforated the wood with its well armed head, first in one direction and then in another, till the archway was complete, and then daubed over the roof and sides with a kind of varnish, and by copying this work exactly on a large scale Brunel was at length enabled to construct his shield and accomplish his great engineering work.—Once a Week.

The French Woman's Virtues.

The women of France are almost universally misunderstood and misjudged, because of the writings of such novelists as Dumas fils and Feydeau. The French woman is not a whit the inferior of the English or American woman. The middle class woman in the United States is better educated than the average woman of the same class in France. On the other hand the French woman is more active; she shares her husband's labors and often, indeed, takes more than her share. Often her labors begin in the early morning, to end only at midnight, or later still. The French woman of the lower middle class does not hold it beneath her dignity to perform the humblest household duties, while at the same time she is lively, pleasant and always willing to talk. She is as faithful to her husband as any American or English woman in the world, and it is the merest delusion to suppose that family life in France is undermined.—Mrs. Frank Leslie.

Russia's Horses and Boots.

In Moscow, as well as everywhere in Russia, the horses are very fine and very fast. They have the build of race horses, with their slim legs and far reaching necks. Even some of the droskies have full blooded horses, and their drivers are able to obtain a fancy price for their use. Horses and boots are the two things that Russians seem to pride themselves upon. They may not have any stockings—and few of the lower classes wear them at all—but boots they must have and will have. Boots with high morocco tops, and worn with the pantaloons tucked into the tops, so that every inch shows; and then, like the Mexican with his spurs, they are dressed.—Henry M. Wright in Detroit Free Press.

County Official Paper.

The Kern county Gazette is very unkind. It lays the blame of Democratic defeat upon Mr. Pond and says if Stephen M. White had been the candidate success would have been assured. The Gazette would have been much nearer the truth if it had said that its party would have had much better chance of success if Mr. Stanford had NOT been a candidate.

Parnell has fallen and he among you who is without sin let him throw the first stone at the patriot who so long, so well and so wisely served Ireland. There is no defense to be made of his sin, but censure of the wrong should be tempered with charity for the sake of his devotion to the cause of his country, a devotion that was as true and unselfish as ever animated any patriot.

The Los Angeles Herald gives a list of eight officials who have been guilty of fraud in office The list includes one Assemblyman, charged with forgery, two tax collectors, short in their accounts; an auditor, charged with issuing fraudulent warrants; and a City justice of peace, charged with concealing a person charged with felony. The boom trained men into the habit of lying, deceit and fraud, and when that burst they turned their acquired talents in the direction of politics.

Complaint is made that increase of population and the general improvement of Nevada is hindered by the Central Pacific Railroad. The Company owns a very large amount of land that could be irrigated, but it is alleged that they will not give any help toward building ditches and other works necessary for irrigation and this ties the hands of the small holders, who would gladly unite with the Company to build such works. Nevada will remain what it now is, in most part an uninhabited desert, tillirrigation shall shall make the land fit for settlement. There is enough good land in Nevada, and water to fertilize it, to support two millions of people, but dog in the manger policy will keep the land barren and the State poor.

The Superintendent of the State Insane Asylum at Stockton in his annual report makes a suggestion in regard to the Chinese patients that is well worthy of attention. In the State Asylums at Stockton, Napa and Agnews there are one hundred and thirty Chinamen that are being maintained at an annual cost to the State of about $18,000 Fully nine tenths of these are classed as chronic cases that will be a cost to the State as long as they live. The Superintendant suggests that they should be sent to their own country, and the estimate of the cost of doing so is less than one-half the cost of keeping them in the State for one year. This estimate includes everything, even to the cost of experienced keepers to attend them while making the voyage. There is great difficulty now in finding room for the patients sent to asylums and it is not right that Americans who need care in such places should be crowded out to make room for Chinese, neither is it right that we should be taxed for the maintenance of these aliens as long as they live when they have a country and a government of their own.

The demonetization of silver is likely to bring terrible disaster among those who brought it about. The great English house of Baring Brothers failed last Saturday, their liabilities being reported at about one hundred and five million dollars. If silver had not been demonetized that scarcity of coin would not have existed that caused this failure. The assetts of the house are said to be much greater than the liabilities, but bonds, mortgages and other securities cannot take the place of coin when there is a run on a bank. The Rothchilds and the Bank of England came to the relief of the Baring Brothers and loaned them millions enough to carry them over their difficulties. The credit system of England is so extensive and the debts so enormous that other financial institutions cannot allow such a house as that of Baring Brothers to go into bankruptcy. If one such concern should become a ruin it would drag down so many more that there would be a financial panic such as the world has never seen. The National debt of England is enormous. The interest upon that and upon all the countless millions of private capital has to come out of the toil and sweat of the laboring masses. Some day these toilers will refuse to bear such burdens longer, and then there will be an upheaval and readjustment equalled only by the French Revolution but not accompanied by the bloody horrors of that terrible retribution.

FUN FOR THE CLERK.

Four Giggling Girls Amuse Themselves at the Window of the Postoffice.

Giggle! giggle! giggle!

Four distinct little gurgles of rippling mirth in as many different feminine keys announced to the urbane stamp dispenser at the postoffice the other afternoon, that a quartet of pretty girls had finally succeeded in edging their way through the crowd and claimed his attention. True, only one of them had business with Uncle Sam's representative, but she could not possibly think of facing the stamp clerk alone, and answered the protests of her companions with a gesture of her pretty head that commanded humble obedience. So they struggled and giggled until they reached the window.

Here they formed a semi-circle around the post hole, through which two penny wafers are shoved to the ever hurrying public, and the leader addressed the clerk:

"I want to register something," said the sweet little female through her black dotted veil, putting her mouth as near as possible to the hole in the glass, and assuming an air of business that didn't fit her as well as the neat little sealskin jacket that encircled her waist.

"What do you wish to register, miss?" said the clerk, counting thirteen men that were waiting to get about $400 worth of stamps and who had arrived while the girls were arranging the barricade around the window. "Is it a canary bird, a hat rack, a cellar door or a contagious disease?" was probably what the clerk would have said to anybody but a pretty girl.

"O, I forgot, I'm so stupid, ain't I, girls." The response was three giggles which meant the young girl's companions thought so, too. She had expected them to say no and, therefore, had to chastise them bitterly, while eight men and four ladies forced their way into the little passage, but failed to connect with the stamp clerk.

The young lady then produced a small pasteboard box, neatly wrapped up and tied with white thread.

"Will anybody see who it's to?" she inquired. The clerk told her there was every probability some of the officials would forget themselves and look at the address to see where the package was to go. He added, while he noted that the postoffice steps were filling up, that it frequently occurred when the higher officials were not around that a clerk would steal a look at the address of a letter or package and then start it on its way as directed.

The pleasant repartee of the clerk pleased the girls, and after they had giggled all around twice, the speaker passed the box through the window and asked how much it would cost. It weighed a scant pound, and the clerk asked if there was any writing in it.

"I didn't know that made any difference," she said.

"It might not in other postoffices, but it is an invariable rule in this establishment that there shall be no writing in third class matter."

"Oh, that is third class. I did not know that—did you, girls?"

But you will pardon me if I insist upon a reply to my question," said the clerk, as he saw a policeman driving the people away from the door. Is there any writing in this package?"

"O, no; indeed there isn't, is there girls? But let me see. Maybe I'd better not send it by mail. How much will it cost? O, my, I haven't got that much. Besides papa said I should leave it at his office and he would send it by express. Please let me have it, will you? I'm sorry to bother you, because I know you must be awfully busy."

The young lady took the package and, after examining it to see that the string wasn't broken, led her companions out of the crowd to Smithfield street. The stamp clerk had counted twenty-nine persons who had become discouraged and had started in many different directions for a drug store.—Pittsburg Leader.

A Boy's Logical Argument.

The Up-River News gives the following reminiscence of an incident in an Oldtown lyceum forty years ago, to which all the ministers, doctors and lawyers of the town belonged. One evening capital punishment was the question under discussion and called out the best forces on both sides. During the evening a young boy who had been a constant member, replied to Deacon Bigby upon this question. The deacon was for hanging. The boy opposed. Said the deacon, quoting from the Mosaic law, "Whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man his blood shall be shed," thinking this to be a bombshell to his opponents, he dwelt upon it until his time expired, when the boy sprang to his feet and said:

"Supposing we take the law which the gentleman has quoted, and which in a philosophical sense has been abrogated as null and void since the birth of our Saviour, and see what the logical deduction would come to. For example, one man kills another, another man kills him, and so on until we come to the last man on earth. Who's going to kill him? He dare not suicide, for that same law forbids it. Now, deacon," said the boy, "what are you going to do with that last man?"

The boy's logic called out rounds of applause and vanquished the deacon. The boy is now chief justice of the supreme court of the United States, Melville W. Fuller.—Lewiston Journal.

Particular Customer—I am afraid that butter you speak of is too cheap to be good.

Grocer—It's regular dairy butter, madam. we'll have another lot in to-morrow. Let me send you some.

An Exceptional Instance.

What though the sky is dull and gray,
My heart is glad.
Let others worry as they may,
I'll not be sad.

Though life seem dull and friends be few,
I'll not repine;
For me the world is fresh and new,
Why should I whe?

Glad, bright, and joyous I will be,
My care's allayed.
For Fortune has just smiled on me,
My bills are paid.

TROUBLESOME NEIGHBORS.

O, could there in this world be found
Some little spot of happy ground
Where village pleasures might go round
Without the village tattling;
How doubly blest that spot would be,
Where all might dwell in liberty,
Free from the bitter misery
Of gossips' endless prattling.

If such a spot were really known,
Fair Peace might claim it as her own,
And in it she might fix her throne
Forever and forever;
There like a queen to reign and live,
While every one would soon forgive
The little slights they might receive,
And be offended never.

'Tis mischief makers that remove
Far from our hearts the warmth of love,
And lead us all to disapprove
What gives another pleasure.
They seem to take one's part, but when
They've heard our cares, unkindly then
They soon retail them all again,
Mixed with their poisonous measure.

And then they've such a cunning way
Of telling ill meant tales, they say:
"Don't mention what I've said, I pray;
I would not tell another!"
Straight to your neighbor's house they go,
Narrating everything they know,
And break the peace of high and low,
Wife, husband, friend and brother

O, that the mischief making crew
Were all reduced to one or two.
And they were painted red or blue,
That every one might know them!
Then would our villagers forget
To rage and quarrel, fume and fret,
Or fall into an angry pet
With things so much below them.

For 'tis a sad, degrading part
To make another's bosom smart,
And plant a dagger in some heart
We ought to love and cherish.
Then let us everywhere be found
In harmony with all around,
While friendship, joy and peace abound,
And angry feelings perish.

Physical Culture for Ladies.

I have been somewhat surprised during my stay in Kansas City, to see how little interest is taken by the ladies in physical culture, which in the larger cities of the east forms such an important part of a girl's education nowadays. The old idea that a woman is man's inferior physically, is pretty well exploded since the proper sort of physical training has been made available for women. In point of fact, I believe the reverse is true as far as mere strength of muscle and limb is concerned. In one of my classes in Boston, I had a pupil, Miss Amie Le Castron, who, while hardly able to lift a ten pound dumb bell when she first began to practice, by constant training became able to handle heavier weights than most men can. In Berlin another pupil of mine, Miss Bertha Wurtmer, in a class exhibition carried off the first honors for all-round athletic work, winding up by defeating seven contestants in a five mile walk. There are great possibilities for women in such a course of training.—Professor in Kansas City Journal.

Superior Court of Inyo County California
Hon. John A. Hannah, Judge.

MONDAY, November 13.

S. G. Sneden admitted as practicing attorney in the Superior Court.

FRIDAY, November 21.

In the matter of the estate of B. F. Theban, deceased—Filed application of Public Administrator for the issuance to him of letters of administration.

Mr. T. C. Boland came up from Keeler last Tuesday.

There was a fall of 60 cents in lead during the past week. The latest quotation is $5 00.

Mrs. Julia Church is down from Hawthorne visiting with her mother, Mrs. J. D. Blair.

The Kern County Californian says that the trial of W. T. C. Elliott has been set for December 9th.

Mr. A. O. Collins is Inspector for the the Masonic Lodges of Inyo and Mono counties. His address is Bishop, Cal.

Regular meeting of the Masonic Lodge at Independence to-morrow night. The Lodge at Bishop meets on Saturday of next week.

Mr. McCord of Bakersfield passed through town to-day with a band of horses. He is a regular buyer for the Kern county market.

The Kern County Gazette says there is little building going on in Bakersfield. There are sufficient business houses for all purposes but residences are in demand.

Diphtheria is prevalent in many parts of the State. In San Francisco the disease is so wide spread that almost a panic prevails. In all cases the origin of the disease is ascribed to filth and bad drainage.

Two Democrats have been elected to Congress in California. Geary in the first district has a majority of 53 over Barham, his Republican opponent, and Caminetti in the second has a majority of 156 over Blanchard.

A social dance will be given at Mairs' Hall, Independence, on Thursday evening next, Thanksgiving. The management will do all in their power to render the occasion a pleasant one. Everybody invited and a good time assured.

Hale Brothers & Co. of Sacramento have prepared for the Christmas trade. Orders sent are always filled with scrupulous care and customers can secure in that way anything wanted quite as well as if present at the store. See their new advertisement.

Ex-Governer Jewett Adams of Nevada spent a few days at Independence this week. Mr. Adams is largely interested in cattle and like others who suffered heavy loss in Nevada last winter he has been looking about with a view to finding safer winter range.

Last Saturday a party of Indians killed Mrs. D. M. Farmer at Anton in Antelope Valley. They also shot Louis F. Clark and left him for dead and fired at a boy, who escaped. Sheriff Aguirre of Los Angeles started in pursuit of the murderers, who are supposed to be half-breeds.

On Sunday a week hence a very interesting service of song will be given at the M. E. Church. The programme is carefully prepared and constant practice is kept up by all who intend to take part. The service will begin at the usual hour, seven o'clock in the evening. Everybody invited to attend.

John Alexander left town yesterday for Death Valley, his only company being five donkeys packed with a camping outfit. He intends prospecting in the valley and surrounding mountains for several weeks. Mr. Alexander knows the country well and feels quite safe in going there alone.

Yesterday a favorite horse belonging to Mrs. S. A. Densmore died at Camp Independence. Sheridan was aged 25 years, 7 months and 12 days. He was foaled in Inyo county and from birth till death was never owned by anybody but Mrs. Densmore. In his old age he had all the care and comfort a horse could enjoy.

In the Report of the Superintendent of the State asylum for the insane at Stockton one of the causes of insanity is stated to be reading trashy novels. Young people by the thousands are addicted to this habit which may be called a vice. Parents and guardians of the young should do all in their power to keep trashy novels out of reach of those not wise enough to select proper reading matter.

A great deal of ore is being shipped from Keeler. Darwin supplies much of this and Fitzgerald's mine at Modock sends out a large quantity every week. One team is hauling steadily down from Cerro Gordo the ore coming from the Dunphy & O'Keefe mine. The proper name of this mine is "Noonday," and it is now developed into a very valuable property. The ore body is described as being like that in the Union mine in its palmy days, that turned out several millions of dollars.

Last Tuesday George Lewis and White Smith left town for Lee Mining District. There is a large quantity of low grade ore in the district; it carries about forty five per cent. lead and fifteen to twenty ounces silver per ton. At the present price of lead it is believed that the ore can be delivered at San Francisco and leave a good profit to the miners. It is estimated to be worth between sixty and seventy dollars per ton at the mine. The ledges are big, the ore easily mined, and if it will pay at all a large number of men can be employed. It is to determine this point that the trip is made to the district.

SUPERVISORS' PROCEEDINGS.

FRIDAY, November 14th.

On the above named day the Board of Supervisors of Inyo county, State of California, met in regular session at 10 o'clock a. m., Present, Harger, Sneden, Robinson and Stewart. Chairman Robinson presiding. Minutes of preceding meeting read and approved.

An Old Carpenter's Experience!

A carpenter who is nearly seventy-two years old picked up a handsaw in town yesterday. He said that in his younger years all the saws in use in the United States were imported from England. The cost was much greater than the price of saws now. A heavy duty was imposed upon imported saws, and the first effect was to increase the price. But saw factories were started in the United States, and it was not long before saws were offered much cheaper than ever imported saws had been sold for. Not only was the price lowered but the home made saw was a far better tool than the imported saw. This long experienced workman says he would rather pay a fair price for an American made saw than take an English saw as a gift. The American saw is far superior to the English in quality and style of make. Such are the results aimed at in the policy of protection.

Transforming A Desert.

Antelope Valley, south of Mojave, in Kern County, is as barren looking a region as can be found on the Pacific Coast. Cactus and sage brush are all that is seen there in the way of vegetation, and so far as we know, there is not a running stream of water in the whole region. And yet settlers are fast gathering there, locating land and making homes. Water is found near the surface and with good cultivation the land needs but little water to make it fertile and produce good crops. If Owens valley could be reached by rail direct from Mojave, no settlers would locate in Antelope valley so long as enough land could be found here to make a far sized garden patch.

For Sale.

The ranch known as the "Rittgerolice" near Lone Pine is offered for sale together with the the farming implements and stock. The ranch contains 320 acres of excellent land. The stock consists of thirty head of cattle and twelve brood mares. There is now sixty tons of hay on the place and feed enough to winter 200 head of stock. The winter pasture has been rented five years past at $300 a year. The soil is a rich loam and excellently adapted to vegetable raising. There is plenty of outside range, making it a good stock ranch. For further particulars address

Lone Pine, Inyo County, Cal.

A new time table is issued for the V. & T. and C. & C. railroads. There is no change in the time of northbound trains leaving stations in Owens Valley. Southbound trains from Mound House arrive at Belleville one hour and ten minutes earlier than formerly, this being a welcome change. Southbound trains arrive at Owens Valley stations ten minutes later than before. See time table.

A Counter Irritant—The shopper who doesn' buy anything.

Beware of imitations of the genuine Seal of North Carolina Plug Cut Tobacco.

The turning point in woman's life brings peculiar weaknesses and ailments. Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription brings relief and cure. It is a powerful, invigorating, restorative tonic and nervine. It imparts strength to the whole system in general, and to the uterine organs and appendages in particular. "Run-down," debilitated and delicate women need it. It's a legitimate medicine—purely vegetable, perfectly harmless. It's guaranteed to give satisfaction in every case, or money refunded. Nothing else does as much. You only pay for the good you get. Can you ask more?

As a regulator and promoter of functional action, at that critical period of change from girlhood to womanhood, "Favorite Prescription" is a perfectly safe remedial agent, and can produce only good results. It is equally efficacious and valuable in its effects when taken for those disorders and derangements incident to that later and most critical period, known as "The Change of Life."

Children always Enjoy It.

SCOTT'S EMULSION

of pure Cod Liver Oil with Hypophosphites of Lime and Soda is almost as palatable as milk. Children enjoy it rather than otherwise. A MARVELLOUS FLESH PRODUCER it is indeed, and the little lads and lassies who take cold easily, may be fortified against a cough that might prove serious, by taking Scott's Emulsion after their meals during the winter season.

Beware of substitutions and imitations.

HAVE A CAB?

When you are addressed as above, your first impulse is to look at the driver. If the day be stormy and the driver is a wise man, you will find that he wears a "Fish Brand Slicker," and he will tell you that he is as comfortable on the box as his passenger in the cab, and that for his business this coat is invaluable. When you get once inside a "Fish Brand Slicker," there's no such thing as weather for you. It doesn't make the smallest difference whether it rains, hails, sleets, snows, or blows. You are absolutely and solidly comfortable. Get one at once. No danger of your not liking it afterwards. It is a waste of money to buy any other waterproof coat. They are worthless after a few weeks of hard usage. Beware of worthless imitations, every garment stamped with the "Fish Brand" Trade Mark. Don't accept any inferior coat when you can have the "Fish Brand Slicker" delivered without extra cost. Particulars and illustrated catalogue free.

A Collection of Crowns.

The next room (to the throne room of the Kremlin palace) contains probably the finest collection of jewels in the world, even more valuable than those of the holy synod, but not so rare and curious. Here is an assemblage of crowns, most of them coming from the palaces where the thrones were stolen, and some time worn by royal heads. The crowns of Poland, Kazan, Georgia, Astrakhan, Persia and others are more splendid, being covered with some of the largest and most precious stones ever known—"crowns upon crowns, oceans of pearls, rivers of diamonds," as one writer has expressed it. Beyond them are the ancient crowns of the czars, the double one for Peter the Great and his half witted brother being the most curious, and it sits before a double throne, with a place behind the drapery where their sister Sophia used to sit and prompt them what to do and say on occasions of ceremony.

The costliest crown in the entire collection was made by the order of Peter the Great for the Swedish peasant girl who became his wife and the Empress Catherine I, the number of diamonds in it being 2,536, all of them large, flawless stones of the first water, with the largest and finest ruby in the world as a crest. The crown of Ivan the Terrible has some of the rarest stones, very large and perfect turquoises and sapphires of great purity and value. In this room is a large casket of solid gold, which contains the code of the Czar Alexis.—W. E. Curtis in Chicago News.

Cooks Must Have Brains.

Every little while some public critic announces as a strange fact that some chef in a noted hotel gets more pay than a college president, or that the cook of some Vanderbilt or another is better paid than a congressman. Well, why not? Can a man be a good cook and at the same time a brainless ignoramus, not knowing the chemical substance and value of his concoctions? Without for a moment undervaluing scholarship, it may also be suggested that a college professor may be a man of vast acquirement, with little idividual power of his own, while a noted chef must possess inventive resources and a highly developed taste.

Really, the physical good that such a man might do the community by heading a large caravansary might quite balance the good mentally bestowed by any one professor. Doubtless, too, the value in health accruing to one rich family from a good cook might quite balance the good done to the community by any one average congressman. We should not underrate talents that make physical health if we want a good basis for mentality.—Boston Record.

Multiplication of the Arts.

Attention has already been called to the fact that among the lowest forms of life there exists a marvelous rate of reproduction. As life advances, and plants and animals are developed, the powers of reproduction are curtailed, until man, in the highest civilization, and in the highest culture of that civilization, is reached, when the rule of reproduction is at a minimum. In this state of culture the transfer of the struggle for existence from man to the works of his creation is completed. With this transfer there occurs another of wonderful nature. The marvelous powers of reproduction are transferred from the body of man to the soul of man, and he multiplies his intellectual creations at an amazing rate. Arts are multiplied to secure the joys of life, institutions are multiplied to secure justice, linguistics are multiplied to secure mental communication, and multiplied truths are discovered, so that the body of science is expanding toward the infinite and toward the infinitesimal.—Science.

A Momentous Subject.

A question agitating some of the quasi-scientific journals just now is, "Where do sea birds obtain fresh water to slake their thirst?" and the accepted answer is by catching raindrops as they fall. This seems a curious question and answer, and they naturally suggest the query, "Where do salt water fishes obtain fresh water to slake their thirst?" We never hear of the fishes standing erect on their tails, converting their mouths into funnels to catch the rain, although they may possibly do so sometimes as a special treat. Fishes are proverbially thirsty, and yet they apparently have to put up with salt water to drink. Oysters certainly must do so or go without; and probably the sea birds do the same, catching the drops of rain at suitable times as a change.—Chicago News.

True Agents in Minnesota.

In Minnesota a state law compels all agents for trees and nursery stock to have in their possession a certificate setting forth the name, occupation and residence of their principals, and a statement as to where the stock is grown, together with a bond in the sum of $2,000 to save harmless any citizen of the state who shall be defrauded by any false or fraudulent representations in any manner. Any agent refusing to comply as above is liable to fine and imprisonment.—Chicago Times.

Interesting Tapestries.

Two interesting tapestries, the "Marchande de Poissons" and the "Marchande de Legumes," signed Franz van der Borcht, have just been received at the Gobelins museum, to which they were bequeathed by M. His de Buteneval. The curiosities of the Gobelins have also been enriched by the present of a pair of Chinese tapestries, depicting celestial sheep, rams, hares and "roosters." The donor is M. Colin de Plancy, by whom these works were brought from China.—Chicago Herald.

A Case of Absent Mindedness.

Merchant (buying a bill of goods of Chicago drummer)—What is your usual time, thirty days?

Chicago Drummer (absentmindedly)—Yes, or $10. I always pay the fine—oh—er—I beg pardon; yes, thirty days, or 2 per cent off for cash.—The Epoch.

No Extra Charge.

Indignant Restaurant Diner—See here, waiter, you've spilt about a quart of soup down the back of my neck!

Waiter (suavely)—There'll be no charge for extra soup, sir.—Burlington Free Press.

Probable.

It is reported that Maurel, the French baritone, will come to this country this year at a salary not much less than $250,000. Some editor has probably hired him to amuse the children.—Oil City Blizzard.

The Sadic.

A Boston man proposes to exhibit a dog valued at $1,500 at the bench show. This must be the chap that advertises "three dollar pants."—Boston Bulletin.

A New Style of Dog Shows.

A crazy quilt made of sausages was a feature in Wilmington's "show beef market."—Cincinnati Times.

THE YOUNG PEOPLE.

A Bright Little Tot Who Was Made Glad by Papa's Happiness.

The father of a family becoming annoyed at the fault finding of his children over their food, exclaimed in a rare one day at dinner: "You children are intolerable; you turn up your noses at everything. When I was a boy I was often glad to get dry bread enough to eat." "Poor papa," said Rose, the pet of the family, "I am so glad you are having such nice times now living with mamma and us."—Boston Transcript.

Rough.

A short time since, while I was on a visit to my brother in the country, my little 6-year-old niece chanced to climb upon my knee.

Looking up and discovering the short growth of light colored and not over abundant whiskers on my chin, she exclaimed with sympathizing voice and grieved expression:

"Why, Uncle Charles, you have got splinters in your chin."—Boston Globe.

The Baked Light Enough.

Ernest, a 5-year-old, was awarded first prize for children's sayings for the following:

Being sent up stairs with a small basket of potatoes, after tugging them up half way, he set the basket down to get a fresh hold. An aunt of his standing at the head of the stairs said to him: "What is the matter, Ernest? Is the basket heavy?" "No," he says, "the basket ain't heavy, but the taters is."—Boston World.

If She Never Marries.

A few years ago Hastings' graded school had a good attendance of young misses from 10 to 14 years of age, and at a recess a group of these girls gathered around a new comer from the country, "getting acquainted," as it was termed, and one of the lot asked her her name. She gave it as Sarah Jane Annis Presley. "Is it to be continued?" queried one in an honest tone.—Detroit Free Press.

Physiological Problem.

"Can I ask you just one more question, papa, if it ain't foolish?" inquired Bobby, who had been badgering the old gentleman all the evening. "Ya-as, ya-as." "Why is it, papa, that the more a little boy's nose is stopped up the more he talks through it?"—Philadelphia Call.

Size Unknown.

A child in a Cass avenue car sat and stared at the feet of a man on the opposite side so long that he finally leaned forward and inquired:

"Do you want to trade feet, sissy?"

"Do you take [illegible] for an elephant?" she queried in return.—Detroit Free Press.

RINGERS AT THE DOOR BELL.

Excitements Incident to Life in a New York Flat—A Lady's Experiences.

They "come as the winds come when forests are rended, come as the waves come when navies are stranded," and each individual in the multitude seems to have some distinguishing peculiarity in his purpose or his method of attaining it. Broadly, however, they may justly be classified in five grand divisions—peddlers, beggars, thieves, swindlers and solicitors of favors. The margins of these divisions are necessarily ill defined, for the reason that individual representatives of either are so apt temporarily, under the temptation of opportunity, to merge themselves into the other classes. The ostensible peddlers are, of course, by far the most numerous. There were registered at the marshal's office during the past year 1,512 new licenses issued to this class of hawkers and 468 renewals, the former at $1 each and the latter twenty-five cents. But the marshals say that there is a great deal of neglect to renew the licenses of merchandise peddlers, either because they drift away from the city or choose to run the risk of being fined $10 for peddling without a license rather than pay twenty-five cents for its renewal. It is estimated that there are not less than 2,000 of these baskets carrying hawkers, besides whom there are many who conceal their wares in their pockets. A bright little lady who recently moved into an up town flat on the west side was requested to "keep tab" on her invaders for five days, and at the end of that time reported:

"If there are, as you say, only about 2,000 peddlers infesting New York, then they must be badly distributed, and I feel that I have had more than my share, for no less than thirty-seven have rung my bell this week. And such a variety of things they had! It would astonish you. I had no idea of half the things being peddled that I know now are sold in this way in New York. Why, they included cravats, suspenders, shoe laces, cheap jewelry, soap, rugs, matches, blacking, cheap candies, brushes, needles, tape, thread, buttons, garters, furniture polish, gas burners, plaster of paris thingummies, a sure cure for corns and bunions, stationery, a catarrh remedy, felt slippers, bamboo wristlets, a lot more things that I neglected to put down, and, would you believe it, liquors and lottery tickets? Nearly all the peddlers looked as if they were Jews, but those vending the last two things I name were not. The liquors were sold by a stout, elderly, good humored Irish woman, who carried quite a lot of little flasks of gin, whisky, and, I suppose, other liquors, though she said those two were most in demand among the ladies who bought from her. She had them in a basket, and said she had built up quite a good family trade, upon which she supported her husband, who was disabled by rheumatism, and her two younger children. The lottery tickets were sold by a lame man, who seemed to be English. He assured me that he sold a great many lucky tickets, and I would have a good chance to draw $300,000 if I bought a ticket for the next drawing, but he couldn't persuade me. Then he said that if I would like to try a little 'policy,' as a great many ladies did, on the dead quiet,' he would come around whenever I wished, get my numbers, make my plays and fetch my money to me. Of course I didn't. I am not such a fool.

"The next numerous class were the beggars. In some way, heaven and they only knew how—the janitor says he doesn't—nineteen of them, men and women, old any young, got up to my door in those five days. I began by giving a few pennies to nearly every one that came; they looked so miserable that I couldn't help it; but one thing happened that rather hardened my heart on the second day. An awfully ragged young fellow said he was starving, and really looked as if he was. I thought the quickest way to help him would be to give him a good big ham sandwich, so I told him to wait at the open door while I stepped into the kitchen and get it for him, and he seemed very grateful. I was back with it in a few moments, and he, thanking me effusively, turned away toward the stairs. Just as he did so I caught a bright metallic gleam at the back of his neck, and it flashed on me at once that that was the silver head of Jack's Sunday cane that had been in the stand inside the private hall near the door. On the impulse of the moment I sprang forward and clutched it. Sure enough it was. I hauled it out from under the tramp's coat, where he had poked it up, and took it into the kitchen to wash it, while he plunged down stairs without either of us saying a word.

"Another tramp, a great big fellow, with a most villainous countenance, when I told him I had nothing for him, said he would come in and see, and began to force his way in. I was frightened, for I was all alone, but did not let him see that I was. I just called out as loud as I could, 'Jack, come here, quick!' and that big tramp made such a scramble and tumble in getting down stairs that I could not help laughing. There was a woman, rather decently dressed, who wanted ten cents to help her get home to her sick husband in Cohoes, and she was so ashamed of having to ask charity, but her pocket had been picked of all the little money she had. I gave it to her, and Jack said when I told him that I was a little fool, for the game dated as far back as the time when there was a horse ferry to Brooklyn at least.

"About this entry on my list—'man with pup'—I was doubtful whether he ought to go down among the peddlers or the beggars, so I've left him standing alone. He came up with a fat, blinking, funny looking little pup in his hands, and asked me if I didn't want to buy a Newfoundland dog. I said that I didn't; that I never cared much for Newfoundlands, and thought St. Bernards were ever so much nicer. 'Why,' said he, 'that's what this pup is. My poor head is so bad ever since I had the fever that I can't remember names; but now you mentions it, it comes back to me that that's the name; he's a St. Bernard.' I saw the fellow was a fraud, and just to draw him out I said: 'Oh, how nice. That is the sort of dog that takes such good care of sheep in Scotland, isn't it?' And he said it was, the very kind. I told him I was sorry, but I had no sheep, and thought I would wait until I had them before buying a dog.—New York Sun."

An Easy Way.

"Say, Jimmie, le's you an' me go out west an' be train robbers," said one small boy to another as they sat in a hallway eating a nice, old Italian gentleman's bananas.

"How'll we do it?"

"W'y, easy enough. Jest go out there an' git on to trains with our pistols ready and make the passengers hold up their hands while we go through their pockets."

"Humph! I know an easier way than that to be a train robber."

"How?"

"Le's git to be train boys."—Chicago Times.

IMPORTANT NOTICE!

The People's Home Savings Bank, San Francisco

Takes pleasure in announcing to the public that its new system of 5-cent deposit stamps is about ready for general use, and will be introduced contemporaneous with its magnificent steel burglar and fire-proof safe-deposit vault that is now nearing completion.

This deposit stamp system has proved a marked success in England and Germany and in its present form has reached its most perfect development in Frankfort. It has also been shown to supply a long-felt want in such of our American cities as have had time to learn of it and to introduce it, notably in Detroit, where, as the cashier writes to us, 150,000 stamps were sold in the first seven weeks by the Citizens' Savings Bank.

The People's Home Savings Bank has been watching its operation for some time, and has even corresponded with foreign Consuls for fuller information of its workings and has learned that the beneficial effect claimed by Consul-General Mason in the March Consular Report, pages 481-486, is even understated, and that this simple system has done wonders in encouraging small savings and in pleasantly inculcating in youthful minds valuable lessons of thrift and economy. As Mr. Mason says:

The Frankfort Savings Bank has enjoyed from the first a substantial and constantly augmented success. It began in 1823 with 294 depositors, the aggregate of whose deposits was 86,934 marks. In 1870 the depositors numbered 12,311 and the capital of the bank had risen to 7,743,882 marks. From that date its prosperity increased rapidly, and was still further augmented by the opening of the penny savings stamp department, which took place in 1882, so that at the close of 1888 there were 56,697 depositors, with an aggregated capital of 38,215,697 marks. The receipts for that year alone were 6,319,276 marks and the disbursements on moneys withdrawn by depositors 5,151,602 marks.

Our new stamps are beautiful specimens of the steel engraver's art, direct from the printing office of the United States Government's stamps, and will be supplied to the public through our selected agents in all parts of the city in any quantities desired, a full list of our agents appearing shortly in these pages.

Our agents will receive the name and address of any girl or boy, small or large, or any grown person that desires to deposit in the bank, and will give such depositor, free, on purchasing at least two stamps for 10 cents, a blank-book with ten leaves in it, each leaf ruled in twenty spaces for twenty stamps. This book bears a number, and each leaf the same number. The number of this book, with the name, is sent by the agent to the bank. Whenever any depositor has filled a sheet with twenty stamps, it is mailed by the agent or by the depositor to the bank and then the first dollar is entered on your regular savings-bank deposit book and your money begins at once to earn the regular ordinary deposit interest, and so on with every successive leaf in the book ruled off in spaces; and as fast as one book is finished you secure another, and so continue adding to your savings-bank deposit and providing for a rainy day in the safest and most effectual way yet devised by the skill of man.

On this occasion we would also remind the public that we are now building the most elaborate and secure safe deposit vault on our coast, and at its completion we shall take pleasure in inviting a critical inspection of all its features. It has five layers of steel, four of which are of the peerless Brooklyn welded chrome steel and one of Bessemer steel. And our safes will not only prove the best possible treasury of your valuables, but the prices will be within reach of the most modest purse.

In thanking the public for the unbroken and increasing support and encouragement we have received in all our efforts from the very beginning, we beg to assure them we shall always strive to prove ourselves worthy of this unparalleled confidence. Address—People's Home Savings Bank, San Francisco, Cal.

SHAKEN OUT OF GEAR.

By malarial disease, the human machinery cannot half perform its office. Digestion, secretion, circulation are disordered, the blood becomes watery, the nerves feeble, the countenance ghastly, sleep disturbed and appetite capricious. Terrible is this disease, fell its consequences. There is, however, a known antidote to the miasmatic poison, and a certain safeguard against it. In malarious regions of our South and West, in South America, Guatemala and on the Isthmus of Panama, as well as in transmarine countries where the scourge exists, this inimitable preventive and remedy, Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, has, during the last thirty-five years, been constantly widening the area of its usefulness, and demonstrating its sovereign value. Liver complaint, dyspepsia, constipation, kidney trouble, rheumatism and debility are all remedied by it.

P. HINKLE'S PATENT CENTRIFUGAL ROLLER QUARTZ MILL

THIS cut shows the New Hinkle Centrifugal Quartz Mill, with plates and slummer. This is the only mill made that needs no oil for the inside working parts, as it is thoroughly lubricated with water, supplied from a circular tank, which is connected to the roller spindles, slides and drips by rubber hose. By this means oil cannot interfere with perfect amalgamation. Other features of superiority are: Simplicity of construction; the free discharge of pulp; the wearing parts are easily replaced at a small cost. The small amount of power required to run the mill will recommend it to all practical mill men, as well as the small cost of erection and transportation of mill to the mine. A 5-foot mill weighs 9,000 lbs.; pulverizers 38 in. diam.; run, 80 to 90 rev. per minute, with a capacity of 20 tons per day. This size mill costs $1,500. With Silver Plates, Slummer and Ore Feeder, $1,800.

P. HINKLE'S PATENT ORE FEEDER.

Positive Feed and Ready Adjustment.

IN this Improved Ore Feeder the falling tappet of the mill causes a backward movement of the feeding-tray. As the ore comes from the hopper on to the tray, a transverse bar prevents the ore moving backward, and a small portion of the ore is thus forced off the front edge of the feeding-tray into the battery. The amount of movement of the feeding tray may be regulated, thus regulating the feed of ore. This feeder can be arranged for roller mill or stamps. It is strong and durable, and feeds wet or dry ore in regular quantities.

Relics in a Swiss Museum.

The museum in Neuchatel is an unusually interesting one, and the traveler does not experience that sensation of weariness which is often felt in visits to similar places. One room is filled with animals, stuffed of course, which are found in the higher Alps, many of which are now extinct. Wolves, white and brown bears, foxes, white hares, chamois steinbocks, all are there, most beautifully stuffed and preserved. I have said that some of these animals are no longer to be found in the mountains, but it would have been more correct to have stated that they have retreated before the civilizing hand of man, for it is believed that bears, and certainly wolves, are to be found on the higher peaks, where no foot of Alpine climber has penetrated.

In the next room are the models of the lake houses and the curious relics of the ages of stone and bronze which have been found imbedded in the mud and slime at the bottom of the lake. The date of these remains cannot be determined. Opinions differ, but all agree on one point—that they certainly existed before the time of Julius Cæsar. The houses were cleverly built on four iron rods sunk deeply in the mud at the bottom of the lake and supporting a kind of platform, on which the hut rested, and the inhabitants reached the shore by means of canoes made of hollowed trees. The reason apparently of their choosing the lake as a dwelling place was to protect themselves from the numbers of wild and fierce animals with which the country was infested. Indeed it is evident that it was then little more than a vast marsh or morass.

In the same room with the models are some grotesque ornaments worn by the woman and some equally extraordinary weapons worn by the men. In another room are the skulls of some of these ancient beings. Very flat and receding are they, and the inspection goes far to strengthen one's belief in Darwin's theory that their possible ancestors may have been an ape like tribe.

There is no national costume worn by the Neuchatel peasantry now, but in many of the cottages you may see old pictures, roughly but brightly colored, representing the dress worn in days long gone by. A delightful excursion is by the little lake steamer as far as Morat, a quaint old world town about three hours' distance from Neuchatel. Here are funny old streets, narrow and furnished with arcades built of stone, under which are the oddest little shops imaginable.—Cor. San Francisco Chronicle.

Gluttony Versus Intellectuality.

Gluttony tends to cynicism. Coarseness and extravagance of speech and manners go hand in hand with dietetic excesses, as, for cognate reasons, the repulsiveness of voracious animals is generally aggravated by a want of cleanliness. Among the natives of the Arctic regions, where climatic causes make gluttony a pandemic vice, personal cleanliness is an almost unknown virtue, and Kane's anecdotes of polar household habits depict a degree of squalor that would appall a gorilla. Habitual abstemiousness, on the other hand, is the concomitant of modesty, thrift, self control and evenness of temper, and is compatible with heroic perseverance, though hardly with great energy of vital vigor. The dietetic self denials of Luigi Cornaro, a Venetian nobleman of the Sixteenth century, enabled him to outlive the third generation of his epicurean relatives. During the latter decades of his long life he boasts of having enjoyed a peace of mind unattainable by other means.

There are intellectual voluptuaries whose enjoyment of mental triumphs in controversy or cogitation seem, for the time being, actually to deaden their craving for material food. Isaac Newton, on the track of a cosmic secret, would send back plate after plate of untasted meals. Percy Shelley, in the words of his sprightly biographer, "indignantly refused to alloy the nectar of poetic inspiration with boarding house soup," and in his creative moods rarely answered a dinner call without a sigh of regret. Benedict Spinoza, amid the parchment piles of his bachelor den, would fast for days in the ecstasy of his "Gott trunkenep"—"God intoxicated"—meditations.—Dr. Felix L. Oswald in Open Court.

Medical Value of Peppermint Oil.

In addition to being, from its potency and other advantages, the best of surgical antiseptics, it is possible that there lies in oil of peppermint a power for good and a field of therapeutic utility vaster in extent and importance than any yet known or suspected. Some cases of phthisis, in which I have employed it as an inhalation, lead me to hope that we may find in it a remedy against the scourge to which we pay annually a tribute of 10,000 lives.

In diphtheria, the greatest of all desiderata has always been such an antiseptic as this—one which may be fearlessly applied in the greatest quantity and the greatest frequency, which is innocuous, whether it be swallowed during its application, or be respired into the air passages, and which, by its absorption into the blood and its ready volatility, is enabled to penetrate to every recess, and be carried through all the tissues. Two cases of typical diphtheria in male adults, part of a small epidemic, some among the victims of which died with its worst features, have been treated by applications of oil of peppermint.

These cases afford ground for believing, therefore, that this drug may be also a potent weapon in diphtheria. Recovering so completely and so speedily as they did, their progress resembles neither that of "ordinary" ulcerated pharyngitis, treated or not by the usual means, nor of diphtheria as it has progressed in cases I have seen treated by the inefficient local antiseptics in vogue.—London Lancet.

Relief for Ivy Poisoning.

I was repeatedly poisoned by ivy when a boy, and found no relief till an uncle told my mother to give me a tablespoonful of thoroughwort tea each morning before eating during the month of May, and I never would be poisoned again. She followed his directions, and the result was I never have been poisoned since, although I was exposed to it more or less each summer for a number of years afterward. The above may not be a sure cure in all cases, but it is worth trying, as it can do no harm if it does no good.—Albert S. Trask in Scientific American.

Life in the Deep Sea.

The exploring vessels of our fish commission have discovered in the deep sea, in one single season, more forms of life than were found by the Challenger expedition in a three years' cruise. Through their agency we have studied the geographical distribution of marine life; and in our marine laboratories explorers have studied the life history of the most useful forms.

The knowledge gained has enabled us to breed and multiply at will; to protect the young fish during the period of their infancy (when alone they are liable to wholesale destruction); finally to release them in the ocean, in those waters that are most suitable to their growth. The fecundity of fish is so great, and the protection afforded them during the critical period of their life so ample, that it may now be possible to feed the world from the ocean, and set the laws of Malthus at defiance. Our geographers of the sea have shown that an acre of water may be made to produce more food for the support of man than ten acres of arable land. They have thrown open to cultivation a territory of the earth constituting three-quarters of the entire surface of the globe.—Gardiner G. Hubbard, president National Geographic society.

Eating Elephant's Flesh.

The lower class of the Burmese people are very fond of elephant's flesh, cutting it up in long strips and drying these in the sun in a somewhat similar fashion as the buccaneers of old preserved pieces of beef and fish. This dried meat is eaten without being cooked, and is much relished. It is sometimes pounded in a wooden mortar to be more easy of mastication for the aged.—Cor. San Francisco Chronicle.

A French Flower Farm.

A French flower farm of about seventeen acres was planted with 45,000 tufts of violets and 140,000 roots of the white jasmine, with roses, pelargoniums, tuberoses and jonquils. A laboratory was erected for the manufacture of perfumes, and in the fourth year after planting lucrative results were obtained.

Mortality of English Infants.

It is said that 40 per cent. of all the deaths from poison in Great Britain are due to opium, and this rate of mortality, according to Dr. Wynter Blythe, "arises in a great measure from the pernicious practice, both of hard working English mothers and the baby farmer, of giving infants 'soothing syrups,' 'infants' friends,' and the like, to allay restlessness and keep them asleep during the greater part of their existence." It has been calculated that one preparation alone is the undoubted cause of death of 150,000 children every year.—Public Opinion.

A Deaf Cow.

Evidence exists that deaf mutes are not confined to the human race. In a farmer's herd for twelve years was a cow which never gave any signs of hearing, and whose evident attempts at lowing resulted only in a feeble guttural. Nothing abnormal could be discovered in the ears nor in the vocal organs.

Foreigners in Russia.

An interesting paper issued by the Russian ministry of the interior informs us that the yearly average number of foreigners arriving in Russia is over 800,000, and those who leave the country 750,000. Exact statistics of the years 1872–81 have been kept, and it appears that during these ten years 9,458,132 foreigners arrived and 8,625,128 departed. The nine and a half millions of arrivals are thus classified: Germans come first, with 4,871,571; then Austrians, 1,305,143; Persian subjects number 255,207; French, 122,771; Turkish subjects, 70,387; Roumanians, Bulgarians and Servians, 41,878; English, 20,691; Italians, 17,359; Greeks, 14,835, and all other nationalities 120,638. In recent years most of the foreigners who have settled in Russia have chosen as their place of residence the western and Baltic provinces, the two capitals, and the larger towns on the Volga. The German population of Russia, who remain German subjects, is found chiefly in St. Petersburg, Reval, Moscow and Nijni-Novgorod; the French in Warsaw, St. Petersburg, Moscow, Kiev and Odessa; Austrian subjects in Kamenitz-Podolsk, Volhynia and Kiev; Greeks, Turks and Italians in Odessa and in all the towns of the Crimea and of the Caucasus; the English settle near their native element in the ports; and a few citizens of the United States live in St. Petersburg and Odessa.—London Times.

Where Terrapins Are Found.

And now for the terrapin. Here Baltimore is way ahead of New York. In metropolitan restaurants they do not cook the terrapin as we do here at its home. But metropolites, on the other hand, are not crazy over the dish like we are here.

Terrapins are found in heavy marshes. The bog is in most cases very deep. The terrapin is not accommodating. He doesn't come up to you and let you walk off with him. Oh, no! His terrapinship simply buries himself deep down in the mud, and you must needs be an expert if you would lay hands upon his shell. These marshes, like all other marshes, are littered with little tufts of sod here and there. The hunter steps from one to the other and drives down a long pole or spear. Then he feels around cautiously, and an expert terrapin hunter can always tell the moment his spear touches the shell of his prey. Then the spear point is shoved under the terrapin, and bit by bit he is fished up to the surface to be captured in a net such as is used in crabbing. The best terrapins are sold in Baltimore for about $25 per dozen.—Baltimore Cor. New York Evening Sun.

Last Year's Immigration.

I got a glimpse the other afternoon of the proof sheets of the forty-first annual report of the Castle Garden emigration commissioners, to be presented to the legislature. The total arrivals at the port for the year were 450,845. The alien immigration, compared with that of 1868, shows an increase of 83,591. Of the aliens, 241,023 were adult males; 100,646 were adult females, and 63,736 were children of both sexes under 12 years of age. Their nationalities embrace almost every country on the face of the earth, including the following: Malta, 298; Syria, 175; Burmah, 170; Turkey, 169; Armenia, 161; Iceland, 158; Australia, 36; Arabia, 22; Japan, 13; South Africa, 11; New Zealand, 11; India, 8; Egypt, 4; Sandwich Islands, 4; Java, 1; Morocco, 1; St. Helena, 1; Peru, 1.—New York Cor. Philadelphia Ledger.

Novel Test for Pork.

Sausages, cooked or half raw, highly spiced, are an essential of German cookery. In order to prevent the Germans from exposing themselves to a number of bad diseases incidental to pork, the authorities insist upon the pigs being examined before being offered for sale. A peasant was arrested for evading this law, and upon being asked to explain, said that he had a most accurate method of determining the soundness of pork. The pastor of the district was always hungry, so the peasant always sent him the first sausage made from each pig slaughtered, and a week later called to inquire his health. If it was all right the pork went to the market, and examination fees were saved.—New York Sun.

A Pathetic Incident.

One of the pathetic things about the last days of Emperor William was his separation from the afflicted crown prince. His physician went into his room at 4 o'clock in the morning and found the monarch sitting up in bed and crying like a child. He exclaimed: "Doctor, I cannot sleep for thinking of Fritz. For Heaven's sake, hurry and make preparations to let me go to San Remo to be with him."—New Orleans Times-Democrat.

Hybridization of Plants.

Studies on the cross fertilization and hybridization of plants have shown that in the cross fertilization of our common vegetables the tendency is toward atavism, or a reversion to some primitive ancestral form, rather than toward the production of a plant possessing qualities common to a number of present existing species.—Globe-Democrat.

An Ancient Perfume.

Saffron, or the dried stigmas of a certain purple crocus, was valued among the ancients for its perfume. The floors of their halls and mansions, and even of their theatres, were strewn with it. Its flavor was greatly appreciated, and it was much employed in seasoning dishes.—Chicago Herald.

A Tree That Is Put to Many Uses.

The camanba is certainly a wonderful tree, according to a report made to the state department by Consul Burke, of Bahia. It grows in the northern states of Brazil near the Amazon river. Every part of it—root, rootlet, branch and trunk—is available; it is indispensable for the natives in building and roofing their huts, making fences, etc., while the articles made from it supply them with food, light and medicine. It is a species of palm tree and grows in dry, sandy soil. The bulb (the size depending upon the size of the tree) is strongly farinaceous, and when dried and ground produces a kind of farischa used for food by the natives, while the rootlets of the bulb are used for medicine, possessing a strong cathartic property.

The trunk, while the tree is young, contains a soft oleaginous substance, something like marrow; this is good food for cattle, sheep, goats and hogs. After the tree attains a growth of several years the trunk becomes very hard and can then be used for building purposes. The lower part of the branches, which grow to a length of 8 to 10 or 12 feet, are chiefly used for fences. They are wide and flat at the bottom and tapering toward the top, with short, hard and very sharp thorns at the edges, in appearance not unlike the mouth of a saw fish. The fence made from this material is very strong.

The leafy part of the branch, when cut and sun dried, gives an exudation which appears on the fan like leaf or blade. It is a tenacious substance possessing properties very similar to beeswax. This wax is extensively used for making candles. The leaf or blade has a fiber from which hats, mats, baskets, rope, brooms, dusters, etc., are made. When the exudation is scraped from the blades of palm the branches are used for roofing huts and small houses and for protecting brick walls from the fierce rays of the sun, as well as from the rain. The fruit of the tree is sweet and palatable. The kernel or seed is pounded to powder and used in infusion in place of coffee.—Chicago Herald.

An Extraordinary Irishman.

Dion Boucicault, who is as clever as he is erratic, is now in his 68th year, though he says that he has lived at least ten centuries. It is thirty-seven years since he came to this country, and during that period has, it is said, become a citizen of the United States four times, returning after each naturalization to Great Britain to renew his loyalty to the queen. Up to date the number of pieces he has written, translated and adapted for the stage is about 180. Although it has been customary to speak of him as an inimitable plagiarist, he has done a great deal of original work, notably in such dramas as "London Assurance," "Old Heads and Young Hearts," "The Octoroon," "Arrah nah Pogue," "The Rapparee" and "The Shaughraun." On the other hand, for him to call himself the author of "Used Up," "Louis XI," "The Corsican Brothers," "Faust and Marguerite," when the originals are so well known, is a degree of astonishing impudence that might be styled Boucicaultism.

It used to be asked, when it was mentioned that Boucicault had written a new play, "Whose play has he written?" and not without a modicum of justice. If he borrows liberally, if he appropriates wholesale, it is not because he lacks invention and ingenuity, of which he has abundance, but because he wants to make money. He has gained half a dozen fortunes, and lost them all.—New York Commercial Advertiser.

Philosophy of Dining.

One of the old Greek philosophers was once approached with the question as to the hour of the day at which one should take his dinner. The answer was characteristic. "If you are rich," said the wise man, "you will dine whenever you please; if you are poor, whenever you have anything to eat." This same philosophy seems to be accepted by the Turks of the present time, judging by what Mr. Barkley says of the practice of this people.

There is a peculiarity about Turkish cooking. Wherever you are, and at whatever time of the day you ask, "When will dinner be ready?" the answer is always the same. "In ten minutes," and yet I have had all sorts of dishes on the table at the same time. I don't know how it is managed, but I think it is an improvement on our English plan of having to keep to a fixed hour. If no order is given dinner is served as a matter of course at sundown, and this habit is usual among all classes.

We were somewhat surprised one day at Cianthe, our Greek cook, asking, "Please, sare, what time you eat your dinner today?" We answered, "When we are hungry."

"Vera good, sare, 'cos me get one booful dinner—ros' bif, sare. One buffalo he fall over cliff last night and break him neck!"—Youth's Companion.

Swallowed a Bird's Head.

Mrs. R. A. Weston, of Alamenda, Cal., had a narrow escape from suffocation. She was playing with a pet canary and pushed the bird's head into her mouth. Just then she grew hysterical and shut her teeth together, so as to strangle the bird. Her daughter pulled the canary and severed its head, which got into Mrs. Weston's gullet. She was black in the face when the obstruction was removed.

Why He Was Remembered.

Remembrance is not always complimentary. A man who was sadly given to borrowing died very suddenly. During the funeral services, a comrade took occasion to say: "There is nothing lost of this man but a lump of mortal clay."

The astonishment of the people was intense when an old man grumbled out audibly:

"Is too! I lend him more as dree hundredt tollah, und don'd ket pack von cendt!"—Youth's Companion.

Amateur Photography.

Amateur Photographer (to a drowning man)—Hi! I say, my friend, hold on for a minute before you go down for the last time. You're doin' the death struggle splendidly, and I want to make just one more exposure.—Judge.

A Transaction of a Moment.

I was on the street the other day with a friend when we met his wife. It was a stormy day. She wanted a pair of rubbers; said the price was a dollar. He ran his hand in his pocket and said something about "unfortunate." I saw the pickle. "Let me lend you a dollar," I said, and he replied that he would. That morning I had put $5 in one pocket for the necessaries of life. In the other pocket I had placed $1 for luxuries with the boys. I handed him out the money, and he led his wife away to appease her growing expectations. I soon discovered that I had given my friend the $5 note. However, I knew he was honest and didn't worry. I met him several hours after. He was excited and fatigued. He said in bated breath:

"You gave me five dollars instead of one."

I said I had made that discovery, but knew it was all right.

"But it isn't all right," he exclaimed, growing more excited. "See here," he continued, "I went with her into the shoe store, see? I says to the man, 'Give me a pair of dollar rubbers, women's size.' He did so, and she put them on. I laid down the bill you had loaned me. The clerk says: 'I will hand you the change.' That was the first intimation I had that the bill was more than $1 in denomination. The clerk came back and laid down $4. My wife picked it up and said that was just the amount she wanted and walked out. I owe you $5 which I didn't mean to borrow, and I haven't it to pay."

It put me in a corner, because it was the only $5 I had and I had promised that change to my wife.—Chicago Tribune.

The Agonies of Composition.

Dickens, when he intended to write a Christmas story, shut himself up for six weeks, living like a hermit, and came out looking as haggard as a murderer.

Balzac, after he had thought out thoroughly one of his philosophical romances and amassed his materials in a most laborious manner, retired to his study, and from that time until his book went to press society saw him no more. When he appeared again among his friends he looked, said his publisher, in the popular phrase, like his own ghost. The manuscript was afterward altered and copied, when it passed into the hands of the printer, from whose slips the book was rewritten for the third time. Again it went into the hands of the printer—two, three and sometimes four separate proofs being required before the author's leave could be got to send the perpetually rewritten book to the press, and to have done with it. He was literally the terror to all printers and editors.

Tennyson is reported to have written "Come Into the Garden, Maud," more than fifty times over before it pleased him; and "Locksley Hall," the first draft of which was written in two days, he spent the better part of six weeks, for eight hours a day, in altering and polishing.—Public Opinion.

A Queer Submerged Railway.

Spain has a novelty in the way of a submerged railway. It runs through the surf off Orcton, near Bilboa, 650 feet out into the ocean. The mines of Orcton are extremely rich in iron, but there is no harbor there and great difficulty has heretofore been experienced in getting the ore off to ships. Now that the submerged railway has been built it is a simple matter. It runs out into deep water, and an iron tower seventy feet high, worked by counter balances, runs from the cliffs to the waiting vessels, which are moored bow and stern in the roadstead.

When the tower arrives at the ship its top, bearing its load of ore, is about even with the vessel's deck. As soon as the iron is loaded on to the ship the weight of the counterbalances pulls the tower back to the cliff, where it runs up to the mouth of a chute and automatically opens its mouth. The chute comes down from the mines and, when it has dropped on the tower enough ore to overcome the weight of the counterpoise, the tower starts away to sea again. This sort of thing is kept up until the vessel is filled. All that is necessary to do to start the tower on its peregrinations and put the submarine railway in operation is for the miners to drop ore into the chute.—New York Tribune.

The American a Glutton.

The average American, although a colossal eater, does not at present know how to dine. This is a home truth which he resents extremely, and contradicts with vigor; indeed, he is apt to introduce comparisons between the restaurants of his own and other lands which invariably leave a large balance in favor of Delmonico's. Still, spite of an occasional exception, the American born gastronome is as rare a bird as the American born chef of any serious pretensions.—Cornhill Magazine.

Poverty and Conceit.

I have heard a great many things said in my time against poverty, but never till the other day, when a clever woman made the suggestion, did it occur to me that poverty tends to make a man conceited. Her argument was as follows: A poor man has to earn his living, and the mere fact that he does so leads him to think highly of himself, whereas the rich man, who lives on the interest of money acquired originally by an ancestor near or remote, makes no living, is not even certain that he could make one, and consequently remains in a humble, or at least in a modest, state of mind.—Boston Post.

The Cowcatcher Not Patented.

It is said that the common cowcatcher attachment to locomotives is about the only article of universal use that has never been patented. Its inventor was D. B. Davies, of Columbus, who found his model in the plow. Red lights on the rear of trains, it is further said, were adopted at the suggestion of the late Mrs. Swisshelm, after a railway accident in which she had a narrow escape.—Parker (Kan.) Pilot.

A DEALER IN SMALL COIN

A Unique Business That Amounts to Millions of Dollars Every Year.

Every working day, cloud or sunshine, during banking hours, a faded wagon of slight frame and leather covering, drawn by a Rosinante, with a meek visage and the cut of a worker, may be seen standing a few minutes at a time in front of some one or another of the many banks that abound in the neighborhood of City Hall. From this wagon descends a man with an active tread and dark hair graying under the rains of probably fifty springs. In his hand he holds a canvas bag of large size and evidently of heavy weight, which he draws from the back of the wagon, and with which he enters a nearby bank. If he does not take a bag into the bank the process is reversed and he emerges with a large bag of money, deposits it in the wagon and drives off rapidly.

Few are better known to the opulent business men of the city and less known to the public at large than Theodore V. Smalley. Mr. Smalley's occupation is that of a broker, a title borne by scores of wealthy and worthy citizens, residents of the city, and not sufficient in itself to distinguish its bearer's avocation in life as in any way remarkable. But the nature of the brokerage business that Mr. Smalley has transacted for over the last twenty years is unique. No one else in this city is in the same sense a broker. One or two others, perhaps, are in New York, which city, however, Mr. Smalley includes to a certain extent in his field of operations.

He is a money broker, is Mr. Smalley. To buying and selling money of the lowest denomination he devotes himself with singleness of purpose. Promising building lots are no temptation to him. He is indifferent to rises and falls in railway shares, and as innocent in puts and calls as a frolicsome kid of drawing room etiquette. Nay, it is even rumored that he cares not for even the elysium delights Gof the owanus canal.

Mr. Smalley buys pennies, nickels, dimes, quarters, half dollars and dollars from churches, banks and newspaper offices and places of amusement, and sells to big stores, factories, pawn offices, banks and large business houses. A profit of 1 per cent. in the dollar on pennies satisfies him, as will seventy-five cents profit on $1,000 in silver. Not often, he says, does he get more. It is in the magnitude of his transactions and not on the percentage that he finds profit. In a year he handles over $3,000,000. He is punctuality personified, and many are the large stores in which the clerks time the hour by his daily arrival, laden with strong bags with pennies and silver.

"Formerly," said Mr. Smalley, with a sigh, to the writer, "the profits were much greater. That was when trade dollars were in vogue, but now the business is down very fine and it is not on account of competition."

"Are you not afraid of being robbed?"

"I was robbed once, but I don't think I will be again. Around the banks robbing is almost impossible. There is no more secure place that I know of. Officer Kelly is a vigilant officer. He has been a long time on his beat and knows strangers at sight and the character and purpose of every loiterer."

It was on the 7th of March, 1881, that the sole robbery of which Mr. Smalley was the victim occurred. He had purchased early in the forenoon, and about a quarter of an hour previous to the robbery, several hundred dollars' worth of small money at The Eagle office, and had driven to St. Anne's church, on Front street, near Gold. While waiting a few moments in the pastoral residence for the Rev. Father McMeel a strange man took advantage of his absence, jumped into the wagon, and, driving off at a furious gallop, escaped pursuit. The robbery created a sensation at the time on account of the audacious manner in which it was effected. W. H. Morris, whose sobriquet is "Country Conklin," was arrested upon suspicion, tried and acquitted. The money amounted to $827, not a cent of which Mr. Smalley recovered.—Brooklyn Eagle.

A Wealthy Oil Man.

The richest man among the guild of oil producers is John McKeoun, of Washinton, Pa. About the time of the breaking out of the oil excitement on Oil creek he landed at Castle Garden with no more of this world's goods than thousands of other immigrants. His first work in the oil country was as a day laborer, with a pick and shovel, grading seats for oil tanks near Petroleum Centre. He became a contractor and built derricks and tanks for oil producers. When oil was found in the great Bradford basin in McKean county he got hold of some property and entered the list of producers. He had amazing good fortune and after operating in Bradford for several years left McKean county a comparatively rich man.

He also made a fortune in Butler county and then went to Washington county, where he opened up a great oil bonanza. The biggest wells in that wonderful territory have been his, and at times his income from his gushers has been as much as $25,000 a month. Mr. McKeoun puts on no style, and might be mistaken any day about his wells for one of his workmen. His wealth runs into the millions. The oil producer who ranks second to him in wealth is Thomas W. Phillips, of New Castle, Pa.—New York World.

Our Queer English.

A ship called the David E. Ward put into San Francisco in distress, and the papers of that city speak of "her" long voyage, "her" loss of spars, "her" arrival after many dangers, etc. The English language was evidently invented to sell as a puzzle. Had the ship been the Jenny P. Ward she would not have been referred to as "he." But why not?—Detroit Free Press.

One Character Saved.

Lawyer—I wouldn't believe Blinks under oath. In the witness box the other day he admitted that he rode in the street cars at the most crowded hours, generally had to stand up, and got his ears, toes and fingers frozen in them every winter, and yet he swore that he had no prejudice against the street car company.

Too Much to Stand.

American (in Canada)—As I was coming along the street I saw Mr. De Thief, the great American embezzler, being taken to the police station.

Canadian—Yes, Mr. De Thief is a very valuable addition to our society as he spends his money freely, but he must learn to obey our laws even if he is rich and generous.

"Eh? What has he been doing?"

Real Estate Deal.

Dairyman—Got any dairy farms for rent?

Agent—No, but I have a few acres which might do for one.

"Grass on it?"

"No, nothing but clay."

"Humph! Hasn't it ever been cultivated?"

"No; it used to be a brickyard."

"What is there on it, anything at all?"

"It has a never failing spring."

"I'll take it."—Omaha World.

The Prodigal Father.

"Have you strawberries?" he asked.

"Yes," said the dealer, with a shudder. He had invested his all in the mad speculation and two pint and two half pint baskets.

"Go me one, please; that red berry on top, if you will. It's my little girl's birthday, and I promised her something choice." And he laid down a shining piece of gold.—New York Sun.

A Delicate Compliment.

Miss Clara—Young Mr. Sampson paid me such a pleasant compliment last evening, Ethel.

FRIDAY NOVEMBER 28..... 1890

County Official Paper

Last Sunday night the Indians at Camp Independence beat the brains out of one of their number, a man known to the whites by the name of "Charley." He was a "medicine man" and is the third who has been murdered here in Owens Valley within a short time. The "medicine man" is always compelled to accept that position when chosen by his fellows. If three of the tribe die from natural causes, no matter what the disease may be, the life of the medicine man is forfeit and the Indians never fail to kill him. They say he is "all the same coyote" and causes the death of other Indians. The Indians of Owens Valley have now lived among white people over thirty years; they have learned to farm and many of them own horses, wagons and farm implements. They are fine workers, have plenty to eat, are improving their dwellings and most of them are comfortably, and many of them neatly dressed. They are gradually adopting the ways of civilized people externally but otherwise they are no further advanced than were their ancestors before the coming of the whites. Indeed in some ways they are worse than their savage progenitors. Nearly all of them, women as well as men, will drink whiskey as often as they can get it. The young woman hang about the towns and associate with white men more degraded than themselves. The Indians are untouched by the better part of white civilization; the best of the white people have no further intercourse with them than to hire them to work, pay them and have no more to do with them. The Indians are not decreasing in number; in fact they are increasing. There are more now in Owens Valley than were here twenty years ago. The increase is not due to immigration but is the result of more births and a lower death rate. This implies more comfort and better food. But such influence as the whites have upon them threatens to be a curse rather than a blessing. The Indians earn more money but this only leads to more gambling and drinking. There are no facilities for educating the young; the boys and girls run wild, or lurk about the towns learning nothing but evil. The white people are quite unable to undertake the work of educating the Indians; they are spending every dollar that can be spared for the educating of their own children. Last summer a young girl who has Indian blood in her own veins got the use of the old school house at Big Pine and opened a school for Indian children. About fifty attended, many of them traveling several miles each day. During three months she taught diligently and the progress made by her pupils excited admiration among the whole people. Many of the children who knew not one letter of the alphabet at the beginning of the term were able to read very well at the close and several could write legibly. All showed an ardent desire to learn. It is very deeply to be regretted that a people who show such great desire for education and a capacity for learning should be deprived of teachers and schools. In Inyo county there are at least five hundred Indian children of school age. There is but one way to provide for their education and that is for the General Government to do it. A moderate appropriation from the National Treasury would provide one or more schools here where all these young Indians could be fairly well educated and trained in the ways of civilization so that there would be an end to the cruel superstition that leads to so many terrible murders as the one that is a text for this article. Congressmen and Senators are laudably zealous in caring for wild animals, for forests, waterfalls and other inanimate things. If one or two of the few men who really make Senators and Congressmen will urge this matter in the right places our Indians will be provided with schools and will be trained, not in the worst, but in the best elements of white civilization.

AFTER LONGFELLOW.

"I hear the wind among the trees
Playing celestial symphonies,"
And out upon the moonlit bay
The breezes sound the "Boulanger,"
I hear the cyclone on the sea
Wafting "Sweet Violets" to me,
And I always drop a silent tear
To note that Johns plays by ear.

TABLE ETIQUETTE.

Some Useful Hints on the Uses of Knives, Forks, Spoons and Fingers.

Those who are very particular hold the large end of a spear of asparagus with a fork while with the tip end of a knife they daintily separate the tender green tops from the white end, which is then put aside. Others take the white end between the fingers and carry it to the mouth. Both are correct, but the former is much more dainty and easily done.

The etiquette of eating a soft boiled egg has been the subject of more than one clever essay. The English custom is to eat it directly from the shell, when of course a small egg cup and egg spoon are necessary. The American way is to break the egg into a cup or glass by striking the egg in the center and turning the contents into the glass. In this case it is usually eaten with a teaspoon, as an egg spoon, unless extra large, would be too small, and we have seen the egg held by a corner of the napkin, but this is not only tiresome but difficult to do nicely without soiling the napkin.

Celery is always taken from the dish and carried to the mouth by the fingers. If individual salts are not provided, it is etiquette to use one half of the butter plate for salt. If salt shakers are used, hold the celery in the left hand just over the rim of your plate and gently sprinkle it with salt, and the old custom of putting a spoonful of salt on the cloth is still in practice. When corn is served on the cob it must be taken in the fingers, only managed very daintily. We have seen pretty little doylies for the purpose of holding it, but it is a question if that is not carrying table linen too far. Many housekeepers, and especially in the south, serve corn as a separate course, when finger bowls are placed by each plate and removed with the course.

Lettuce when served without dressing is always pulled to pieces with the fingers. This is usually the lady's duty and there is no prettier picture than that of a young lady preparing a plate of fresh, crisp lettuce leaves in this way, for the tender green shows off to perfection her dainty white hands and she may be as exquisitely neat about it as she likes, and it is one of the most fascinating and becoming of table duties that a hostess can possibly provide for her lady guests, to assist in helping the gentlemen at a social or informal meal.

Watercress is also taken in the fingers and the prettiest way of serving it is to obtain a long low sided basket or dish, in the bottom of which lay a folded napkin, then heap the cress so as to fill the basket and you have not only an enjoyable, but a very ornamental dish for the breakfast table.

When a slice of lemon is served with fish or meat it is much more correct to take the slice in the fingers, double the ends together and gently squeeze the juice over the article than to use a knife for that purpose, as is sometimes done.

It is always proper to help one's self to bread, cheese and lump sugar, if tongs are not provided, with the fingers. Never use your own knife, fork or spoon to take from the dish. It is also correct if a plate of hot, unbroken biscuits is passed, to not only break off for yourself with your fingers, but for your neighbor also. When things are passed, help yourself as quickly as possible, for you must not keep others waiting and never insist on some one else being served before you, if the host or hostess has honored you first.—Mary Barr Munroe in Good Housekeeping.

Identified by His Head.

George Bowron, as everybody knows, is the leader of the Columbia orchestra. He is also one of the pleasantest gentlemen to be found within the city limits. A story is told about him which is good enough to be true, whether it is or not. In the course of events during the last summer, Mr. Bowron received a draft for money. I think Mr. Bowron's draft came from his estate in England, and that in view of his recent marriage he had instructed his steward to quit stacking the estate fund up in the bank, and to send him a small wad. Anyway he had the draft, and he took to a bank and handed it through the little brass window to the cashier. This gentleman looked at Mr. Bowron, who blushed, as he always does when people stare at him.

"Are you Mr. Bowron?" asked the cashier.

"I believe I am."

"Well, but you'll have to be identified."

"But I'm Bowron—George Bowron, leader of the orchestra at the Columbia."

"Oh, I know George Bowron is all right enough, but I don't know that you're the man. Just bring somebody that we know to identify you.

Mr. Bowron was moving away in disgust at the red tape and circumlocution which reality makes necessary in all professions, when the cashier called him back.

"Would you mind turning your back to me and taking off your hat?" he asked.

Mr. Bowron did so.

"Here's your money, Mr. Bowron. It's all right. I've known the back of your head for five years.—Chicago Journal.

Florida is putting its best resorts in readiness for the expected winter tourists. Lawn tennis courts are being arranged, vegetables are being planted in large quantities, boats are being prepared and as the announcements say, "No efforts will be spared to make life a pleasure and to give such healthful outdoor sports as will build up those who are run down from overwork, or will give a new lease of life to those afflicted with pulmonary or asthmatical diseases."

One of the points especially noted by military observers during the recent maneuvers abroad, where smokeless powder was used, was that in a clear atmosphere, unobscured by the smoke of battle, all bright accoutrements were seen at a great distance, thus betraying the positions of the various bodies of troops.

The czarowitch, the eldest son of the czar, who is to make an American tour, is a handsome young man of 23. He has a tall figure, a powerful physique and is a colonel in the Imperial guard. He is said to show considerable talent for the military profession.

It is estimated that one horse power of electric energy will furnish ample heat for a street car without smoke or dust or reduction of seating capacity.

Mr. Asher Cohn came down from Bishop on Wednesday.

The young people wound up Thanksgiving at Independence by a dance at Mairs' hall.

Mr. D. Olds of Round Valley passed through town last Tuesday on his way to Los Angeles.

Wanted—A large supply of soap to cleanse dirty linen. Apply to the newspapers of Carson.

Chris Chron, who has been in Sonoma County for several years, returned to Lone Pine recently.

Mr. W. Bollinger got back to Chrysopolis last Monday after an absence of nearly two months at San Francisco.

Mr. G. P. Rixford of San Francisco was at the marble quarry several days. He went north yesterday morning.

Frank Cox was brought to the County Hospital a few days ago, being very sick with consumption, He has worked in the mines about Darwin for several years.

The Reno Gazette wants to take from us our third United States Senator. California is proud of John P. Jones and hopes he will make his home among us as long as he lives.

Doctor Woodin states that Mr. W. Walker of Olancha is slowly but steadily improving in health. Pap came very near gaing under but his friends will be glad if he gets well again.

It is reported that Indians are committing more depradations in Antelope Valley and are insolent and threatening in their actions. The valley is partly in Kern and partly in Los Angeles Counties.

The Supreme Court of the United States has again affirmed that the law of New York for the execution of criminals by electricity is constitutional. This judgment was given in the case of a Japanese named Shibuya Jugiro who is under sentence of death in New York.

Mr. T. J. Goodale was taken quite ill last Monday evening. He was on his way from his home at Fish Springs to Independence, where he had been summoned to appear as a Grand Juror. When he reached town Dr. Blair was called in to attend him. He has not yet fully recovered.

Mr. Jacob Ulch was at Independence yesterday. Mr. Ulch was for many years a citizen of Plumas county; he is a farmer and has decided to settle in Owens Valley. For the present he has rented a dwelling for his family at Bishop while looking for a farm. He is an honest, industrious man and will make a good citizen.

Two car loads of marble were sent north yesterday morning. The stone is for the Mills building at San Francisco. Very handsome slabs of marble are peing taken out now for the building, some of them being eighteen feet in length and of proportionate width. These will be cut and polished at the mill on the Truckee river.

There are no signs of unrest or excitement of any kind among the Indians of Inyo County. They come and go and attend to their usual avocations in the same quiet way usual to them. Many of them are engaged in farming and every day some of them can be seen driving to mill with wheat to be made into flour for their families. It is a crime at any time to supply whisky to these people, but now that a strange excitement is so wide spread among the tribes it is still a greater wrong and any caught doing it should be severely punished.

Last Tuesday Frank Ellison had his right hand very badly injured at the marble quarry. A hole had been charged with giant powder, and a little black powder on top of the giant to make it explode. The charge was fired and exploded but failed to make an impression on the rock. Thinking that the hole had not been deep enough Ellison began boring out what remained of the tamping with intent to bore the hole deeper. It proved that only the black powder had exploded, and the charge of giant powder was yet at the bottom of the hole. When the drill struck the giant powder it exploded, tearing all the fingers of Ellison's hand. A telegram was sent to Independence for a doctor and Mrs. Woodin started at once. She did all that could be done under the circumstances. Ellison was brought up yesterday and is now at the hospital here. Doctor Woodin thinks he can save the thumb and palm of the hand.

Answers to Inquiries.

Bursted booms leave wrecks scattered behind them a long time. A few days ago a letter was received at this office from San Diego in which the writer says: "I am a nine years resident of San Diego County as a horticulturist and farmer, but lost nearly all my property after the boom here. I want to get started again in some new country where times are not quite so dull as we have here now. Up to the time of the boom I was an active worker in all the exhibits of fruit and vegetables made here. The first general exhibit of fruits and vegetables made in San Diego was mainly from my own place. At present I am only renting but want to get started again upon a place of my own. Could anything be done in the nursery line? Is the climate healthy? Are the summers very hot? Have you good schools? A few answers will greatly oblige." As many similar inquiries are made, instead of answering the foregoing by letter reply is made as follows:

Very little government land remains unlocated in Owens Valley. So far as healthfulness is concerned the climate has no superior in the State; malarial diseases are almost unknown here; consumptive people who come to Inyo County never fail to improve; rheumatism is quite rare; people suffering from asthma find immediate relief on coming here. Owens Valley abounds in streams and springs of purest water; it is the best watered valley in the State, a fact that cannot be fully realized without visiting the country. Patented land can be bought for prices ranging from five dollars to thirty dollars per acre, according to improvements and location. Because of the dryness of the atmosphere heat in summer is never oppressive; at Independence with the thermometer at 104° there is never the slightest feeling of discomfort from heat. The altitude here is 3,890 feet above sea level, and this in part causes the summer weather to be pleasant. Cherries, apricots, nectarines, apples, pears, peaches, all there fruits grow in a high degree of perfection. The market price of these fruits ranges from three to six cents per pound. The demand every year far exceeds the supply. Almonds, hard and paper shell, bear very well. Walnuts, American and English, also produce well, though these trees have not yet been extensively planted. Wheat, oats, barley, corn and rye yield good crops. By stockmen the alfalfa is said to be far superior to that grown in the Sacramento or San Juaquin Valleys. Three good crops can be cut each year. Vegetables and roots of all kinds grow well and of excellent quality. Fruit growing is the most profitable business for landowners. It is very safe to estimate the net proceeds from peach, pear and apple trees, seven or eight years old, at two hundred and fifty dollars per acre. The soil and climate seem to be especially well adapted to grape growing. There are no large vineyards as yet in the county, but enough grapes are grown to prove that remarkably fine wines can be produced. A few raisins have already been made. The grapes are large and very rich in sugar. The climate is very favorable for curing the raisins, being entirely free from fogs, and as a result of these conditions the raisins are of excellent quality. There are thousands of acres of land in Owens Valley suited to the growth of raisin grapes, and in all probability, this will in future become the leading business of the country. The valley contains probably close to half a million acres of land that may be cultivated and bear crops of some kind. There are good schools at convenient distances all through the valley; no higher salaries are paid to teachers elsewhere in the State. The Carson and Colorado railroad runs lengthwise through the valley, and connects with the Central Pacific at Reno. From the present terminus of the road at Keeler near the south end of the valley, the distance to Mojave, as shown by survey, is 121 miles. A stage runs between Mojave and Keeler twice each week, making the trip in twenty-five hours, fare $12. During the the past summer one canal has been made that will irrigate about twenty-five thousand acres of land. No settlers are yet located upon this land. It is expected that the tract will soon be colonized and the intent is to plant most of the land in raisin producing grapes. Surveyors are now in the field making a survey for a much larger canal than any yet built in the county. Every land owner in the county is eager to plant more fruit trees and vines; therefore the demand for young trees and vines will increase and make greater need for nurseries. The pay for farm labor averages about thirty dollars per month. Last winter was one of unusual severity all over the State; at Independence on Christmas eve about half an inch of snow fell. This was the only snowfall of the season. If the San Diego correspondent wants further information an effort will be made to give facts in answer to inquiries.

Wild Rose District.

Wild Rose District is one of the most promising but least known mining Districts in the county. The main hindrance to better prospecting there is the want of a road to reach it. Gunn and Fitzgerald contemplate building a road that will give access to the District by wagon teams and be twenty-one miles shorter than any road now existing between there and Darwin. It is known that there are many fine looking ledges of ore in the District and all the indications for valuable mines. The opening of the proposed road would surely lead to a great deal of prospecting in the District.

Wedding at Chrysopolis.

Last Monday evening a large party met at the residence of Mr. Alonzo McKillip, Chrysopolis, to attend the wedding of Mr. Nelson Beaudry and Mrs. Emma Ferrel. The wedding did not come off that evening for the reason that a license had not been secured in time. The company didn't lose the opportunity to have a jolly time, however. Mrs. McKillip served a grand supper and afterward there was a dance and lots of fun. Next afternoon the license was procured and the couple were married. Mr. and Mrs. Beaudry will go to Sylvania in a day or two where Mr. Beaudry is engaged in business.

For Sale.

The ranch known as the "Ritter's place" near Lone Pine is offered for sale together with the the farming implements and stock. The ranch contains 320 acres of excellent land. The stock consists of thirty head of cattle and twelve brood mares. There is now sixty tons of hay on the place and feed enough to winter 200 head of stock. The winter pasture has been rented five years past at $300 a year. The soil is a rich loam and excellently adapted to vegetable raising. There is plenty of outside range, making it a good stock ranch. For further particulars address

Grand Jury Report.

The Grand Jury met at Independence on Tuesday. Following are the names of the Jurors:

John W. Lacey	W. R. Tibbitts
J. C. Roeper	R. W. Ford
W. D. Roberts	George Storey
O. Hampton	J. W. McMurry
E. J. Reynolds	John Dugan
E. Varney	J. H. Dodge
James Nevins	W. Boyd
T. Ferguson	Geo. Hall
W. S. Morton	S. A. Densmore

R. P. Hessian.

Following is their report:

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE COUNTY OF INYO, STATE OF CALIFORNIA.

We, the Grand Jury impanelled in the said Superior Court on the 25th day of November, 1890, report as follows:

First. That we have diligently inquired into all public offenses committed or triable in this county; that one case of felony has been submitted to us and that we have dismissed the same.

Second. That we have examined the Court house and jail and we find the floor of the jail in bad condition; that the water closet therewith connected has never been completed and the same is now unfit for use. The Court house is in good condition.

Third. That we have examined the books, records and accounts of the officers of the county and report the same correct and neatly and properly kept.

Fourth. That we have visited and examined the County Hospital; that the patients therein kept are well boarded and comfortably lodged; that they have good and sufficient medical treatment, careful nursing, and they report themselves well satisfied with the same.

Fifth. We have diligently inquired into any violation of the provisions of Sections 5, 6, 7 and 8 of the County Governments Act, by County Officials, and find none.

Sixth. We recommend that the Board of Supervisors purchase a set of Deering's Codes, with amendments, for the use of the District Attorney's office.

Seventh. We recommend that the Board of Supervisors fix the regular meetings of said Board on the first Tuesday after the first Monday in January, and at corresponding dates thereafter. R. W. FORD, Foreman.

School Report.

Following is the report of the Independence public school for the third month, beginning October 27th and ending November 21st, 1890.

Number of pupils registered, 53; average number belonging, 47½; percentage of attendance, 93. At the regular monthly examination held Friday, November 21st, sixteen pupils passed an average of over 75 per cent., whose names read as follows:

Lizzie Thompson,	94	Rollin Laird	93
Charles Partridge	92	Mallory Enos	92
Frank Sherrer	88	Charles Rose	88
Alice Zunk	85	Lester Laird	84
Effie Roeper	84	Cora Craig	82
Arthur Robinson	81	Lavina Partridge	80
Ora Enos	79	Ora Eldred	79
George Wood	76	Norman Mairs	75

The following named pupils were neither absent nor tardy during the month.

Jeannette Wood	Cora Craig
Rosa Roeper	Effie Roeper
Minnie Levy	Edna Mallack
Hattie Moore	Elsie Gill
Ora Eldred	Lizzie Thompson
Frank Patridge	Paul Mairs
Charles Partridge	Lester Laird

W. J. FITZGERALD, Teacher.

At Modock.

Modock continues to be a prosperous camp. Including one carpenter and two cooks there are thirty-one men employed by Frank Fitzgerald. Ore shipments are made as regularly as teams can come and go. J. J. Gunn has ten men employed at the St. John and the mine is looking well. Fitzgerald and Gunn intend finishing the Modock road from a point where the Manietta trail leaves it for Panamint and make the road connect with the St. John mine, and also with Wild Rose and Panamint. This will shorten the distance for wagons to Panamint about twelve miles and to Wild Rose twenty-one miles. The estimated cost of the work is about two thousand dollars.

An Expensive Farce.

That is what everybody calls the Grand Jury. Year after year a Grand Jury is summoned at a big expense to the county. They meet, organize and do nothing. That is no fault of the Jurors; there is nothing for them to do. The Supervisors have jurisdiction over all matters of a civil character, and if the District Attorney does his whole duty in criminal matters there will be nothing in that line for the Grand Jury to take action upon. For any good that it does the Grand Jury might as well be abolished.

WM. H. HUFF, Prop'r

It was Ben Johnson, we believe, who, when asked Mallock's question, "Is life worth living?" replied "That depends on the liver." And Ben Johnson doubtless saw the double point to the pun.

The liver active—quick—life rosy, everything bright, mountains of trouble melt like mountains of snow.

The liver sluggish—life dull, everything blue, molehills of worry rise into mountains of anxiety, and as a result—sick headache, dizziness, constipation.

Two ways are open. Cure permanently, or relieve temporarily. Take a pill and suffer, or take a pill and get well. Shock the system by an overdose, or coax it by a mild, pleasant way.

Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Pellets are the mild means. They work effectively, without pain, and leave the system strong. One, little, sugar-coated pellet is enough, although a whole vial costs but 25 cents.

Mild, gentle, soothing and healing is Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy. Only 50 cents.

The Towers of Silence.

The Berlin Anthropological museum has received a present of a very valuable and interesting nature through the generosity of a Persian banker, Sir Jamsadji Jijibhai, a model of one of the "towers of silence," in which the Parsees bury their dead. According to the religion of the Zoroastrians, the three sacred elements—fire, earth and water—are not allowed to be desecrated by dead bodies, which, accordingly, are given to birds of prey. For this purpose high round towers are built on the hills, which have a circumference of 300 feet. At the top of the tower is a platform sloping toward the center, where a cistern 150 feet deep is placed. The platform is divided into three equal parts, set apart for the bodies of men, women and children. As soon as the naked corpses have been placed, flocks of vultures, which are always hovering round, begin their ghastly meal, and before long only the bare bones are left. These are swept into the cistern by means of water, with which the platform is flushed, and after the bones are dissolved in the cistern the water passes through four subterranean canals and is then disinfected by means of a filter.—Pall Mall Gazette.

SHAKEN OUT OF GEAR.

By malarial disease, the human machinery cannot half perform its office. Digestion, secretion, evacuation are disordered, the blood becomes watery, the nerves feeble, the countenance ghastly, sleep disturbed and appetite capricious. Terrible is this disease, fell its consequences. There is, however, a known antidote to the miasmatic poison, and a certain safeguard against it. In malarious regions of our South and West, in South America, Guatemala and on the Isthmus of Panama, as well as in transmarine countries where the scourge exists, this inimitable preventive and remedy, Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, has, during the last thirty-five years, been constantly widening the area of its usefulness, and demonstrating its sovereign value. For ever complaint, dyspepsia, constipation, kidney trouble, rheumatism and debility are all remedied by it.

Marvelous Instance of Make Up.

One of the most marvelous instances of artistic make up ever seen upon the stage was that of the late Charlotte Cushman in "Meg Merrilies." To those in the audience she looked like an ordinary wrinkled old woman, but see her close to upon the stage and one could not but be surprised at the amount of labor and fine artistic powers displayed in bringing out the desired effect. In the work of making up her face, Miss Cushman would spend at least an hour. Close to, the touches of varying, and various coloring here and there would look broad and uneffective, while the remarkable lines running all about the face and neck were coarse and unmeaning. At the distance of a few feet, however, they all blended into one harmonious whole, and formed such a network of delicate wrinkles, out of which the deeply sunken eyes shown forth with a species of dying brilliancy, as to be a perfect picture of old age, and as startling to the beholder as it was highly effective in a dramatic point of view.—Boston Herald.

Live Diamonds of Manila.

Mr. Alexander R. Webb, United States consul at Manila, Philippine Islands, thinks the Manila fire fly far ahead of any lightning bug he ever saw in St. Louis. "The Manila lightning bug," he says, "is really a gem in his way. He gives a continuous, twinkling light that looks almost as large as a hazelnut and resembles an electric spark. There is a peculiar kind of tree here that grows in wet places, for which these bugs have a preference, and sometimes they almost cover them, so that the tree resembles a cone, dotted thickly with large electric sparks. The sight is a very beautiful one. I am told that sometimes ladies attend balls and receptions with numbers of these bugs on their heads, covered with a thin veil, and that they shine like diamonds in the dark corners of the room."—St. Louis Republican.

A Startling Prophecy.

Nothing in the future appears more probable than that within the lifetime of persons now living the industrial supremacy of Great Britain will pass away with the exhaustion of her coal fields. Switzerland, Italy and the Scandinavian peninsula are destined to become the great manufacturing districts of Europe. This extraordinary industrial revolution will be brought about by the transmission and distribution by electrical means of the inexhaustible and permanent water power in those countries. More than a year ago in Switzerland a woolen manufactory with 36,000 spindles, with the usual complement of auxiliary machinery, was operated wholly by electric power conveyed from a distant stream, deriving its never failing supply of water from the melting of Alpine snows. In the new era the Swiss republic may not improbably become the foremost industrial nation of Europe.—Electrical Engineer.

Condition of Hayti.

The country is naturally rich, but not rich enough to support the hordes of shameless, self seeking politicians anxious for their own enrichment. The cause for their appearance in such numbers is easily explained. The many revolutions, with their concomitant murders, pillages and conflagrations, have destroyed industry and labor, and have closed all the avenues to the attainment of a competence by honorable pursuits. Of what use is it to the peasant to plant cane or to cultivate coffee when at any moment the general of the arrondissement may force him to abandon his crops to bear arms in support of some one who, in the set terms of the usual proclamation, has "raised the standard of revolution against the most odious of tyrants?"—Cor. New York Post.

How Stanley Punished a Traitor.

One anecdote told by Mr. Stevens of the way in which Stanley disposed of the Egyptian officer who was convicted of having plotted to hand the expedition over to the Mahdi, is worth repeating. Stanley, who was suffering with acute gastritis, had himself carried in a chair outside the tent. Turning to the incriminated officer he said:

"We have come through a thousand difficulties to save you and yours. Meanwhile you have been plotting to destroy us. Depart to God."

Saying these words, he pointed to a bough of a tree, where justice was done after the fashion of Judge Lynch.—Pall Mall Gazette.

A Gypsy Camp in Cuba.

With few exceptions, every feature of the Gypsy camp in Germany, in England or in America, was here. The tent bow of old was here. The hooded covers were the same. Tents universally faced the south. That sacred Gypsy heirloom, the crooked kettle stick, stood by each smoldering or blazing fire. Pots, kettles, and all utensils for cooking were more ancient, but quite the same. The voiceless dogs were here. The same shrill voices of women, melodic laughter of maidens, garrulous tones of century old hags, and hearty, husky, brazen voices of men, were here the same as in Texas, Ohio or Maine. And, above all, that utter abandonment in spirits and movement which render the happy, unguarded Gypsy the most awkward, yet graceful, of humans, was here as I had never seen it before.—Edgar L. Wakeman's Cuba Letter.

The World's Famous Trees.

Gen. Brisbin has a chapter on famous trees of the world which is full of curious information. The African baobab is known to reach the age of over 5,000 years. At Chapultepec, Mexico, is a large cypress under which Cortez and his troops rested. In the garden of Semiramis, at Babylon, is a willow supposed to have been there when the queen was alive. The Neustadt linden was 800 years old when it was wrecked in 1832. England has oaks 3,000 years old. A walnut tree at Balaklava, 1,200 years old, is owned by five families who gather from it annually about 100,000 nuts. The Wadsworth oak, at Genesee, N. Y., is 500 years old and twenty-seven feet in circumference at the base.—Cincinnati Commercial Gazette.

Canada's Northwestern Provinces.

For many years the Canadian Pacific railway has been trying to lure colonists into the northwestern provinces of Canada, but with little success. A large percentage of those who have gone out to these provinces have come over to the United States. Englishmen who have been deluded into settling in the northwest territory frequently write indignant letters to the English papers. "When," says one of these colonists, "they advise people to go up to the northwest, Manitoba or Hudson Bay district, they are simply sending people to their doom unless they have money to help themselves with."—New York Tribune.

BILL NYE AND BURGLARS.

He Thinks They Are Favored More Than Other People.

Bill Nye writes to The New York World from St. Joseph, Mo.: When I reached this point yesterday I found in a bushel basketful of forwarded letters the following peculiar epistle:

DEAR SIR—Along with other good citizens I am pleased to see the humanitarian effort now being made to devise some form of quick and painless death for our murderers and other criminals who may have to suffer the death penalty. Such efforts denote a refined and cultivated society, one that would in no way countenance the slightest injury even to the most wicked dude that smokes cigarettes on the elevated stations.

As one good turn deserves another, and as by some chance one of these nice, good intentioned people may, under an unlucky star, come in contact with one of my profession engaged in his regular business, you would most certainly fill a long felt want if you would invent some quick and painless method for a criminal to murder his victim. Murders are too often lingering and painful. Why should there not be a reform in that way? Should you kindly lend your genius to help our profession in that way you would gain the lasting gratitude of the public as well as of many BURGLARS.

NEW YORK, Feb. 24, 1888.

In replying briefly to the above, I will state that no burglar ever came to my house for a favor and went away disappointed, provided I was able to contribute to his wants and provided he went at it in the right way. I have never jumped on a burglar behind his back or taken advantage of my great strength to do him up.

When a burglar is in my house he is my guest. If he is willing to take things as he finds them he will have no trouble with me. But I believe that, as a class, burglars are already favored more than other people.

Burglars presume too much, I think. Because they have free entree and carte blanche to the drawing rooms of our best people, they want the earth and make themselves disagreeable. I do not wish to hurt the feelings of my correspondent, especially if he takes the paper regularly, but for one I am going to quit protecting and fostering the infant industry of American burglary as against the pauper burglar of Europe. Let us get our burgling done by the best and cheapest methods. Let our burglary take its chances in competition with that of effete monarchies, just as everything else will have to do some day. In the meantime I do not propose to do anything in a newspaper way that will look like an attempt to retain the burglar vote.

Let the burglar rustle for his wages the way I do and the way other workingmen do. I know that burglars claim they are poorly paid because their work keeps them up nights so much, but newspaper men have to work nights also, and unless they can rob a prosperous burglar once in a while they have a hard row to hoe.

And what have the burglars ever done for me that I should now be called upon to advance their interests?

When they had no other place to go, have they not always felt free to come to my house? And how have they rewarded my hospitality? When they went through my house last year and found a condition of things which would have moved the stoniest heart, what did they do? They stole a valuable autograph album which had been sent me to write in, and I had it to pay for. They took a valuable umbrella which I had borrowed a few years ago, and which I intended to return to the owner after a while. They ate some cold rice and sorghum which had been set aside for the use of other guests, and then they left the gate open so that cows got in and ate up my lima beans.

Now I am asked to use my influence in the direction of better sand bag facilities for burglars and a more reliable style of rapid transit between the tax payer and the New Jerusalem.

In years past I will admit that I was running for office a good deal, and I had to do things that would retain the burglar vote, but now I am firm in my convictions and outspoken for what I believe to be right. A man engaged in trying to be his own successor in the portfolio of justice of the peace is not a free moral agent. It is more or less so in other offices, but it is especially so with a justice of the peace.

I now propose, with the help of the American people and an earnest, manly effort on my part, to shake off the burglar and come out and take higher ground. Henceforth my voice will be heard in more or less stentorian tones in the interests of humanity. Prosperous burglary, which gets a second trial, will be regarded the same as less fortunate petty larceny, which gets ninety days.

Burglars who may have voted for me in the old days are hereby notified that the autograph album and lima beans offset that account, and that it is my earnest wish, so far as it is in my power, during the remaining years which may be granted me, to live down and forget the dark and devious days when I was in politics. I believe that easier and more painless methods for the administration of capital punishment will soon be perfected, whereby a man who is executed by the law will not be entitled to any more glory of flowers than one who dies of pneumonia. To that end I am willing to work. When that is accomplished I will devote my halting powers to the further amelioration of our race. But the burglar has no further political claims on me.

Men who visit New York from a distance desiring to purchase greenbacks at forced sale or to obtain gold bricks of those who are compelled to sell them for a mere song, will always be ameliorated so long as my good right arm shall not forget her cunning.

I am willing to do what I can for the promotion of science and the painless pulling of burglars, but this is as far as I would go. Moreover, I hope that our correspondence will not continue any longer. Burglars who pleased and entertained me when I was in politics have long since ceased to do so. The truth of the matter is that while all other professions have made rapid progress, politics and burglary are just where they were 100 years ago.

One reason why burglary has not made more rapid strides I believe to be because burglars do not advertise. They rely solely upon their insight and keen penetration. The result is that burglars and burglary have fallen off. I do not believe in trying to help a profession so abundantly able to help itself. BILL NYE.

A Startling Innovation.

Frank R. Stockton, that popular novelist of infinite quaint humors, is held responsible for a most startling innovation in the way of wedding trips, recently introduced in Washington. After a certain wedding ceremony, at which Mr. Stockton was present, instead of the young couple going on a wedding trip, the bride's parents were showered with rice and old slippers and banished on a two weeks' exile, while the bride and groom were left in possession of the house.—Frank Leslie's.

CARE OF PARLOR CARS.

They Really Are Cleaned and Aired for Each Trip, and Stocked, Too.

It would probably be a gratifying assurance to the minds of many travelers to know what great care is taken to secure perfect cleanliness in the more luxurious classes of railroad coaches, known variously as sleeping, drawing room, dining and buffet cars. A conviction is widespread, particularly among women, that the reverse is the case. The blankets that are always so strangely suggestive of cold buckwheat cakes, being of a feel and thickness unlike any other blankets, are vere apt to be viewed with suspicion. As for the pillows, how many women have vowed that they could sniff the hair oil of the preceding user upon them? Why, even bed bug stories have been told of sleeping cars, and the anecdote about dropping a gold dollar in a sleeping car and finding it a month afterward just where it fell, has become such a stock story among traveling men that some of them now actually believe it. In view of all this, there is solid comfort in such a story as Superintendent C. D. Flagg tells about what is done with their cars at the conclusion of every trip. He says:

"Every car, as soon as it is emptied of its passengers at a terminal point, is, as we term it, 'stripped in the yard. The carpets are taken up, carried out, beaten and aired. The seats and backs are taken out and thoroughly cleaned in like manner. The mattresses, blankets and berth curtains are also whipped, aired and, if the weather permits, sunned. The spring beds are freed from the 'bed dust' that gathers from fraying of textile fabrics, by brushing and wiping in all parts. All utensils are carried out, soused in scalding lye and scrubbed. The pillows are beaten and sunned like the mattresses. The floor and oilcloths in the saloons are scrubbed, and all the woodwork, having been scoured thoroughly clean with soap, brushes, hot water and drying cloths, is gone over with furniture polish. About once a week the veneering or painted canvas constituting the ceiling is carefully scoured to cleanse from it accumulations of smoke and clinging dust. The windows are cleansed and rubbed bright. All brass and silver mountings are polished. Dust and stains are as carefully washed from the outside of the car as from the inside. To do that work we keep 100 cleaners steadily at work here in New York, and numbers at other points in proportion to the work required. While all this has been going on, every shred of textile fabrics that should be washed—sheets, pillow cases, towels, napkins and cushion covers—has been sent to the laundry and replaced by a clean stock of articles. Each car has two complete outfits of these things, which are used alternately, one being laundried, aired and packed while the other is on the road.

"Then, when the process is complete, the car has to be retrimmed, by the relaying of carpets and oil cloths; putting in place of the springs, mattresses, seats and backs; stowing away of the pillows, linen and curtains, and, last of all, the thorough washing out of the water tanks and refilling them with fresh water and ice. That last thing is never done until the final moment when the car is about to be drawn from the yard to take its place in the outgoing train. While all this has been going on the railroad people who are responsible for the care of the running gear of the car inspect the trucks, test the brakes, sound every wheel, see that the boxes are rightly packed, and, as far as foresight can go, make sure accidents shall be averted.

"That is the regular routine, scrupulously followed every day upon every car that comes in. No housewife, even in Holland, ever dreamed of such a thorough 'house cleaning' as this is. In addition thereto, the blankets are steam scoured twice a year, which is at least double the attention they get in most hotels. The berth curtains are treated so once a year. Carpets have to be renewed every fifteen or eighteen months, as the hard service wears them out very rapidly. The only variations upon that elaborate process of cleaning are in handling the dining room and buffet cars, where the operations involve thorough purification of all utensils, cleansing of the ice boxes and kitchens and restocking with provisions. One rule always maintains that the primary thing to be done when the car comes into the hands of the cleaners is to take out of it everything that can be taken out. Then every separate piece so removed must be made faultlessly clean before it is put back.

"Each dining room or buffet car has its steward, whose duty it is to report to the assistant commissary immediately upon his arrival what stock he has left over and what he is short of. To verify his report the assistant commissary, who acts as a check upon him, goes through his stock and then makes out, to replace shortages and keep up the supplies, a requisition upon the commissary. That requisition is filled out upon a blank form, on which are specified about 300 articles in constant use on those cars, with spaces left for the addition of more as the conditions of the markets enable increase in the resources of our commissariat. In all the management of this department there is just such a system of checking in and checking out as obtains in the 'stock' room of every big hotel. All groceries, wines, liquors, and other nonperishable goods are bought in great quantities, and kept in the company's store houses for issue upon requisition as demanded; but fresh meats, poultry, game, fish, vegetables and fruits are purchased by the commissary in the markets from day to day, or supplied by contract with dealers, just as such things are provided by the steward of a hotel."—New York Sun.

Death of a War Horse.

When the Duke of Wellington was fighting in Spain there were two horses which had always drawn the same gun and had been side by side in many battles. At last one was killed and the other, on having his food brought to him as usual, refused to eat, but turned his head round to look for his old friend and neighed many times as if to call him. All the care that was bestowed on him was in vain. There were other horses near him, but he would not notice them and he soon afterward died, not having once tasted food since his former companion was killed.—Our Dumb Animals.

To secure the flap of an envelope so that it may not be readily opened without betraying the fact that it had been tampered with, has been the ambition of a good many inventors. An envelope constructed as follows is the subject of a recent English patent: The flap is so cut and shaped as to bring the point of it to the top right hand corner of the front side of the envelope, where the gummed surface of the flap secures it to the front of the envelope. The postage stamp is then fixed over the flap so that the envelope cannot possibly be unfastened without destroying the stamp.

LINCOLN'S MELANCHOLY.

His Sympathetic Nature and His Early Misfortunes.

Those who saw much of Abraham Lincoln during the later years of his life, were greatly impressed with the expression of profound melancholy his face always wore in repose.

Mr. Lincoln was of a peculiarly sympathetic and kindly nature. Those strong characteristics influenced, very happily, as it proved, his entire political career. They would not seem, at first glance, to be efficient aids to political success; but in the peculiar emergency which Lincoln, in the providence of God, was called to meet, no vessel of common clay could possibly have become the "chosen of the Lord."

Those acquainted with him from boyhood knew that early griefs tinged his whole life with sadness. His partner in the grocery business at Salem was "Uncle" Billy Green, of Tallula, Ill., who used at night, when customers were few, to hold the grammar while Lincoln recited his lessons.

It was to his sympathetic ear Lincoln told the story of his love for sweet Ann Rutlidge; and he, in return, offered what comfort he could when poor Ann died, and Lincoln's great heart nearly broke.

"After Ann died," says "Uncle" Billy, "on stormy nights, when the wind blew the rain against the roof, Abe would set thar in the grocery, his elbows on his knees, his face in his hands, and the tears runnin' through his fingers. I hated to see him feel bad, an' I'd say, 'Abe, don't cry'; an' he'd look up an' say 'I can't help it, Bill, the rain's a fallin' on her.'"

There are many who can sympathize with this overpowering grief, as they think of a lost loved one, when "the rain's a fallin' on her." What adds pognancy to the grief some times is the thought that the lost one might have been saved.

Fortunate, indeed, is William Johnson, of Corona, L. I., a builder, who writes June 28, 1890: "Last February, on returning from church one night, my daughter complained of having a pain in her ankle. The pain gradually extended until her entire limb was swollen and very painful to the touch. We called a physician, who after careful examination, pronounced it disease of the kidneys of long standing. All we could do, did not seem to benefit her until we tried Warner's Safe Cure; from the first she commenced to improve. When she commenced taking it she could not turn over in bed, and could just move her hands a little, but to-day she is as well as she ever was. I believe I owe the recovery of my daughter to its use."

P. HINKLE'S PATENT CENTRIFUGAL ROLLER QUARTZ MILL

THIS cut shows the New Hinkle Centrifugal Quartz Mill, with plates and slummer. This is the only mill made that needs no oil for the inside working parts, as it is thoroughly lubricated with water, supplied from a circular tank, which is connected to the roller spindles, slides and drips by rubber hose. By this means oil cannot interfere with perfect amalgamation. Other features of superiority are: Simplicity of construction; the free discharge of pulp; the wearing parts are easily replaced at a small cost. The small amount of power required to run the mill will recommend it to all practical mill men, as well as the small cost of erection and transportation of mill to the mine. A 5-foot mill weighs 9,000 lbs.; pulverizers 38 in. diam.; run, 80 to 90 rev. per minute, with a capacity of 20 tons per day. This size mill costs $1,500. With Silver Plates, Slummer and Ore Feeder, $1,800.

P. HINKLE'S PATENT ORE FEEDER.

Positive Feed and Ready Adjustment.

IN this Improved Ore Feeder the falling tappet of the mill causes a backward movement of the feeding-tray. As the ore comes from the hopper on to the tray, a transverse bar prevents the ore moving backward, and a small portion of the ore is thus forced off the front edge of the feeding-tray into the battery. The amount of movement of the feeding tray may be regulated, thus regulating the feed of ore. This feeder can be arranged for roller mill or stamps. It is strong and durable, and feeds wet or dry ore in regular quantities.

PASTEUR AND THE RABBITS.

An Attempt to Rid Australia of Its Post. Some Doubtful Experiments.

The offer of a reward of £25,000 by the government of New South Wales to any one who should find a new and effective method of exterminating the swarming rabbits of Australia caused M. Pasteur to suggest the introduction of chicken cholera by means of the microbe of that disease. The reward was offered in November last. At first M. Pasteur did not intend to compete for the prize. He afterward came to the conclusion that the money could be well used for the support of the Pasteur Institute, and in a letter to the agents general of the Australian colonies he formally put his name on the list of competitors.

Since November last, when M. Pasteur published in Le Temps, of Paris, a description of the method which he proposed to use, he has made some interesting experiments upon rabbits in France. Some time ago the owner of several famous vineyards near Rheims determined to breed wild rabbits in one of them which covered twenty acres and was surrounded by high walls. The animals multiplied rapidly, and the excavations which they made began to encroach upon extensive vaults where champagne was stored. The proprietor applied to M. Pasteur for relief, and he fed the rabbits with the microbes of chicken cholera. On the following day all of them were dead.

When M. Pasteur's assistants arrive in Australia they will find that experiments like his were made there before his suggestions were published in Le Temps. The disease which an Australian scientist proposes to introduce is not, however, chicken cholera, but rabbit scab or itch. The Adelaide Register published in November a report written for the crown lands department of South Australia by Professor Watson, of the University of Adelaide, concerning an inquiry made by him with reference to the cultivation of this disease. Professor Watson asserts that scab is not communicated from rabbits to men, dogs, horses or cattle, and his experiments prove, he thinks, that it is not communicated to sheep. He asks the government to permit him to continue his experiments on some island set apart for the purpose. But other authorities in Australia are of the opinion that sheep would be endangered if the disease should be used for the extermination of rabbits. Although Professor Watson was carefully guarding his infected rabbits, it appears that other persons had already undertaken to spread the disease, for in The Adelaide Observer of Dec. 3 a correspondent writes: "Steamers have been taking diseased rabbits up the river for distribution, and scab has since broken out among the cattle at Blanchetown and is spreading rapidly."

The evil for which a remedy is sought is a great one. The rabbits threaten to put an end to farming and sheep raising in great tracts of country. The colony of New South Wales alone paid more than $1,500,000 last year for the destruction of rabbits. It has also built a wire fence 4 feet high and 203 miles long for protection on the line of its western boundary, and it is proposed that $3,000,000 shall be expended in extending this barrier. The experience of one land owner may be cited as showing that the public expenditures are but a small part of the cost of dealing with the nuisance. After spending $200,000 in vain attempts to clear his land he was forced to give up farming.

While the introduction of chicken cholera might sweep away the rabbits, there is danger that it would at the same time kill all the birds, and that cattle and sheep and even human beings might suffer in some way from the pestilence. If M. Pasteur's method should be adopted the animals would at least gain the privilege of dying peacefully. It is said that fowls, when attacked by the disease, "curl themselves up into a ball and drop into a deep sleep, which ends in a painless death." The Australians now kill millions of rabbits every year by the use of steel traps, arsenic, strychnine and phosphorus, so that the suffering of the victims is intense.—New York Times.

A Long Ride.

In November, 1889, Capt. Pyevtzoff, a cossack officer, started from the town of Bielovetchensk, on the river Amoor, to ride across Siberia and Russia to St. Petersburg, a journey of 5,300 miles, nearly a quarter of the distance around the globe. He travels quite alone on an ordinary cavalry horse; carries his own provisions, makes about fifty miles a day, and is armed from head to foot for protection against robbers. He has met with intense cold, the thermometer showing 58 degs. below zero, but he is in good health and spirits.—Montreal Star.

The New Style of Silk Hat.

I don't want you to give me away, but I never heard so much growling about the style in silk hats as I have heard this spring. Of course men, or some men, are like women when it comes to styles. They will buy and wear them no matter how hideous they are. But there are other men who like to wear that which is becoming, and most silk hats are becoming to the wearers. There are men who can't wear a derby and some who can't wear a soft hat. But I never saw a man who couldn't wear a silk hat if it had any shape to it. The new style of silk hat, the one just out, has no shape that is artistic. It looks like a sawed off funnel of a vessel. There used to be a silk hat that had a sugar loaf shape. It was very Frenchy. You see it occasionally on the stage in the French operas. The hat this spring is an abominable intimation of that hat. I don't say imitation, for it isn't anything of the sort. Our customers are buying them, but they do so under protest. In view of this I expect you will see more derbys worn this year than formerly.—Interview in Chicago Tribune.

Emperor Frederick's Tomb.

The mausoleum of the Emperor Frederick is completed externally. The decorations of the interior are very rich, and carried out entirely in light gray Silesian sandstone. The sober color of this is only interrupted by the polished dark green Syenite pillars. As a finish to the arch which spans the opening of the altar niche a beautifully formed escutcheon has been chosen, over which the imperial eagle soars with outstretched wings. This is flanked on both sides by figures of angels holding religious symbols in their hands. The spandrels of the upper gallery are adorned with cherubs. The emperor's consent has been given to the carrying out of the mosaic in the cupola and on the ceiling of the altar space. The designs for the mosaics were worked out by Professor Ewald, after early Christian works. The cupola is to receive figures of argels on a gold ground between palms.—Berlin Letter.

Value of a Red Cent.

"Are any of the cents valuable?" Mr. Richard Cogan was asked. "The date that is usually considered most valuable," he replied, "is the 1799; but the highest price I ever knew to be paid for one was for an 1804. It was a fine specimen—a bright red. This, unless a coin has been scoured or treated with vinegar, shows that it is uncirculated, just as it came from the mint. An old dealer can tell in a moment when a coin has been 'doctored.' People sometimes speak of anything that is not worth much as 'not worth a red cent,' but if that cent happens to be of a rare date its redness is $50 in its owner's pocket. This coin brought $205. I think it was the highest price ever paid for a United States cent."—New York World.

Running Rapids in Canada.

The running of rapids is the climax of the voyageur's adventurous life. Even the most experienced voyageur changes color with excitement when he feels the canoe crouch and spring, sway and dart over the first swells of a rapid. The voyageurs that I have known all possessed keen observation, a cool judgment, and a decisive turn of mind. In a small canoe of, say twelve feet, without much load, a man alone will kneel on the bottom about one-third of her length from the stern, and paddle down a rapid pretty well. But the typical crew in an eighteen foot canoe consists of a captain in the bow and a helmsman in the stern. —C. H. Farnham in Harper's Magazine.

Photographs at Weddings.

A young lady recently invented a new fashion for weddings that should be taken up by members of the fair sex who are crowded with engagements. Unable to appear at her friend's wedding, she had her photograph specially taken for the occasion, and this portrait, with appropriate good wishes, greeted the bride on the morning of the eventful day. But only fancy having the photographs of one's dear 500 friends left at the door with the morning's mail!—New York Commercial Advertiser.

Making Shoes Soft.

Take a pair of shoes that have become stiff and uncomfortable by constant wear in the rain, and apply a coat of vaseline, rubbing it in well with a cloth, and in a short time the leather becomes as soft and pliable as when it was taken from the shelves of the shoe dealer.—Herald of Health.

VENEZUELA'S GOLD MINES.

Auriferous Fields on the Banks of the Yuruari River—Scenes in Camp.

The climate is unhealthy, disposing persons to bilious fevers, and in the height of the rainy season the mortality is great among the negroes, who often sleep in the open air and take but little care of themselves. Chills and fever is a common complaint. Position in life has a great deal to do with the liability to sickness, as upon the quality of the living accommodations much depends. The fever seems to thoroughly weaken the blood of the sick, and for months after a sick man has left his bed he appears like a living corpse. Much of the disease contracted at the mines is no doubt due to excesses of various kinds, which seem to be inseparable from life in a mining country. When the greatest care is needed, in reference to every detail of eating, drinking, clothing and living, little is taken by the majority, and the result is that the various foreign employes, or officers as they are called—American, English and German—from the chief mining engineer down to the Irish blacksmiths, are continually sick or recovering from sickness.

I have seen over half the "officers" of one company sick, thus necessitating double work from the others, conducing to similar sickness. Doctors are plentiful, but they, too, are often laid up. At night a dense mist from the river covers the whole valley like a pall. No wonder there are fevers.

The ore from the mines, after being crushed, passes under the stamp heads, on to which a stream of water is flowing, and then crushed into fine powder from the battery over the amalgamation tables. These are of copper, covered with a coating of mercury. The gold particles amalgamate with the mercury, and the water carries the quartz grains on into the race below. The tables are cleaned every twenty-four hours, the mill being stopped to allow of this. The result from the day's working of this immense machinery is a couple of balls of varying size—say of an egg—of amalgam, which are carried down to the house, weighed and then deposited in the safe until a sufficient quantity is had for retorting. After retorting the resultant gold is ready for shipment. Some gold is shipped in the retorted form and some is melted and cast in the form of bars before shipment. The shipment of bullion takes place once a month, the various companies bringing their gold to the office whence the bullion train starts. The bullion is carried over the road in charge of a mounted party of guards well armed.

Bullion day is sort of a holiday for the chief officers of the companies, on which they all meet together and discuss mutual affairs. The bullion train in returning brings up a mail and the money to pay the labor and other expenses. Then, for many days, the scene at a company's office is a lively one, the miners besieging the windows for letters and with inquiries as to when pay day will come. The money comes up generally in English sovereigns, with occasionally some American gold. There is very little change in the country, and ten or five cent Venezuelan pieces are rare. English, French, German and American money is that chiefly in circulation. The standard of Venezuelan currency is a 100 cents, or sencillio dollar, worth about what our dollar is, but accounts in Venezuela are kept in Macuquino. A Macuquino dollar is worth about four-fifths of the sencillio dollar, or to be exact, 74.76 cents American gold. A five cent piece is a ten cent piece cut in two, and divided again it passes for two and one-half cents.

An event in life at a mine is the arrival of a freight train of bullock carts or burros. The Venezuelan in charge, after much fumbling, finds the bill of lading, and then comes the checking of the packages while all the idlers look on. Sometimes it is a cargo of boxes containing tins of green corn, tomatoes, oysters, lobsters, preserved fruits, etc., from the states. Then it is bulky machinery, stamp heads, flasks of mercury, dynamite or fuse. The smaller mining stores, such as dynamite, fuse, shovels, picks, machetes, hammers, drill iron, rope, etc., are kept in a store room in the living house of a mining company.

Let me describe a sleeping apartment at the mines, as it will give an idea of the manner of living. The floor is covered where the iron bed stood with matting, under which are some coffee sacks. The hammock, thrown up over the mosquito frame of the bed, is stretched across the room. The carrata roof, in which are numerous spiders and a friendly house snake, who occasionally comes down on the floor, is the ceiling. An immense toad, who is of use, as he catches many insects, lives under the bed, and is on good terms with a small dog of the country who sleeps in the room. The windows, without glass, are simply protected by rough Venetian shutters, and when it rains a steady stream pours in several places through the roof. The disagreeable insects known as chigoes are numerous, and great care has to be taken to avoid their acquaintance. The temperature at the mines is quite high during the day, but as the nights are cool, warm bed coverings are indispensable.

All over the country are scattered barrancos, or small shafts, sunk on to the different lodes, some abandoned and some still worked. These are dangerously near the roads in many cases, and great care has to be taken in riding about after dark. The best way is to let the reins lay loosely on the mule's neck and trust to his sagacity. The river water is used by many for washing, and that of the mines, well filtered, is often drunk, being kept cool in tenagas. These are porous earthenware jars, which are known curiously as "monkeys" in the West Indies.—New York Herald.

THE "HARMONITE" COMMUNITY.

Chat with an Aged "Economite"—Graveyard of George Rapp's Followers.

An aged Economite approaches us, coming slowly down the shaded pathway. He is feeble, but his dark eyes are very bright. His portly frame is clad in the usual suit of blue, and he wears the broad brimmed hat. There are pigs in the field beside him; he tosses them an apple over the fence. They quarrel for its possession, squealing in rage. He laughs till his fat sides shake. He tosses them more apples, fairly exploding with mirth as he watches them crowding and jostling each other. So on he goes out of sight, entirely oblivious of our presence. The pigs follow him as far as the boundary of the field will let them, drowning his merriment with their squealing.

This man may be said to be a typical Economite. Innocent, honest, simple minded, with little knowledge of the great outside world and its complexities, he is easily amused. I recall another like him, the former keeper of the orchard that incloses the old burying ground, to which our ramble will soon take us. He was an elderly personage, little, spare and strangely deformed, but of singularly interesting mind. He was quite comical and original without knowing it. The childlike innocence of some of his remarks was delightful. I visited his little vine covered watch house very often.

Closing an eye and regarding me with great gravity, he once said:

"Death is a funny fellow."

"Why so?"

"He has been playing with me thsse ten years."

"I do not understand."

"Look at me and see how bent I am. It for me is very hard to walk. People say I should long ago have died. But I am here. Death takes younger people, and laughs when he brings them here," pointing to the orchard.

"That is a joke you can enjoy."

"So I do; I smile back at him. What is there in death to make me afraid?"

A few weeks later I called to see the little German at his post. His cozy watch house was there, covered with luscious grapes that perfumed all the air. My friend was not there, but following the direction of a German laborer I found him. A mound was over him, upon which some tiny morning glory vines had already taken root. Death, the joker, had grown more earnest. I could not but wonder if death was still a joke to the honest and kindly little German.

Opening a white gate, August leads the way into a spacious orchard, through which runs a long, straight roadway. On our right as we enter is a little vineyard, so trim and perfectly kept that one cannot but admire it. Not a weed mars the ground between the trellises. The odor of the grapes is exquisite. On our left is a peach orchard in full bearing, and the fruitage is worthy of Delaware or Maryland. A little further on begins a pear and apple orchard, which extends for fully half a mile.

"Here," said August, pausing, "our dead lie."

We look about us, nonplussed. Before us is a square inclosure in the orchard, fenced with white palings. Pear and apple trees grow within; the grass-grown surface is very smooth. There are no monuments, headstones, railings, flowers or evergreens; the place has the appearance of a pasture.

"Where are the graves, August?" we asked.

"Dere, in de ground."

"But you cannot tell one from another!"

"Vy shoolt we; vill God forget?"

Upon closer inspection we find some new made graves near the fence, with the earth heaped over them in the usual form, but with nothing to designate them. They are arranged in long rows extending entirely across the inclosure, and the last row is now begun. When complete, it will doubtless see the end of the Harmony society. The old graves are all level with the ground, and many are entirely obliterated. Curiously, and I trust typically, the plant called "life everlasting" grows over them, and grass and flowering vines run riot, being only occasionally disturbed by the scythe. No effort is made to beautify the place; but it is a most impressive spot.

"Are many buried here, August?"

"De Harmony society is dere," is the sober answer.

Just beyond the burying ground is a so called "Indian mound," a relic of the ancient Mound Builders. Over it grow a few stately oaks and hickories, in the shade of which benches have been arranged in the form of a circle. There the workmen in the orchard eat their noonday meal. The mound has never been explored, nor will the Harmonites permit the ancient tumulus to be desecrated.

Near by is a frame building, in which pears and apples are sorted and barreled. —H. D. Mason in American Magazine.

Chinese and the Bicycle.

Although the shackles of authority hold in check the murderous mob, howling for my barbarian gore outside, a constant stream of officials and their friends are admitted to see me and the bicycle. In making an examination of the bicycle, the peculiar "Ki-ngan-foo squeak" finds spontaneous expression at every new surprise. A man enters the room, peers wonderingly into my face—squeak!—comes closer, and looks again—squeak!—notices the peculiar cut of my garments—squeak!—observes my shoes—squeak—sees helmet on table—squeak!—sees the bicycle—squeak!—goes and touches it—squeak!—finds out that the pedals twirl round—squeak!—and thus he continues until he has seen everything and squeaked at everything; he then takes a lingering survey of the room to satisfy himself that nothing has been overlooked, gives a parting squeak and leaves the room.—Thomas Stevens in Outing.

The Early Supreme Court.

The duties of the early justices of the national supreme court could hardly be called onerous. During the first twenty years of the court it had very little business. From 1820 to 1851 the cases submitted to it averaged only about fifty-five a year. After 1860 the dockets became crowded, and now a new case is ordinarily not heard for five years.—New York Evening World.

The Red Adam and Eve.

Intimately associated with Manitou's Landing, Gate and Wigwam, in the legend of creation, stands one more of these natural curiosities of Mackinac island. It is known as "Lover's Leap," and has been the subject of more romancing than any other of the island celebrities. The prettiest modern conception is that which represents an Indian girl watching here for the return of her lover from the warpath. His comrades appear without him, saying that he was slain. His faithful maiden sings her death song here upon this pinnacle, and leaps into the lake to overtake her lover in the land of spirits.

But the ancient legend of creation has the most natural and complete explanation ever given of the origin of Lover's Leap. The red Adam was driven from the island by an evil minded angel, who was enamored of the red Eve, and she, having denounced the angel as "devil," with whom she could not be compelled to remain longer than to express her hate of him, "fled like wind as it wantons down from far Waugoshanee," and leaped from the cliff. Her banished mate, who was paddling sorrowfully along the shore and saw her fall, urged his canoe forward and saved her life; and Manitou restored them to the island and banished the angel from heaven. He fell to the under world of bad spirits, and there became a great leader and the father of the white race of beings called men, who, filled with the hatred of their father toward the red Eve, have never ceased to work for the ruin of her descendants. This remarkable legend of creation has made "the Island" a holy land to me, and shows more plausibly than anything I have ever found, a relationship between the North American Indians and the ancient inhabitants of the eastern hemisphere; while Lover's Leap stands as prehistoric evidence that love is as old as the human heart.—Charles Ellis in American Magazine.

Fecundity of Fishes.

Fishes produce so many eggs that if vast numbers of the latter and of the fishes themselves were not continually destroyed, these animals would finally fill up all the waters. For example, man annually takes 60,000,000 or 70,000,000 codfish from the sea around the shores of Newfoundland. But even that quantity seems small when we consider that each cod yields about 45,000,000 eggs each season, and that even 8,000,000 have been found in the roe of a single cod. Were the 60,000,000 cod taken on the coast of Newfoundland left to breed, the 30,000,000 females producing 5,000,000 eggs every year, it would give a yearly addition of 150,000,000,000,000 young codfish.

Other fish, though not equaling the cod, are wonderfully productive. A herring weighing six or seven ounces is provided with about 30,000 eggs. After making all reasonable allowances for the destruction of eggs and the young, it has been calculated that in three years a single pair of herrings would produce 154,000,000. Buffon calculated that if a pair of herrings could be left to breed and multiply undisturbed, for a period of twenty years, they would yield an amount of fish equal in bulk to the globe on which we live.—Scientific American.

Mormon Thrift and Economy.

The city of Salt Lake is practically without debt. Its bonds, to the amount of $250,000, to aid in the construction of a canal, over twenty miles long, to bring an adequate supply of fresh water from Utah lake, have already been largely redeemed, though the term of the loan has but half expired.

A people who have by patient endeavor and community converted a sterile region into a garden spot, by irrigation, naturally become imbued with notions of thrift and economy—public as well as private. This natural tendency is encouraged by an eminently practical religion. The emblem adopted by the founders of Utah is the beehive. The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints seeks to make its followers honest, industrious and economical.—Delegate John T. Caine's Letter.

Cloth Made of Glass.

M. Dubus Bonnet, of Lille, France, has invented a process of spinning and weaving glass into cloth. The warp is composed of silk, forming the body of the groundwork, on which the pattern in glass appears, as effected by the weft. The requisite flexibility of glass thread for manufacturing purposes is to be ascribed to its extreme fineness, as not less than fifty to sixty of the original threads (spun by steam engine power) are required to form one thread of the weft.

The process is slow, for no more than a yard of cloth can be produced in twelve hours. The work, however, is extremely beautiful and comparatively cheap. A French paper, commenting on this discovery, says:

"When we figure to ourselves an apartment decorated with cloth of glass, and resplendent with lights, we must be convinced that it will equal in brilliancy all that the imagination can conceive and realize; in a word, the wonders of the enchanted palaces mentioned in the Arabian tales."—New York Star.

Cost of Being Crippled.

A table prepared for a workingman's society in Leipsic represents that the loss of different parts of the body reduces the capacity of gaining a living in the following precentages: Loss of both eyes, or arms, or hands, or legs, or feet, 100; loss of right hand, 40; of the right thumb, 33 1-3; of one eye, 22; of the left thumb, or right index finger, 14; of left index, or any other finger of the left hand, 5.—Arkansaw Traveler.

A Gigantic Spider's Web.

Lieut. W. Smyth, of the British royal navy, in his "Narrative of a Journey from Lima to Para," published some years ago, gives the following extraordinary account of a spider web. He says: "We saw at Pachiza, on the river Huayabamba, in Peru, a gigantic spider's web suspended from the trees. It was twenty-five feet in height and near fifty feet in length. The threads were very strong, and it had the empty sloughs of thousands of insects hanging on it. It appeared to be the habitation of a great number of spiders of a larger size than we ever saw in England."

PERIODS OF CONTAGIOUS CRIME.

Do Criminal Epidemics Have Their Origin in the Secret Springs of Nature?

It has been frequently noted that there are epidemics in suicide and in other crimes. A criminal epidemic peculiar to Chicago, and to one or two other cities having a large floating and vicious class population, is that of Sunday murders, which are the results of a day of idleness spent in the open saloons, where the vilest and most fiery liquors are sold. Murders with peculiar features often occur in groups in all parts of the country. It has been traditional in France that epidemics of suicide return in regular cycles, at each recurrence of the suicidal furor, the successive victims of their own murderous hands vieing with each other in the greater ghastliness of the tragedy that they enact. During one of these periods a suicide literally "capped the climax" by leaping from the top of a tower, 200 or 300 feet, to the pavement below.

Stories of wife murders in many parts of the country, relieved by a few exceptional murders of husbands by their wives, reach the press and the public simultaneously from many different sources. "Murder is in the air" has become an habitual expression from the return of these bloody times. In the days of bank burglaries—now much less frequent, owing to the protections that science has provided for money vaults—it was not often that a single robbery was reported—they "came in battalions." This was not because the same gangs engaged in many different enterprises, but because a universal similar impulse permeated the minds of the criminal class devoted to these forms of guilt.

A curious study might be made of the causes of epidemics of crime. In superstitious times all evils were attributed to the influence of adverse stars. This may have been an approach to scientific truth, or its advanced shadow. That meteorological conditions seriously affect the health and spirits—and affect some more seriously than others—is a fact of such every day experience that it is no longer regarded as phenomenal. The causes of meterological change must be the causes lying back of the pervading disposition at times witnessed to commit peculiar classes of crime. A suicidal atmosphere must have its origin in some of the secret springs of nature.

Advanced speculation has recently attributed cyclones, earthquakes and other terrestrial disturbances to great changes in the surface of the sun or in the superheated ether surrounding it. Sun spots and eruptions of solar flames have been frequently noted as occurring synchronically with devastating hurricanes, tidal waves, upheavings of the ground or scorching summer heat. A scientist, who has made this and kindred questions a serious study, has advanced the theory that when numerous deaths by paralysis or paralytic attacks are simultaneously reported, they are the result of such disturbances in the sun as are called sun spots. A theory quite as plausible as this might attribute epidemics of crime to similar influences, by which weak reasons are overthrown and murderous intents are kindled in excitable minds with destructive tendencies. There are causes for all things in life and nature, and no study of such causes is in vain.—Chicago Journal.

What a Despotism Is.

In Russia every conceivable act of man is regulated by law. No private enterprise can be established, no corporation formed, no business entered into without the consent of the state. This law is not the act of a legislative body, but the decree of the czar. "Some decrees read: "I forbid;" others: "It is permitted." In other countries what is not forbidden by law is allowed. In Russia everything is forbidden which the law does not expressly permit or the spirit of the executive power tolerate. It is not the good of the people that is studied, but the welfare of the despot. There can be no mistake; it is impossible for the czar or his agents to do wrong. They have an expression in Russia: "He has offended." What? That is nobody's business. He has offended the police, who accept no apologies and seldom forgive. He may not have violated written law, or even custom; he has simply "offended," and that is enough. He goes to prison, perhaps to Siberia, as the tyrants dictate, for no court interferes, and no habeas corpus is known. There is very little for the lawyers to do but bribe the police.—William Eleroy Curtis.

A Rich Man's Flower Window.

The house in Philadelphia where the widow of Matthew Baldwin now lives is in the center of the business part of Chestnut street, and is remarked upon by many of the passers by because of the peculiar arrangement of a conservatory built on the level with the street. It is like a good sized shop window, but as there is no door visible it cannot be mistaken for one. Beautiful flowers bloom there all the year round.

It seems that when Mr. Baldwin was a lad, before he ever dreamed of fame as a manufacturer of locomotives, he was daily in the habit of passing on his way to work a window filled with flowers. As he had a passionate love for them, he invariably stopped and gazed upon them with delight for a moment or two. After he became a rich man and looked back to his boyhood days, when he was struggling for a livelihood and found so much cheer and comfort from this glimpse of nature's loveliness, he resolved that he would be the means of giving some other boy a chance to look and admire in the same way. He built his house with a special regard to this window of flowers, and it is unique both in conception and construction.—New York Press "Every Day Talk."

The Power of Memory.

Having once possessed knowledge, we can never lose it; the power to use it may be temporarily lost, but there is no knowing when the proper chord may not be struck, and the old fact of memory or the old problem long worked out may not be regained. All our experiences may fade away into the realm of unconsciousness, yet they are not lost; they are only dormant and biding their time. —Francis Speir in Popular Science Monthly.

The first telescope of Galileo was made from part of a lead organ pipe, in each end of which was cemented a suitable spectacle glass.

The Results Came.

"What are you doing here?" asked a policeman of a colored man who had his eye glued to a knot hole in an alley fence on the Brush farm the other morning.

"Waitin', sah."

"For what?"

"Results."

"What results?"

"Man sent me up to whitewash de kitchen ceilin'. Woman said she'd do de job herself an' save fo' bits."

"Anything else?" asked the officer after a long wait,

"Jist a minute, sah; de results ar' almost heah."

Another minute went by, and then there was a wild yell from the house, followed by a crash, and the man at the knot hole chuckled:

"Jist like I figgered! De woman appears. Boaf eyes ar' full of lime, an' when she fell off de cha'r she almoas' busted ebery bone in her body. Now de hired gal has come out. Now de woman in de nex' house runs in. Now de victim sots down on a box an' dey ar' rubbin' her eyes wid a rag. Now de hired gal runs into de house to ring up de police an' de fire engines an' de doctors, an' ——"

"And what?"

Life in Arizona.

From the last issue of the Arizona Kicker we cull the following:

"We notice that some humpbacked coward has tacked up a written plackard on the post-office door asking why we have not been run out of town. If the man who wrote it will reveal his identity, and if we can't put him two feet under the ground inside of five minutes, we will agree to cancel the insurance on our office, set the shanty on fire and leave town on foot."

"It has been remarked that whenever a stranger who looks like a detective appears in town about four-fifths of our leading citizens hunt their holes like foxes. This matter has been carried so far as to seriously interrupt business. We wish strangers would keep away."—Detroit Free Press.

A Good View.

"So you are going to move, Mrs. Marjoram?"

"Yes, Mrs. Sweetbriar; into a lovely house on K—— street."

"Has it a good view?"

"I should say it had. Why, we can look right into the dining room next door and see the family eat their meals."

County Official Paper.

Jay Gould and Russell Sage say that Charles Francis Adams owns the principle interest in a great stock yard in Kansas City. As President of the U. P. Railroad Company Mr. Adams so fixed freights on cattle that in one year the stock yard yielded a profit of a million dollars To make such vast gain as this great numbers of people must be robbed. The opportunities afforded managers of railroads to make enormous gains is such a temptation as flesh and blood cannot withstand. The man who would never think of picking a pocket or robbing a traveler upon the highway, will not hesitate to wring the last dollar out of multitudes of people by charging "all the trafic will bear." So the sufferers be numerous enough, there is no harm in robbing them.

EDIE AND I.

Sister and brother for many a year,
Edie and I;
Sharing bright weather and facing the drear,
Edie and I.
Keen is our love as a sword free from rust,
Time welds the closer our absolute trust,
So shall it be till we both are but dust,
Edie and I.

Just to know this, that we never shall change,
Edie and I;
Never grow formal and distant and strange,
Edie and I.
Lovers may fade like a comet's brief flame,
Friendship is often but friendship in name,
Come what come may we are always the same,
Edie and I.

Brother and sister and heart within heart,
Edie and I;
Chaos nor death cannot drive us apart,
Edie and I.
Stendfast as those who have died for a creed,
True to each other in word and in deed,
Never to fail in the hour of need,
Edie and I.

ON APPROVAL.

"What on earth d'ye call that thing?" I asked, poking with my stick at a bunch of grapes poised airily upon a brass stand.

"That thing," replied my cousin proudly, "is the very latest Parisian fashion in bonnets."

I sank back into the little lounge that ran along the side of the room—you couldn't insult anything so dainty with the name of "shop"—and gazed upon its owner with an exclamation more profane than appropriate.

It must at once be confessed that she was a charming object to gaze at. There was an expression of wicked amusement in her large gray eyes, and the black gown she still wore in mourning for her husband—poor Jack Henderson, who was killed in the Soudan—set off the lines of her slender young figure, and threw her golden hair and fair skin prettily into relief.

"Pull yourself together, my dear boy," she continued, opening the door of an old carved oak cabinet, "and I will show you something that even your crude male intellect will appreciate. If you don't say it's lovely I'll never let you inside the shop again. You may flatten your nose against the window, or stroll disconsolately up and down the street in vain! No more chats, no more teas in the back room!"

So saying, she lifted gingerly from the shelf a a large hat, and planting it upon her pretty head turned triumphantly toward me. It was lovely—quite lovely—a sort of arrangement in amethyst velvet and feathers to match. Being only a miserable and ignorant male of course I can't describe it, but it was uncommonly becoming, and made Nina look like a Gainsborough picture. I told her so and gushed over it sufficiently to satisfy her.

"It's my own idea, shape and all, and there isn't another like it in the world. I may possibly copy it, but I'm not sure. It depends upon who buys it. How I wish you were a woman, Ronald!" she sighed regretfully, "and I would make you buy it for Ascot to-morrow?"

"I wish I were, my dear. But why don't you go and wear it yourself?"

"Gracious! and leave the shop for a whole day at this early stage of its existence? You guardsmen have no more idea of business than a baby. No, I can't go; but I hope you'll have a lucky day and a good time, and Ronald dear, if you were nice you'd just look in one day soon and tell me what sort of day you had. Oh, and be sure you don't forget to notice what hats and bonnets people wore."

I promised to do my best, and took my leave reluctantly as a large and portly matron, gorgeously arrayed, and whose features unmistakably betrayed her Semitic origin, sailed in and demanded a small "flower bonnet."

That woman in a flower bonnet! I hope, poor soul, that Nina saved her from herself.

"What are you going to do this afternoon, Ronald?" asked my mother, three days later. "I wish you to come and call with me on the Vanderdeckens."

"Can't, my dear mother. Promised to go and see Nina."

Visions of Miss Vanderdecken, rich as Crœsus, but oh! so deadly dull, hastened my movements, and I was half way to Oxford street before my mother could call me back. I found Mme. Destrier, as my cousin calls herself, just parting with a customer. The hat was in her hand.

"I've sold it," she cried gleefully; "just sold it to that nice girl for five guineas."

"Awfully glad, I'm sure. But, my dear girl, I've a shock in store for you. I saw the very model and marrow of that hat at Ascot the day before yesterday."

"You couldn't, you couldn't! Who was wearing it?" she cried sharply.

"One of our reigning professional beauties—Lady Loddington."

"Lady Loddington!" gasped Nina, catching hold of the chair behind her. "Ronald, are you sure you aren't making any mistake?"

"I swear I'm not. She had on a frock the color of the hat, and she looked simply ripping. I paid her all the compliments I could think of in the five minutes I was talking to her."

"The cheat, the swindle of it!" cried my cousin, white with anger.

"My dear girl, calm yourself! I'm sorry for you, but great minds, as you know, will jump, and some other clever woman has had the same idea as you."

Nina was past taking any notice of the insulting suggestion. She seemed thoroughly upset by the coincidence, and looked as if she were going to cry.

"Why did I ever go into business?" she cried miserably; "it's simply awful to get behind the scenes like this and find out how mean women—well bred women who ought to know better—can be. We were all brought up with the old fashioned noblesse oblige ideas. Ron—you were too—and it seems to me now that there is hardly any one in society who has a notion of honor and dignity, as we used to understand the terms. Society! After all I'm thankful I'm more or less out of it. It's just a herd of people, pushing, struggling, selling everything for notoriety and money."

"Hear, hear! Your sentiments, madam, are mine. But I don't think they should be wasted on the mere fact that some other woman has made a hat like yours."

"She hasn't!" cried Nina indignantly. "Lady Loddington was wearing this very hat! Listen, I'll tell you the whole story. The same afternoon you called a lady came in beautifully dressed and asked to see some hats. I saw who she was, though I've never met her. I don't want to meet her," savagely; "one sees quite enough of her in all the shop windows."

"One does," I remarked, sotto voce.

"She wanted a hat the color of this one; so I brought it out and showed it to her and told her the price, and explained why it was so expensive. 'Oh, I don't mind giving that for the hat,' she said, 'it is well worth it. I am quite in love with it, Mme. Destrier, but I daren't buy it without letting my husband see it. He is so very particular about what I wear. Could I have it sent round tonight for him to look at? I would let you know some time to-morrow whether I would take it or not.' Of course I said I should be glad to send it, and she gave me the address, and the hat went round there that evening. Last night she sent it back and said she was very sorry, but Lord Loddington didn't think it suited her. I thought it looked a little tumbled, but one has to run those risks when one sends goods on approval. She had determined to have that hat just to wear for the one day, and she was too mean to get it honestly."

"Of course you'll have it out with her—you'll expose her?" I said.

I was as angry and disgusted as Nina, who stood opposite me, with her pretty eyes and cheeks flaming with honest indignation.

"My dear boy, I would if I dared, but I can't afford to. It would drive half my customers away from me, and I must think of Hugo and Giles. They don't cost much while they are such tinies, but I want to give them every advantage, the darlings, and I was left so badly off, and the business is just beginning to pay so well. I daren't run the risk of exposing Lady Loddington's meanness."

"I had forgotten your children. No, I see it wouldn't do. Trust me to give her a mauvais quart d'heure, if I get the chance."

"Promise you'll be careful. Think of the boys!"

"I won't injure the dear little chaps, you best of mothers."

"Well, in that case, I only hope fortune may favor you."

Fortune did favor me at last, but she kept me waiting till the autumn, like the fickle jade she always is. My chance came in this wise: My uncle asked me up to his place in Scotland for shooting, and I went. The old gentleman is a very connoisseur of beauty, and every pretty woman of note is bound to be asked up to D. sooner or later. I got there in time to dress hurriedly and appear in the drawing room just as my uncle was telling every one whom they were to take in. I was introduced to some girl—I haven't a notion who she was, but I gave her my arm and took her down to dinner, murmuring commonplaces on the way. The truth is, I was half famished with my journey and my one idea was dinner. It was not till I was well on with the fish stage that I looked at my left hand neighbor. It was Lady Loddington herself.

"I haven't seen you since we met at Ascot," she remarked pleasantly.

She certainly is a most lovely woman, by the way. I stared blankly, and she went on, with an air of well acted reproach:

"I believe you have forgotten we ever met there."

Here was my chance; I seized it.

"Forgotten! Why, I remember every word you said, the color of your gown, and even the very hat you wore—the loveliest and most becoming hat I ever saw in my life."

The compliment told.

"I don't believe you do," she pouted.

"Upon my word I do. It was a sort of big affair of amethyst velvet and feathers to match. I remember it with double force because I made a cousin of mine quite angry with the mere description of it. I don't know if you have ever met her? She has gone into millinery, like everybody else. She calls herself 'Mme. Destrier.'"

I looked Lady Loddington full in the face, and laid a peculiar emphasis on the name.

I never saw any one so thoroughly caught in my life. I knew in a moment that she knew I knew, as Punch would put it. She turned perfectly scarlet to the roots of her hair, and then quite white, and didn't speak for at least a moment. Then she pulled herself together as only a woman can, and adroitly changed the subject.

But she has been monstrously civil to me ever since, much to the surprise of my friends. I am plain and uninteresting; I am not a personage; I haven't a farthing—not even expectations—and they can't make out where the attraction lies. They had better ask Mme. Destrier, of Oxford street, to enlighten them.—London World.

N. T. Piper vs. J. C. Crocker et al—Filed Summons and Writ of Attachment.

N. T. Piper vs. J. F. Turner et al—Filed Summons and Writ of Attachment.

People vs. W. T. C. Elliott—Filed motion directing that model be made of the Baker premises. Order directing Joseph Seely to make said model.

THURSDAY, Dec. 4.

O. I. Mairs vs. A. D. Gilbert and Nathan Rhine.—Filed complaint and notice of pendency of action for foreclosure of mortgage.

Order made for special session of Court to be held December 16th to determine contest.

It is stated that Mrs. Stanford will soon publicly join the Roman Catholic Church.

The Elliott witnesses have been traveling through town in a steady stream all the week.

Jack Harrington has gone to Reno to visit his family and will be gone about a month.

Miss Allie Rose has gone to Hawthorne, and expects to remain there for several months.

Fred Holbert returned from Visalia this week. He succeeded in getting his cattle through without a great deal of loss.

Mr. A. D. Jones was in town this week. He has just made a clean up at the Maxim mill of a run of ore from Redding Canyon.

The Governor has offered a reward of $300 for the arrest of the Indian who recently murdered Mrs. Farmer in Antelope Valley, south from Mojave.

Patrick Crowley was sentenced to imprisonment for life at Virginia City last Saturday. He killed William Nichols with an ax in the Savage mine, and afterward threw the body of the murdered man down the shaft.

Misses Mary and Margaret Stuart arrived at Independence from Hastings, England, last Friday. The young ladies are nieces of Mr. Alexander Clark with whom they are visiting. They made the journey of over six thousand miles without mishap and enjoyed the trip exceedingly.

Mr. C. M. Joslyn died at the home of his son-in-law in San Luis Obispo last Saturday. Mr. Joslyn was an old pioneer of Inyo county. He owned the ranch, now the property of W. L. Hunter, for many years. He has been ailing and feeble for a long time past but a naturally strong constitution enabled him to live to the ripe age of 80 years.

Gross Injustice.

Fifty five witnesses have been subpoened to attend the second trial of Elliott at Bakersfield. Many of these unfortunates are now on their way across the desert, some traveling on horseback and others in conveyances of different kinds. For several days past the rain has been coming down in torrents, and the hardship these people are subjected to is very great. Two hundred and fifty miles of desert and mountain have to be traversed, nearly all the way through wastes of sand and sagebrush, where for distances of thirty or forty miles there is not a human habitation. It is notorious that by far the greater portion of these people do not know any more of the facts connected with the murder of John B. White by W. T. C. Elliott than people living east of the Rocky Mountains. Women with infants in their arms; girls who were only fourteen years old and who were at school thirty miles from Big Pine at the time of the murder are now out on the desert going to Bakersfield as witnesses. Women who never spoke to Elliott in the whole course of their lives, and it is very doubtful if they know him by sight, are subpoened. There never was a greater abuse of legal privilege than in this case. No provision is made by the Supervisors of Inyo county for conveying these people to Bakersfield. They are assured that if they do not appear in Court on the day stated in the subpoena, bench warrants will be issued for their arrest and they will be severely punished for contempt of Court. Farmers have to rustle hard at this time to get money to pay taxes, and now in addition to this many of them are put to sore straits to get coin enough to pay expenses on this long trip. It is expected that the witnesses will not get back to their homes again before Christmas. No citizen of Inyo county would hinder a man on trial for his life from using any means the law allows him to defend himself. But in this case it is a notorious fact, and was so demonstrated upon the former trial of Elliott, that the privilege allowed him by law has been grossly abused by dragging so many people away from their homes who do not know a single circumstance or fact material to his defense. The crime of Elliott has already cost Inyo county about twelve thousand dollars, and the coming trial will cost about six thousand more. This does not include one dollar of the large amount spent by witnesses out of their own money. There ought to be some provision of law for defending law-abiding people from such gross outrages as this at the hands of lawless criminals.

Irrigation Works.

It is stated that in Honey Lake Valley, Lassen County, seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars has been spent during the past spring and summer for storing water. Every dollar of this large sum belongs outside of Lassen County. There are a few intelligent and enterprising men in the County, and by their influence capitalists have been induced to invest their money in these improvements. Fortunately for Lassen, the bulk of the citizens are intelligent enough to understand that all will be benefited by the efforts of the few who have succeeded in getting capitalists to invest in these improvements, and if actual help cannot be given, at least the people will not try to cripple and injure in every way the men who are trying to help them. The men of Lassen are not so stupid as each one to be a dog in the manger. If they cannot build ditches and reservoirs for the reclamation of their desert lands, they are quite willing that others shall do it. The writer of this article knows Honey Lake valley well and feels safe in saying that about the town of Bishop and seven miles south, including the Furbee ranch, there is more arable land in that part of Owens Valley that in the whole of Honey Lake Valley. Bishop Creek alone carries more water than all the streams that flow into Honey Lake Valley. The part of Owens Valley mentioned does not contain one fifth of the arable land of the Valley, and if Bishop Creek were dried up, its volumn would not be missed from Owens river. The climate of Owens Valley is far better than that of Honey Lake Valley. In the latter valley the only fruit that can be relied on with any degree of certainty is apples, while in Owens Valley all the fruits of the Temperate zones are produced in the higest degree of perfection. There is not a single product of land but what at all times commands a higer price here than in Honey Lake Valley. All this is but saying over again what was said ages ago, that natural advantages are valueless without intelligence and perseverence to improve them. There is not the least doubt that the improvements made in Honey Lake Valley will lead to a speedy and great increase of population, and just as little doubt need be entertained that all intelligent and industrious people who go there will make good and comfortable homes. The country is far superior in soil and climate to any of the New England States. Nothing could be further from the intention of the writer than to disparage Honey Lake Valley, or to discourage any one from investing money or going there to live. We believe firmly that fair interest will be returned on every dollar invested there in irrigation works, and we know it to be a fact that even with moderate industry and care farmers can live in comfort there. The intention of the writer is to invite attention to the fact that where one dollar may be safely invested in Lassen County, ten may be quite as safely invested in Owens Valley. Long before those works were begun in Honey Lake Valley every inch of water flowing into it was appropriated, and the older settlers were firm in their belief that no more land could be irrigated. All the money since invested and improvements made are in water storage reservoirs and ditches for the better distribution of the water. There is enough water flowing into Owens Valley to irrigate the whole of it without storing a gallon. The water is in sight, and nothing is needed but canals to convey it upon the land. If men who have money to invest would but come to Owens Valley and carefully consider the land, water and climate, there would be no difficulty in getting out money enough to construct the simple works only that are needed to fertilize land enough for two hundred thousand people to live upon.

Self defense.

There ought to be at least one, or even two, volunteer military companies organized in Owens Valley. When such men as General Miles and others who best know the Indians, regard the excitement that now so widely prevails among them, as something very serious, none but a flippant fool will treat the matter lightly. On the whole Pacific Coast there is no other region that would be more exposed to a raid by Indians than Owens Valley. There is not a single white settlement between us and the Indians of Arizona on the south. On the east bands of Indians roam the country to the Rocky Mountains, and there is not a barrier between us and them but mountains and deserts, and to Indians these are no barriers at all. On the north is an unbroken desert of nearly three hundred miles to Carson and Virginia City. On the west the mighty wall of the Sierras offers an obstacle that only an eagle could pass in the winter, and even in summer it can be passed in very few places by any creature except a wild cat. A few hours work by a band of Indians at one or two points where the Carson and Colorado railroad crosses the White Mountain, would destroy that thoroughfare and leave the people of Owens Valley as completely "bottled up" as Ben Butler was with his army at Bermuda hundred. The Indians of Owens Valley are very quiet and do not show any signs of being affected by the excitement so wide spread among other Indians. But many are still living who were as fierce and treacherous as any Indians ever encountered by white men. Not the least doubt is entertained that these old Indians would be quite willing to take revenge for the last defeat inflicted upon them by the whites at Owens Lake. The white population of Owens Valley is so great the native Indians would never think of molesting them in any way. But roving bands of other Indians might get among them and incite them to mischief. There is now no military organization among the white people, we are almost totaly unarmed, the country being so poor, that save a few shot guns and rifles for hunting, there are no fire arms among us. In the event of an Indian raid we could not do much to protect ourselves, and we would be nearly entirely beyond help from anywhere else. A fair amount of military drill and discipline would in any event be good for our young men, and the General Government would very likely supply arms enough for two companies. Let some of our gallant young men begin the organization of at least one company. Some old vet will be found who will shoulder his crutch and show how fields were won and still be capable to teach the drill.

Twenty acres of alfalfa land on Wattersons ranch near Bishop had got flooded last winter and in the spring was so tramped over by stock that the alfalfa was ruined. The ground was plowed and sown with wheat. Twenty-six tons of first class wheat were gathered from the twenty acres. A few years ago this land was considered utterly worthless, like much of the same kind in Owens Valley.

John Wilson, of Darwin, arrived at Independence on Thursday. He reports the mining outlook for his section of the county as encouraging.

Pay For It.

The State Librarian has asked that a copy of the INYO INDEPENDENT be regularly mailed to the Library, and also that back numbers of the paper from the beginning of the present year be sent. The Librarian says he has no money to pay for the paper, and asks that it be given gratis. Every year large sums are supplied from the State Treasury for the purchase of books and other reading matter. It costs money to produce newspapers as well as books. The proprietor of the INYO INDEPENDENT pays taxes to the State, and is of opinion that if the paper is of value for historical matter etc., as the Librarian says it is, the State is able to pay for it. Private persons who want the paper pay for it, and we think the State is able to do the same.

Strange Indians.

During the present week several Shoshone Indians from eastern Nevada have been in Owens Valley. They are very shrewd and fine looking Indians, and well dressed and speak English fluently. Their object in coming here is to induce our Indians to to get up a big "ghost dance". Several conferences have been held, but the Owens Valley Indians steadily refuse to get up any dance or big meeting of any kind. These Indians fully understand the power of the white people and would not do anything that the whites would regard as unfriendly. Over in Saline Valley these Shoshone missionaries, before coming here, got up a ghost dance among the Indians there that lasted several days.

Election Contest.

Mr. J. B. Stewart of Big Pine has filed notice in the Superior Court of contest of election against Mr. E. Robinson of Independence. Both were candidates for Supervisor. At Independence precinct the election of officers, by a strange misunderstanding of the law, refused to count for Mr. Stewart a single one of the votes cast for him on his party ticket. The only votes counted for him were seventeen Democratic tickets on which Mr. Robinson's name had been scratched by his party and the name of Mr. Stewart inserted. Mr. Robinson had a majority of three as the votes were counted. Many Republicans at Independence are willing to make oath that they voted for Mr. Stewart. The case will be heard in the Superior Court on the 16th inst.

For Sale.

The ranch known as the "Ritter's place" near Lone Pine is offered for sale together with the the farming implements and stock. The ranch contains 320 acres of excellent land. The stock consists of thirty head of cattle and twelve brood mares. There is now sixty tons of hay on the place and feed enough to winter 200 head of stock. The winter pasture has been rented five years past at $300 a year. The soil is a rich loam and excellently adapted to vegetable raising. There is plenty of outside range, making it a good stock ranch. For further particulars address

THE BUCCANEERS OF OLD

Flaunted the skull and cross bones, their ensign, defiantly at the masthead. Your modern pirate, not on the high seas, but upon the high reputation of standard remedies skulks under various disguises. His hole and corner traffic has never to any degree affected Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, although that standard invigorant and corrective has long been the shinning mark at which his shafts have been directed. Cheap local bitters, composed of fiery unrectified stimulants, with an infusion, or extract possibly, of some tonic bark, are still sometimes recommended as identical with, or similar to, or possessing virtues kindred to those of America's chosen family medicine. These perish speedily, while the great subduer and preventive of disease pursues its successful career, overcoming malaria, dyspepsia, nervousness, kidney troubles, constipation and rheumatic ailments, not only on this, but on many continents.

On the mend

—the consumptive who's not bereft of judgment and good sense. He's taking Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery. If taken in time and given a fair trial, it will effect a cure. Consumption is Lung-scrofula. For Scrofula, in its myriad forms, and for all Liver, Blood and Lung diseases, the "Discovery" is an unequalled remedy. It's the only guaranteed one. If it doesn't benefit or cure, you get your money back. You only pay for the good you get.

"Discovery" strengthens Weak Lungs, and cures Spitting of Blood, Shortness of Breath, Bronchitis, Severe Coughs, and kindred affections. Don't be fooled into taking something else, said to be "just as good," that the dealer may make a larger profit. There's nothing at all like the "Discovery." It contains no alcohol to inebriate; no syrup or sugar to derange digestion. As peculiar in its curative effects as in its composition. Equally good for adults or children.

CAMP LIFE.

The one thing you'll always find in every cowboy's outfit when he goes on the spring round-up is a "Fish Brand" Pommel Slicker. They make the only perfect saddle coat, and come either black or yellow. They protect the whole front of the rider's body, being made to fit round the outside of the saddle entire. When used as a walking coat, the extension pieces neatly over-lap each other, making a regular overcoat with a double storm-proof front. When riding, the saddle is dry as a bone, from pommel to cantle, and the rider is entirely protected in every part of his body. These "Slickers," being of extra width, make fine blankets for camp. Beware of worthless imitations, every garment stamped with "Fish Brand" Trade Mark. Don't accept any inferior coat when you can have the "Fish Brand Slicker" delivered without extra cost. The Professional Humorist's Work.

The task of a man who is compelled to get up a certain amount of pointed humor daily is more laborious than that of a hod carrier. It is something like it, too. He just carries stuff to the level of the average comprehension, and having deposited it before the person to get the benefit of it, goes after more. How does the humorist work? Well, it depends largely upon his temperament, and greater or less fitness for his specialty. Some men, although they may have fair ability in some lines of writing, are slow to originate a humorous idea, notwithstanding that they can appreciate it in others. To such, the writing of a humorous paragraph or article is something to be dreaded. It would be a violation of newspaper ethics for a professional writer to decline to get up an article on any subject or from any standpoint. Given a theme and told to treat it humorously, the most sedate member of a newspaper staff will attack it without hesitation, and, in his own time, will do the work well, perhaps as well as the man whose specialty is humor.

But, ah, the labor of the sedate man! How each queer simile, every epigrammatic sentence and every odd expression will wring his soul and make his brain throb! Fun! Tell him that he ought to enjoy his own fun, and he will probably brain you with the office poker. Ask the regular paragrapher whether he enjoys his work, and he will think you a fool. He does it because it is his work, but the terrible wrestle he has with the English language every day to evolve those atrocious witticisms of his, no one knows but himself. To the young man who thinks of going into newspaper work as a funny man, there is only one word of advice to be given, and that, by the way, was used by the most dismal humorist of the present century, London Punch: "Don't!"—Pittsburg Bulletin.

Hardiness of American Half Breeds.

The experience of the teachers of the Lincoln institution confirms the views here expressed, that the mixed Indian is more exempt from pulmonary disease than the pure Indian; and, further, that if the former are attacked by disease, they offer greater constitutional resistance to it than the latter. This view is also confirmed by the large experience of Capt. R. H. Pratt, superintendent of the Carlisle Indian school, who says in his last report: "Our experience is that the mixed bloods resist disease and death from pulmonary troubles better than the full bloods; and our best health conditions are found among those we send out into families—due, I think, very largely to the regular occupation and varied diet."

Similar views have been expressed by others who have resided among the mixed or half breed races in the northwestern part of Canada. These people are said to be strong and hearty, long lived, and not subject to disease, so long as they remain in their native climate. They regard themselves as the equal of the whites, and look in a patronizing way on the Indian. Their families are usually very large, and the female sex is said to be very handsome. Quite recently I had occasion to investigate the question whether pulmonary consumption tends to exterminate the American Indian, and I then found that nearly all those Indian agencies which show the lowest consumption rate are precisely those which are shown in the table of this paper to contain the largest number of mixed bloods.—Thomas J. Mays, M. D., in Popular Science Monthly.

Best Position During Sleep.

Of all our sleeping millions who arise at sun call with more or less reluctance or promptness, how many are free from morning headache? Not a large proportion, so far as I have observed. It is probable that a majority acquire their pain from wrong posture during sleep. I have asked many how they lie in bed; I find generally they rest upon the side, with legs drawn up and chin upon the chest—rolled up like a chicken in an egg shell. Some few sleep upon the back, one or two prone, and several with an arm stretched up beneath the head; but the usual posture is, I think, as first stated.

Now, in this shape, the human body describes an arc of a circle, with blood and air vessels constricted by pressure on the inside of the arc, and their caliber sensibly diminished. Jugular veins, returning exhausted blood from the brain, find the flow of their contents interfered with, and a condition of passive congestion is set up. Lungs compressed by weight of head and curvature of trunk, expand but partially, and their work is badly done. Therefore it takes an hour or more in the morning, with bath and toilet, to set wheels going that should never have been checked, and to get rid of the headache. Try this way once: When fairly in bed, lights out, and ready for sleep, throw the head well back, upon a pillow of medium height, chest forward, arms by the side and legs extended. Fight it out a few minutes and sleep will come—this time without a headache in it.—William F. Hutchinson, M. D., in American Magazine.

A Pundit's Sly Trick.

About 500 years ago there was a celebrated pundit of Nudya, who was particularly fond of country spirits, and used to take about a quart of it every day. People suspecting him of this weakness watched him. One evening, when he was returning from his vesper prayers at the riverside, he was seen to come out on the sly from a grog shop, with his water pot full of aniseed arrack, and he was taxed by the crowd for conduct so disreputable in a Brahmin of his learning and sanctity. He denied the charge, and placed the vessel before his accuser, when lo! it appeared to contain milk. A miracle! a miracle! cried the crowd, and the pundit, instead of being degraded, was canonized; the fact being that the wily toper knew well that aniseed liquor, mixed with a little water, becomes milky, and he had prepared it accordingly.—Report of British Commission.

Daughter or Doggie?

Mistress (severely)—Marie, didn't I hear you make use of the expression 'you little brat' in the nursery just now?

Marie (a French bonne)—Yees, madame, but Mees Flossie do wexes me so!

Mistress (less severely)—Oh, I thought you were speaking to Fido. Send Miss Flossie to me at once.—The Enoch.

Supply of Artesian Wells.

A striking confirmation of the theory of the source of supply of the artesian waters has been observed at Tours, where the water, spouting with great velocity from a well 110 meters in depth, brings up, together with fine sand, fresh water shells and seeds in such a state of preservation as to show that they could not have been more than three or four months on their voyage. Some of the wells of the Wady Rir have also ejected fresh water mollusks, fish and crabs, still living, which must, therefore, have made a still more rapid transit.—Professor G. A. Daubree in Popular Science Monthly.

A WARNING AGAINST MESMERISM.

Disastrous Results from the Experiments of Amateurs—Risky Business.

It has become a great fad in family circles to experiment in the art of mesmerism and to try the various tricks of test mediums, such as staring steadfastly in the eye of a weak willed person and thus obtain control of their minds. These amateurs find a great deal of fun in this form of amusement, but sensible parents should never countenance such proceedings, for the most disastrous results are likely to ensue where the subject is of a neurotic temperament. Nervous, hysterical girls and soft boned, growing lads should be kept away from these circles, for there is always a possibility of administering a shock that will leave lasting effects.

I was called to attend a young lady in North St. Louis, who had lain in a trance state for three days and could not be restored by ordinary medical treatment. She had been playing at innocent parlor tricks one Sunday evening until the entire company declared they had enough of it. Then a young man proposed to mesmerize one of the young ladies, and, without any idea of his secret power, made the usual passes which he had seen practiced in the theaters. After the third movement the girl's eyes assumed a glassy stare, and the operator became alarmed. The subject was to all intents unconscious of her actions and would not respond to pinching, calls, or even a more violent summons. She was put to bed by her mother, who was a witness of the affair, and ordinary remedies usual in catalepsy applied. A physician was called in, but he could not suggest any relief except electricity. A strong shock was given, but the patient remained insensible, although breathing regularly.

When other measures failed, the parents sent after me, and after hearing the facts I decided the body was surcharged with electricity and the girl must be demagnetized. I worked for three hours, and was almost completely exhausted when I began feeling the cold current passing from my fingers through my system. Then I realized the girl was saved, for science had conquered. Imagine what would have happened if the result was failure. The patient was a handsome blonde, of a negative nature, only 17 years of age, and although she had never been south in her life, she spoke of places in Memphis, and while under the mesmeric influence claimed that her name was Henry Seymour. She would answer questions promptly when addressed by that name, and appeared to grow quite angry when informed that she was a woman—a fact that she would not believe.—Magnetic Physician in Globe-Democrat.

"Coconut," and Not "Cocoanut."

It may interest readers to know that a recent number of the new quarterly, Annals of Botany, contains a short article by Professor Bayley Balfour upon the correct spelling of this word. He shows that etymology and early authority alike make "coconut" the correct form for the fruit of the coco palm, and that "cocoanut" is merely a relic of the ignorance of those who supposed cocoa and chocolate to be obtained from the coconut. This "ignorance, madam, pure ignorance!" was unfortunately shared by Dr. Johnson at the time when he prepared his "Dictionary," and although he afterward learned otherwise, and in his "Life of Drake" correctly wrote coco, plural cocoes, this was after the publication of the last edition of the "Dictionary" in his lifetime, so that he had no opportunity of correcting his unfortunate and misleading error.

Botanists, however, long continued to use the correct form—some have never ceased to do so—and Professor Balfour now calls upon them to unite in banishing the blundering "cocoa nut," and in putting an end to a mischievous confusion between coco, cocoa and coca, which are the three entirely distinct vegetable products. For coco he is able to cite not only Dr. Johnson's own use as opposed to his Dictionary, but the use of the laureate, who in "Enoch Arden" writes:

The slendor coco's drooping crown of flowers.

Dr. Murray is also quoted as writing, "I shall certainly use coco in the dictionary," and treat cocoa as an incorrect by form.—Notes and Queries.

Science in the Household.

There is heat enough wasted around an ordinary kitchen range—to say nothing of the furnace—to furnish all the power needed to run the sewing machine, pump water for an elevator, and light the dwelling by electricity. The same waste of heat of the cooking apparatus might be made to cool the house in summer and to dispense with the ice bill.

When nitrate of ammonia, for example, is dissolved in water it absorbs an enormous amount of heat and the principle is readily applied in the construction of refrigerating chambers. Properly elaborated and located these could be so arranged as to keep meats, etc., better than the ordinary ice box, to cool water for drinking more wholesomely than the average ice supply, and to send volumes of cold air down through shafts to registers in the ceilings of rooms so that the heat of summer might be tempered as certainly as the cold of winter. The same supply of the ammonia salt may be used repeatedly by evaporating the water, for which purpose the waste heat above spoken of could be utilized. The possibilities of applied science in the household have not been even nibbled at.—Chicago News.

Didn't Know All His Neighbors.

A distinguished clergyman once asked a gentleman to contribute money for foreign missions, and received the reply:

"I don't believe in foreign missions. I won't give anything except to home missions. I want to benefit my neighbors."

"Well," responded the doctor, "whom do you regard as your neighbors?"

"Why, those around me."

"Do you mean those whose land joins yours?"

"Yes."

"Well, how much land do you own?"

"About 500 acres."

"How far down do you own it?"

"Why, I never thought of it before, but I suppose I own half way through."

"Exactly," was the reply. "I suppose you do, and I want this money for the Chinese, the men whose land joins yours on the bottom."—Pacific.

A Blind Newsdealer.

There is in Philadelphia a blind newsdealer whose sense of touch is so acute that he not only makes change accurately and rapidly, but can detect a counterfeit note or coin at once. His stand has been for many years near the corner of Sixth and Chestnut streets. In nine years, he says, only $3.50 in counterfeit money has been successfully passed on him. His sense of hearing is also remarkable, and after he hears the voice of a regular customer he can always call him by name.—New York World.

ANTIQUITY OF THE TELEPHONE.

The Priests of India Have Used It for 2,000 Years.

"The principle of the telephone has been known for 2,000 years in India," was the rather incredible statement made the other night by Fred Amesbury, who has just returned to New York after a two years' sojourn in the land of striped tigers and wonderful fakirs. "I do not assert, mark you," continued Mr. Amesbury, "that they use the telephone as we use it, or that they have any system of general communication. What I do say is that the high caste people have a method of communicating with each other by vibratory action on a diaphragm, just as we do, but it is confined entirely to their temples, and its existence has remained a secret until within a very few years.

"I was in a town called Panj, about 200 miles from Madras, and while there became acquainted with an English officer named Harrington, who was a prime favorite with the natives because on one occasion he had saved a priest from drowning. He was a very genial, pleasant fellow, and had that peculiar magnetism about him that made and kept friends everywhere.

"It was through Harrington that I was enabled to learn the existence of telephone communication and to satisfy myself of its antiquity.

"There are two temples in the village about a mile apart. In the interior and on the ground floor of each is a small circular structure which is guarded day and night from the natives as well as from strangers, and is supposed to be the abiding place of the 'governing spirit,' but in reality is the terminus of the telephone line, which is laid underground from one building to the other.

"The superstitious natives regarded this little structure with the greatest awe and reverence, because they had seen demonstrated before their eyes—or rather ears—the power of this spirit to communicate with the other temple. They were required to make their offering in one building and make known their wishes and desires. Then immediately repairing to the second temple they would be informed of all they had said and done, although neither priest had left his post. This was regarded as a demonstration of the power of the spirit.

"We were unable to determine the composition of the wire that connected the two buildings. It was some kind of metal, but neither steel, copper nor brass, although it closely resembled the latter. The transmitter was of wood and about the size of the head of a flour barrel, and to establish connection, instead of ringing a bell, the person wishing to attract attention at the other end stood close to the curious looking thing and shouted, 'Ooey! ooey! ooey!'

"This was answered by a similar shout, which while faint was distinct and could be heard two feet away.

"After Harrington and I had gained the confidence of the priests—or, rather, after he had—we were given a carte blanche to do as we pleased, and we talked to each other from one temple to the other for more than an hour, and were enabled to make an incomplete investigation.

"We learned that the telephone that we saw had been in use for thirty years. The priests were very old men and they remembered that the line of communication had been renewed only once during their incumbency.

"They showed us the remains of worm eaten transmitters and wooden conduits that must have been hundreds of years old. They claimed that the system had been in existence since the creation, and laughed at us when we told them that the same principle has only been applied in England and America within the last dozen years. In every part of India and in Burmah this system of secret communication exists, although hundreds of travelers have never suspected it. I believe that it dates back fully 2,000 years."—New York Graphic Interview.

Russia's Political Offenders.

When a burglar, murderer or other common Russian felon has been tried, found guilty and sentenced to penal servitude, he is, as a rule, released from the solitary confinement in which he has been held pending trial, is allowed to mingle with other prisoners of the same penal grade, and is forwarded without unnecessary delay to Siberia. When, however, a political offender has been tried, found guilty and sentenced to penal servitude under the same code of laws, he is not released from solitary confinement, nor sent with reasonable promptness to Siberia, as he would be if he had merely killed his mother with an ax, but is thrown into a bomb proof casemate in what is known as the "penal servitude section" of the Petropavlovsk fortress, or into one of the smaller cells of a "central convict prison," and there lies in solitude and wretchedness for one, two, three, or even five years, before he finally goes insane or is sent to the convict mines of Kara.—George Kennan in The Century.

Books Published Last Year.

The number of books published in this country last year was 4,437. This is something more than 2,000 less than were published in 1886, the difference resulting from the falling off in copyright books, and the increase in story newspapers and magazines. The cheap publication system is accountable for a good deal of this, but one is at a loss to know where the nearly 2,000 new publications of last year are all to be found.—Boston Herald.

Willie and His Mother.

"Papa," said little Willie Wilkins to his father, who was reading the paper. "Papa, won't you listen to me? Papa"——

"Don't bother your father, dear," said his mother, "what is it you want to know?"

"Why do sailors trim their sails?"

"Oh, why, to make them look pretty, of course. Whenever you want to know anything just ask your mamma."—Merchant Traveler.

A New Lubricating Oil.

A new lubricant, the use of which is advocated in The Austrian Railroad Journal, is mustard oil. It remains perfectly fluid at the low temperature of 14 degs. Farhenheit, and will keep unchanged for years.—Public.

The empress of Austria has caused her wedding dress to be cut up and made into a set of vestments for the Church of St. Matthew in Pesth. The dress was of white brocade with silver threads embroidered all over with beautiful garlands of roses in silver.

The most elaborate mourning cloak heard of has lately been made for the Duchess d'Aosta. It is of heavy silk, trimmed with flat bands of ostrich plumes, and having all its edges finished with fringes of plumes that have a jet band as their beading.

A LEVEL HEAD.

The Advantage of Presence of Mind in an Emergency.

During the late strike on the New York Central Railroad, the militia were ordered to be in readiness in case of a riot, but they were not called out.

In an interview, Gov. Hill said the troops were not to be called upon except in case of an emergency. The emergency had not arisen, therefore they would not be ordered out. He remarked that this was the first great strike with which he had had experience, and he did not propose to lose his head; the only point at which there had then been serious trouble was at Syracuse, and there a deputy-sheriff had lost his head and precipitated an encounter.

The strike continued several weeks and there was riotous action at various points along the road, but the civil authorities were able to cope with it without calling on the militia.

The test of a man's real ability comes when an emergency arises which makes a hasty call on his good judgment and discretion. The man who retains his presence of mind, maintains his equipoise and exercises sound discretion at such critical junctures, is to be relied on and will be put to the front.

Men with level heads have the staying qualities which do not falter in the face of danger. Otis A. Cole, of Kinsman, O., June 10, 1890, writes: "In the fall of 1888 I was feeling very ill. I consulted a doctor and he said I had Bright's disease of the kidneys and that he would not stand in my shoes for the state of Ohio." But he did not lose courage or give up; he says: "I saw the testimonial of Mr. John Coleman, 100 Gregory St., New Haven, Conn., and I wrote to him. In due time I received an answer, stating that the testimonial that he gave was genuine and not overdrawn in any particular. I took a good many bottles of Warner's Safe Cure; have not taken any for one year."

Gov. Hill is accounted a very successful man; he is cool and calculating and belongs to the class that do not lose their heads when emergencies arise.

RELIEVED OF KIDNEY TROUBLE.

S. J. Cronin, Rossini House, Toronto, Canada, writes:

"I have been troubled with a backache for some time past, and great difficulty in passing urine. Three weeks ago I applied an Allcock's Porous Plaster, and have done so every five days since. Almost immediately I had partial relief, and now I am entirely free from pain—water passing freely and perfectly clear, without burning. I owe my great relief to Allcock's Porous Plasters and heartily recommend them in any case of kidney trouble."

WHY!

WHEREFORE. The virtues or merits of a remedy for pain do not consist in its being as good for relief as other remedies, but in the fact that it is better, in being more prompt and sure, and therefore the best for the specific purpose. It is not an idle catchline that strikes the eye thus:

ST. JACOBS OIL

P. HINKLE'S PATENT CENTRIFUGAL ROLLER QUARTZ MILL

THIS cut shows the New Hinkle Centrifugal Quartz Mill, with plates and skimmer. This is the only mill made that needs no oil for the inside working parts, as it is thoroughly lubricated with water, supplied from a circular tank, which is connected to the roller spindles, slides and drips by rubber hose. By this means oil cannot interfere with perfect amalgamation. Other features of superiority are: Simplicity of construction; the free discharge of pulp; the wearing parts are easily replaced at a small cost. The small amount of power required to run the mill will recommend it to all practical mill men, as well as the small cost of erection and transportation of mill to the mine. A 5-foot mill weighs 9,000 lbs.; pulverizers 38 in. diam.; run, 80 to 90 revs. per minute, with a capacity of 20 tons per day. This size mill cost $1,500. With Silver Plates, Skimmer and Ore Feeder, $1,800.

P. HINKLE'S PATENT ORE FEEDER.

Positive Feed and Ready Adjustment.

IN this Improved Ore Feeder the falling tappet of the mill causes a backward movement of the feeding-tray. As the ore comes from the hopper on to the tray, a transverse bar prevents the ore moving backward, and a small portion of the ore is thus forced off the front edge of the feeding-tray into the battery. The amount of movement of the feeding tray may be regulated, thus regulating the feed of ore. This feeder can be arranged for roller mill or stamps. It is strong and durable, and feeds wet or dry ore in regular quantities.

History of Honiton Lace.

Honiton lace has a curiously checkered history, with many fluctuations. It is said to have been first introduced by the Flemings, who took refuge in England to escape the persecutions of the Duke of Alva. Many Flemish names are still to be found in the neighborhood of Honiton, namely, Stocker, Murch, Maynard, Trump, etc. In 1660 there was such a demand for it that France thought it necessary to issue a royal ordinance providing that a mark should be affixed to imported English thread lace. Two great fires at Honiton in 1756 and 1767 gave the first check to its production. Queen Adelaide tried to revive it after twenty years of severe depression by ordering a skirt made of sprigs, copies of natural flower, commencing with the initials of her name; for a very debased and hideous set of patterns had come in. This does not seem to have produced a great revival of the trade, and when our present queen required her wedding lace it was found difficult to provide the workers, but eventually a dress worth £1,000 was made at the small fishing village of Beer.

The English royal family has been most constant patrons of Honiton lace, and has done immense good in keeping the trade alive. We will end by quoting a few quaint words from "Fuller's Devonshire Worthies," which sum up the plea for the revival: "Hereby many children who otherwise would be burdensome to the parish prove beneficial to their parents. Yea, many lame in their limbs, and impotent in their arms, if able in their fingers, gain a livelihood thereby; not to say that it saveth many thousands of pounds yearly formerly sent over seas to fetch lace in Flanders."—Saturday Review.

A Somnambulist's Feat.

A young gentleman of my acquaintance is walking about just now with what at first sight looks like a very bad case of sore throat. He carries his head twisted over his port shoulder and moves it as cautiously as if he thought the hinges were insecure. He is one of a firm of lawyers on Court street, and his business throws him in contact with many people every day. They usually ask him what is the matter, but such a question extracts nothing further than a grunt and the volunteered information that if he were not very busy he would be at home. This is a hint not to bother him, and I didn't. I got the story from another source. He is newly married to a charming young lady, and this, and the fact that he is yet young in the legal profession, and still feels remorse, tends to disturb his mind so that his slumbers are not very sound.

The other evening the bride was awakened by hearing a noise. A light was dimly burning, and by means of it she could see a tall, white figure standing on the footboard of the bed. She was going to scream, when she recognized her husband. "Charley," she cried, "what are you going to do?" "I think I'll take a dive, my dear," said he. And he did. He made a beautiful dive from the footboard of the bed into a Persian rug a few feet away. It took a long time for his wife to make him believe this story. He puts in most of his spare time now reading a book entitled "How to Cure Somnambulism."—Brooklyn Eagle.

New Varieties of Lilies.

There is a pretty Chinese fancy connected with these flowers, to the effect that if they blossom before a certain day the owner of them will live throughout the year. I was curious to know how many different kinds of lilies they have in China, and, chatting with the chief clerk of the state department on the subject, he kindly sent me the next day a roll of no less than twenty-five different kinds of lilies, hand painted in their natural color upon fine rice paper. Many of these are quite unknown in this country, while others are familiar.

The Chinese name for lily is uri, and they have such quaint given names as hagako, a beautiful scarlet flower; uba, a small white blossom; tepo, which is like the Bermuda ascension lily; sirato, a golden tiger lily; acasima, a small red lily; yama, a large white lily, the petals spotted with brownish red; takagima, a double yellow lily; bene sugi, a large, highly decorated flower, the long white petals striped with magenta; koke, a purple lily; siro kanoko, a white tiger lily, and ya yeteuko, a tiger lily three times doubled! It will be seen from this that there are possibilities for florists in the direction of the development of new varieties of lilies which have not yet been seen in this country.—Fuller Walker in New York Graphic.

How Servants Are Spoiled.

It is a well known fact that no French or English servant can find a place with her own country people after she has lived in an American family. Good servants are rare in every country, and they are so rare here that a lady, when she gets one, generally turns to spoiling her as the only means of keeping her. The bad servant is spoiled in the hope of wheedling her into doing better. One mistress who pays the modest sum of $25 a month for her cook says that the morning after she has given a dinner party she presents this autocrat of the dinner table with $1.

Another consults the convenience of her cook always before inviting her guests. The demand to go out from one to three times a week is a claim never questioned by the most obdurate of mistresses, but the servant who asks this here would only have a holiday once a month In England and the privilege of going to church once every Sunday. In France the conditions are the same. In this country there must be trouble until some of the women who are obliged to earn a living are willing to become servants and submit to being called by their right name, and not consider that, if they are "helps," they have equal rights with their mistresses. Then, too, the mistresses must learn how to treat their servants with perfect kindness and still without the familiarity that breeds contempt.—New York Press.

Garnet Ledges in Alaska.

The extensive garnet ledges at Fort Wrangell are an inexhaustible source of beautiful and ornamental curiosities. The cropping of the ledge is about ten feet wide, standing perpendicularly and running northeast and southwest several miles in length; the depth of it no man has ever found out. The rock is of a mica slate formation, and contains from two to four dozen garnets to the cubic foot. The gems are regular polygons, beautiful in color, and when fresh from the mines have a dashing and brilliant luster; but when exposed for a time they become dull and opaque. The crystal varies in dimensions from the size of a pea to that of a hen's egg, and to the novice are quite fascinating and have the appearance of much value for ornamental and other purposes.

The lapidaries, however, have failed to utilize them for any purpose whatever, except as a curio and to demonstrate the certainty of the unerring law of nature which governs every phenomenon. Every plane of the polygon is of the same form; every angle of the same degree, and every gem is the equal and like of its fellow. The mining and shipment of this rock has become quite a business. It is worth $20 per ton on the wharf at Fort Wrangell, and is shipped to all parts of the country to fill the cabinets of the wealthy and the collections in public institutions.—Detroit Free Press.

Racial Elements of Russia's Army.

Probably the Russian army is the most heterogeneous in the world so far as its ethnology is concerned. From the information on the point just issued by the Russian statistical department we learn that of the 227,906 recruits levied in 1885, the racial composition was as follows: Russians, 169,052; Poles, 17,212; Bulgarians, 406; Tcheks, 12; Lithuanians, 5,800; Letts, 3,424; Greeks, 155; Moldavians, 2,350; French, 1; Germans, 3,572; Armenians, 142; Bohemians, 39; Georgians, 3; Jews, 10,011; Karehans, 309; Tchouds, 20; Esthonians, 2,604; Laps, 1; Moravians, 1,707; Cheremissians, 704; Votiaks, 841; Zyrians, 282; Permians, 68; Voguls, 5; Chuvachas, 1,529; Tartars, 4,508; Bashkirs, 3,017; and about 100 belong to three other races or tribes. In all, then, the Russian army comprises 32 different races, or at least tribal elements, among which it is noteworthy neither Ossetians nor Circassians are represented, so far at least as these recruits are concerned.—St. James' Ga

BROKER AND CHINAMAN.

They Regard Each Other With Suspicion.

ALL COINS CAREFULLY SCRUTENIZED.

Every Movement of the Celestial's Fingers Watched.

The Chinese have a well established reputation in California for shrewdness. To observe the Mongolian in the act of counting a goodly pile of American shekels after a hard driven bargain is to see the pig tailed stranger in his most inspired moments of commercial keenness. Any day on Montgomery street in brokers' offices, or where gold dust is bought, one can see the fine financial acuteness of the Asiatic colonist displayed to advantage. An agreement on the price of the gold dust or the rate of exchange is not easily reached. The Mongolian is cautious to a degree, and it is when he thinks that he has secured all that is coming to him that he closes negotiations. Then commences the important task of examining the lucre.

A white trader generally takes up his handfuls of twenty dollar pieces or silver dollars and carelessly tosses them into his pockets or a convenient sachel with the most cursory examination. Not so the suspicious colonist from Cathay. Every piece is closely scrutinized and passed from one hand to another. The edges are scanned and the color of the gold noted, until the whole pile has been observed closely. This is only the preliminary inspection. The gold is fair to the eye, but the doubts of a well conceived scheme to defraud him have not yet been quieted in the Asiatic trader's breast. His ear has to be satisfied, and he begins to jingle the pieces one after the other on the counter till every coin has announced its true character. The result in all probability is that some pieces have been found that shows signs of wear or fail to ring with the clear metallic sound so characteristic of the incomparable twenty dollar pieces fresh from the mint. A wrangle with the broker ensues, and the less perfect coins have to be exchanged for more faultless ones. These substitutes have also to be counted and jingled, and when the cautious Mongolian carries his shadow outside the threshold of the broker's shop he is morally certain that he has avoided deception by the exercise of what he regards as ordinary business sagacity.

The broker on his side, if in the habit of dealing much with Chinese, is unusually cautious and alert. If the money be passing from the Chinaman to him, the broker goes through the same formula. He takes no coins on trust as it were, but scores them all, for experience has shown him that the proverb of all being fair in love and war has been extended by the disciples of Confucius to money matters.

The scrutiny which the careful broker bestows on the coin is only excelled by the attention he gives his Mongolian customers, whose lightness of finger he has learned to regard with apprehension. Shoplifting is a fine art in Chinatown, and sleight of hand performers are abundant. Almost anything, from a diamond ring to an anchor, that they lay their hands on, disappears with magic promptitude. It is a fine study to watch a cautious Hebraic broker, who has been bitten a few times, as he doles out the shekels to a suspicious looking Mongolian financier. Every movement of the Celestial's long and deft fingers is watched, and a restraining hand put upon his claws every time they wander too close to his ample blouse with a load of half dollars. It is only when the final stage of the barter has been reached, and the "wherewith" has been shoved across the counter and all is safe, that the broker's countenance assumes its normal quietude.

It is considered so much the correct thing in China to overreach another in a monetary transaction that no sensible man will accept money by lamplight, and will only take his coin in the broad daylight after an exhaustive inspection by eye, ear and teeth. The best Chinese financiers rely on their teeth to determine the genuineness of a gold or silver piece of money. After banging a suspected coin on the counter or the sidewalk, if he be unable to decide whether it is good or bad, the Chinese financier places the metal between his teeth and leaves the verdict to molars and palate.

Brokers who do an extensive business with Chinese tell some curious stories of the cunning of their Asiatic customers. A down town broker exchanged some money for two Chinese one day not long since and in the transaction saw that he had lost two ten dollar pieces. The Mongolians protested violently that they had not taken the money, and when searched readily turned their pockets inside out. Their hats, shoes, and every corner of their several coats were examined, but the money could not be found and the broker finally let them go, though morally certain they had robbed him. During the afternoon he was pondering over the affair when an American friend who had had considerable experience with the Chinese in Shanghai dropped in. The broker described his loss and recounted how he had cunningly examined the shoes and hats of the suspected Mongolians. The friend from Shanghai laughed.

"The chances are," said he, "the money is stuck under your counter. That's an old trick in China."

On looking under the overhanging edge of the heavy counter the missing coins were found stuck to the wood with some strong Mongolian glue. One of the rascals had rubbed on the soft glue while parleying with the broker, and the other fellow, seizing a favorable opportunity, had stuck the money under the ledge, knowing that the instant it was missed they would be seized and searched.

The Shanghai man explained the trick.

"Those fellows have a confederate who has been here before," said he, "and will be around soon to hook those $10 pieces while he is giving you a fill about wanting to sell gold dust or something. You wait and see."

The money was left sticking to the counter, so that when the confederate came in he might be caught red handed and railroaded to the county jail.

Every one in the office, which is occupied by several persons besides the broker, set himself to catch the thief, and the unexpected result was that the money vanished without any arrest. When the broker returned after a hasty flight across the street for a cup of coffee, he found that the money was gone and no trace of the robber left. The well grounded belief of the detectives is that some one of the half dozen Chinese who dropped in during the afternoon was the confederate of the thieves and carried off the plunder unobserved.—San Francisco Chronicle.

Typhoid Mortality in Chicago.

M. Chamberland, chief of M. Pasteur's labortory, has been writing an important report demonstrating the unsatisfactory character of hygiene in France. He finds that the deaths from typhoid fever per 100,000 of population are 63 in Paris, 19 in Brussels, and 17 in Berlin and London. A critique on this report, published in a Lyons medical journal, points out that, in addition to faulty hygiene, antiquated methods of treatment usual in France may have something to answer for. Readers would be interested in an explanation of the cause of the typhoid mortality in Chicago. Even in such a phenomenally healthy year as 1885 there were reported 496 deaths from typhoid fever in this city. On the basis of 630,000 population—assumed by the health department—this gives a mortality of 78.7 per 100,000, or nearly one-fourth greater than the rate in Paris, and more than four times that of Berlin and London. Is this excessive mortality from a typical filth disease, due to the "unsatisfactory character of hygiene" in Chicago, to "antiquated methods of treatment," or to the inexcusable ignorance of physicians who report all their fatal cases of continued fever as "typhoid?"—Chicago News.

Story of "Puss in Boots."

Puss is a moral story in Russia, Sicily, among the Avars and at Zanzibar. In those countries the cat helps the man from a motive of gratitude. In France, Italy, India and elsewhere, "Puss in Boots" is an immortal story; the cat is a swindler, the Marquis de Carabas is his accomplice. Is the moral the primitive part and essence of the story, or is the moral a later idea tagged on? M. Gaston de Paris thinks the Zanzibar version is the original. There the man is ungrateful to the kind beast, and is punished by awaking to find his prosperity a dream. Mr. Traill thinks the story is the original thing and the moral an afterthought. Who is to decide?

It is odd, in any case, that when Cruikshank illustrated and rewrote "Puss in Boots" for a moral purpose he introduced the moral motive of gratitude in the cat. Now he probably invented this, for he was no folklorist, and his invention thus jumped with the tale as told by Avars and Swahilis. Human fancy has these narrow limits, which cause literary coincidences.—Andrew Lang in Longman's Magazine.

The Sultan and His Wives.

Doubtless tears, clamors, poutings work the same results in Constantinople that they do in Washington, and the luxurious harem may have some dull corner where the discarded favorite may weep, neglected, while her victorious rival sweeps by in triumph. The Turks are tender in the extreme to animals and children, and we must believe they are also gentle toward women. Sometimes the caprices of wives have been as costly as the sultan to the empire. Sultan Ibrahim allowed his to take what they pleased from shops and bazaars without payment. One houri complained; she did not like shopping by daylight, and at once the sovereign issued an order requiring merchants to keep their shops open all night and to have enough torches burning to exhibit goods to advantage. Another, whose name means Little Bit of Sugar, whispered to Ibrahim that she wanted to see him with his beard fringed with gems. The lord of lords was adorned accordingly, and made a spectacle of himself, thus tricked out.—Susan E. Wallace in New York Sun.

Story of the Fair Ginevra.

Married to Francesco degli Agolanti, the one of her two lovers who loved her least, Ginevra was buried alive during a trance or collapse which looked like death. Waking up to consciousness in the moonlight, she freed herself from her grave clothes and crawled to the house of her husband for shelter. He, sorrowful for her death as he was, refused to believe that this pale revenante, crying at his door, was his living wife, and superstitiously denied her admittance. So did her mother; so did her uncle. Then, nearly dying in good earnest, she betook her to the house of her other and truer lover, Antonio di Rondinelli, and sank fainting on the threshold, after she had cried for help. And Rondinelli, enlightened by love, recognized her voice, took her in, warmed, fed, comforted her, and eventually married her as by right. The bishop consented to the divorce as having been made by death, and to the remarriage as having been consecrated by love, and faith gained what fear had lost.—Fortnightly Review.

Working on Simple Diet.

A great number of Kashmiri cultivators occupy themselves in spring and autumn in taking goods from the plains to Kashmiri by contract, and on that bargain will exert themselves manfully.

I once arranged my loads for the ordinary coolies, but afterward met with some Kashmiris who were ready to take them by weight. They loaded themselves each with three of the loads that had been made up; one man carried four dozen of beer packed in cases; another load weighed 192 pounds, and I have a well authenticated case of a young man carrying 240 pounds. This was not for a short journey, but for more than 100 miles of uneven road, with many long rises and several passes, one of them over 9,000 feet. In doing such feats as this the Kashmiris take their own time; the ten days' march they spend eighteen or nineteen days upon; but they do it all on a diet of unleavened bread or of rice.—Traveler's Letter.

Novel Method of Feeding.

A prominent market gardener and milkman of South Hadley, Mass., feeds his peddling horses by clock power. The cracked corn and oats are put into a hopper over night, and the alarm clock is set for a morning feed. The contrivance works to a charm, the horses thrive by it, it saves labor in the busiest part of the day and the machine costs about $6.—Boston Budget.

NERVOUS ENERGY.

The Outcome of Civilization and Refinement.

PEOPLE PREDISPOSED TO INSANITY.

No Such Thing as the "Insane Temperament.

I doubt very much if there is any such thing as the "insane temperament." This is an organic constitution characterized by certain mental and physical qualities which is uniformly met with in those who are predisposed to insanity. At least no such temperament is recognized by physiologists or alienists of the present day. Systematic writers generally admit the existence of four distinct temperatures: the sanguine, the lymphatic or phlegmatic, the choleric or bilious, and the nervous. Every physician who has much to do with the treatment of insane persons has witnessed instances of mental derangement not only in individuals of each one of these temperaments, but in all their possible combinations. Indeed, it is rare to find a person in whom any one of the temperaments mentioned exists in its pure and simple form, those of mixed temperaments being greatly in the majority.

Perhaps the nervous temperament is the one which is the most frequently met with uncombined with any other temperament, or at least so greatly predominating as to obscure any other that may be present. This arises from the fact that it is the only temperament that can be acquired by mode of life. If there is any temperament which of itself predisposes to insanity it is the nervous. It may be well, therefore, to point out some of its chief characteristics.

The manifestations of nervous energy are markedly prominent, and give peculiar impress to the whole body and mind. The countenance is usually pale and the features thin and sharp; the pulse is quick, small and frequent, though not weak; the respiration active; the chest and muscular system are generally not largely developed; the skin is dry and rough and the digestive functions are performed irregularly. In consequence of the comparative weakness of the muscles, persons of this temperament easily become fatigued; though, owing to the activity of the nervous system, they quickly rally.

Prompt to form opinions and to arrive at conclusions, the subjects of the nervous temperament are not remarkable for stability of purpose. Their intellectual operations are rapid and brilliant, but at the same time not often persistent. Variety is constantly sought for, and the mental efforts, like the physical, are, as it were, spasmodic, full of energy while they last, but soon yielding to others.

Women were formerly much more frequently the subjects of this temperament than men, but owing to the constant effort to get rich manifested by the male sex in recent times, and the consequent extreme development of the emotional system and of certain faculties of the intellect, it is now far more common with men. Indeed, I am not sure but that in civilized communities, especially in the large cities of the United States, it has not become the predominating temperament. The man who day after day is kept upon a mental rack by that most harassing of all the emotions—anxiety—will inevitably undergo such psychical and bodily changes as will change him from any other original temperament to the one under notice. Of all the temperaments, it is particularly easy to be acquired. It is the outcome of civilization and refinement, and probably but for these agencies would never have arisen. Among barbarous nations it is almost unknown, and savages never exhibit it; but it is common enough in London, Paris and New York and in men who, if they had lived a hundred years ago, would have been as phlegmatic as the most typical Dutchman.

The diseases which are most apt to occur among individuals of the nervous temperament are those which concern the nervous system. Thus, we have the various forms of neuralgia, certain affections of the spinal cord, hysteria in all its protean varieties, St. Vitus' dance, catalepsy, ecstasy and insanity of all types. In fact, the nervous temperament itself is, if strongly developed, almost a pathological condition, the sensibility is so acute, the capability for receiving mental impressions so decided, and the system is so readily thrown into disorder from slight causes that the temperament in question may often be considered as the first manifestation of disease.

Persons of the nervous temperament are very subject to diseases which exist only in their imagination or which, being slight, are exaggerated by the constant habit of introspection in which they indulge. They are thus very frequently rendered seriously ill by the morbid attention they give to symptoms which are often by no means abnormal.

But although the existence of the nervous temperament in a person predisposes him or her more than does any other temperament to mental aberration, it is not to be supposed that it possesses this power to the exclusion of the other temperaments. The sanguine, the lymphatic and the choleric are by no means devoid of influence in this direction. Indeed, the latter is not far behind the nervous as a predominant temperament in insane persons.

There is, therefore, no temperament which can par excellence be regarded as the insane temperament. Persons of all temperamental types are liable to insanity. Individual peculiarity is a factor not to be disregarded. Some people would never become insane, no matter what misfortunes might visit them or what mental shocks they might suffer, while others might lose their minds upon the supervention of the slightest possible disturbing event. One man will suffer the loss of family and friends and money and his mind will retain all its clearness and vigor, while another will go into his barn and hang himself when he learns that butter has fallen two cents a pound.—Dr. William A. Hammond in New York Mail and Express.

Palates Made of Rubber.

"Here is something which might interest you," said the physician, handing the reporter a red flap of soft rubber spatulated at one end like a beaver's tail and bearing small rivets at the other.

"What's that?"

"That's an artificial soft palate. You know some people are so unfortunate as to be born with a cleft in the roof of the mouth, which interferes sadly with their speech. All sounds which depend upon the breath being excluded from the nose, like "n" and "m," they are unable to pronounce. These sounds are called nasal, because they go through the nose. Look in the glass with your mouth wide open and you will see a little tongue dangling away back at the roof of the mouth. This is the uvula, which is absent in the case of those who have cleft palates. It helps in swallowing as well as in speech. Now, this artificial uvula is not the natural shape, as you see, but is thinned out and spread out like a fan at one end. That is so that it may rest against the muscle which would naturally move the palate. The other end of the piece is riveted to a plate which is kept in the roof of the mouth, either by suction or by springs.

"A queer thing about these cases of cleft palates is that the perception of the proper sounds of letters dies out as the man grows older. A child in whose mouth an artificial palate is attached soon learns to talk as naturally as people whose palates are normal. But those who have passed middle life before they have one put in have, it is said, to learn a language like French, where the great prevalence of nasal sounds compels them to notice their importance. Only in that way do they learn to speak English properly."—Chicago Mail.

Sawdust Is a Costly Fuel.

Very few people have ever estimated the value of the fuel which feeds the sawmill furnaces in the form of sawdust, which moves directly from the saw to the fiery gulf into which it is dropped by the automatic sawdust feeders in the mills. Rating it at the price it would bring provided it could be saved in the form of inch lumber one would stand appalled at the figures.

For every million feet of lumber piled on the docks, coming from the circular saw, about 200,000 feet of the best portion of the timber passes into the "fiery furnace" as fuel, in the form of sawdust. Or, to make it more comprehensible, in the year 1882, the mills on the Saginaw river cut over 1,000,000,000 feet of white pine lumber, which was the turning point in the output.

During that year 200,000,000 feet of pine timber passed into the seething receptacles which produced steam, and was consumed for fuel. Suppose we estimate the cost, 200,000,000 feet at $14 per thousand "straight measure," and we have the enormous sum of $2,800,000! This looks like a pretty expensive fuel account for the mills on the Saginaw river, but that is what it would amount to in the form of lumber instead of sawdust.—Timberman.

Matching Two Humpbacks.

Another curious feature in Chinese life is reported in the native press. A difficulty having been found by a good looking humpbacked girl in procuring a husband, the go between discovered that an identical difficulty prevented a certain humpbacked young man from getting a wife. She accordingly arranged a match; but as each party was of very eligible quality in other respects, each of the respective parents insisted upon obtaining a surreptitious view of the amorous one on either side. The go between accordingly arranged that the girl should be interviewed as she sat at her spinning wheel with her hump deftly inserted in a hole in the mud wall, while the man was introduced as he was conducting home a water buffalo and leaning over its neck with his rain coat negligently thrown over his back. The marriage took place, and it then became too late for tergiversation, as it had been indorsed by law.—San Francisco Alta.

Statistics of English Pauperism.

The statement as to pauperism in England and Wales during the quarter ended Christmas last shows that the number of paupers gradually increased from 704,110 at the end of the first week of October to 758,146 at the end of the last week of December. The latter number represents a proportion of 26.8 paupers in every 1,000 of the estimated population. This proportion is by a small fraction less than that of the two preceding years, though the number itself is greater than in any year since 1877. In London during December the number increased from 102,559 at the end of the first to 104,097 at the end of the fourth week. This last number is greater than in any year since 1873, and the proportion, 24.7 in 1,000, is slightly greater than in any of the preceding four years, though in only eight of the preceding years was the proportion of pauperism to population smaller than in 1887.—London Times.

Royal Blood at a Discount.

The Courrier des Etats Unis publishes some interesting notes on the marriages of German and Austrian princes. Royal blood appears to have been for some time at a discount in the matrimonial market. A brother of the empress of Austria married a plain Miss Mendel. The Archduke Henry married a singer in the Gratz theatre, a Fraulein Leopoldine Hoffman. An uncle of the emperor of Austria fell in love with a postilion, who was the daughter of a postmaster. She was a great horsewoman, and, as there was no postilion for his highness at the Brandhofen station, where she lived, she volunteered her services, put on the leather breeches, cracked her whip, and started out on the road to fame and fortune.—New York Sun.

UNDER THE CANVAS.

Some Queer Questions Asked by Visitors.

ANIMALS CONTROLLED THROUGH FEAR.

A Circus Employe's Hard Lot.—Vicious Animals, Etc.

The variety of incident afforded by traveling with a circus and the nomadic sort of existence it grants appeals strongly to certain traits of human nature, and there are never wanting men to fill every sort of position in entertainments under canvas. With Barnum's show, for instance, a regiment of subordinates are employed, and every one is as carefully drilled for his work as a soldier is for his duties. But the glamour which invests the life of a circus employe will be found to disappear behind the scenes and many disadvantages to appear.

On the last night that Barnum was in Brooklyn recently, a Tribune reporter fell into conversation with the man in charge of the performing seals in their cage on wheels, before they appeared upon the stage and went through their tricks of thrumming the banjo and guitar. One of the uncouth animals was picking away at the bar of his cage with his flipper. "He thinks he has his banjo," remarked the man in charge, "and he will lie there by the hour and do that. We take the time to teach them tricks when we are spending the winter in Bridgeport. One has to know his animals to get along with them. I can do anything with these seals, but they would bite a stranger. See that scar (pointing to the back of one of his hands). Well, a strange seal was put in the cage a few days ago, and when I went to clean it out he bit me. You see, he didn't know me.

"Of course, the case of the lions and the tigers is the most dangerous. A man came near being killed in the lions' cage this morning. We all thought he was a 'goner.' Every man has two cages to care for, and we have to go in among all the animals. I have one of the lions' cages myself. We only control them by fear, our whips being of steel covered with rawhide. The men in charge of the elephants have their goads ready to stick into the animals whenever they are not chained. The man there (pointing to the next cage) has to sleep with the giraffe every night to see that it does not get sick. It is the tenderest animal we have and is the only giraffe in this country."

The reporter ventured to remark that if the giraffe's throat became sore it would be likely to prove a serious matter, as it was so long.

"Yes," said the keeper. "A man was here the other day who wished his throat was as long as the giraffe's whenever he drank whisky. But that was better than the questions some people ask. Why, some of them appear to know nothing at all when they get in the circus. They will ask if an animal eats or lies down to sleep. If a lion roars they ask what he does that for. One man wanted to know if the giraffe ever put its head down to sleep. The women seem to think that the wild animals must do everything different from what tame ones do. The majority of people don't know the simplest facts in natural history, one would think. If the animals could talk they would be able to tell many strange things said about them. I don't mean to say people can't read, but they will look at those words, 'performing seals,' on my wagon, and then ask me what the animals are. Then they want to know why we have water for them, and what they eat, when they see what we feed them. It is a pleasure to talk to any one who understands something about the animals. I don't think $40 a month and board pays for what we have to endure from the animals and people every day."—New York Tribune.

How to Inspire Confidence.

Henry Ward Beecher certainly owed a debt of gratitude to his teacher in mathematics, not only for the knowledge acquired through his tuition, but for lessons tending to strength of character. He tells this story to illustrate the teacher's method.

He was sent to the blackboard, and went, uncertain, soft, full of whimpering.

"That lesson must be learned," said the teacher, in a very quiet tone, but with a terrible intensity. All explanations and excuses he trod under foot with utter scornfulness. "I want that problem; I don't want any reasons why I don't get it," he would say.

"I did study it two hours."

"That's nothing to me; I want the lesson. You need not study it at all, or you may study it ten hours, just to suit yourself. I want the lesson."

"It was tough for a green boy," says Beecher, "but it seasoned him. In less than a month I had the most intense sense of intellectual independence, and courage to defend my recitations. His cold and calm voice would fall upon me in the midst of a demonstration, 'No!'

"I hesitated, and then went back to the beginning, and on reaching the same spot again, 'No!' uttered with the tone of conviction, barred my progress.

"'The next,' and I sat down in red confusion.

"He, too, was stopped with 'No!' but went right on, finished, and, as he sat down, was rewarded with 'Very well.'

"'Why!' whispered I, 'I recited it just as he did, and you said "No!"'

"'Why didn't you say "Yes!" and stick to it? It is not enough to know your lesson. You must know that you know it. You have learned nothing till you are sure. If all the world says "No!" your business is to say "Yes!" and prove it'"—Youth's Companion.

WHY ROSY LIPS WERE MADE.

As Beside, blushing, raised her head
The handsome fellow earnestly said,
Stroking his chin:
Pray tell why rosy lips were made,
Said she: They are the sweet blockade
Against young lovers who invade
The heart within.

If I the sweet blockade should rifle
Might I not hold the heart I'd won
By such adventure?
Not every one can take who tries!
But should you take me by surprise
And close the lips I'd fain have open
Would speak in—

(Gentle reader, these lines have been unlucky! Then close them up, for "Forgets-it-Mack" says, Gentle readers, sir!
Can I love the blind, I'll like as hope,
And shock the unerring arrow not
He soon morally come out, I know,
Than others do, sir.

And why do cheeks get rosy red?
I'll tell you why, sweet Beside said,
With some emotion.
There nature, with consummate art,
Paints every passion of the heart
That burning secret to impart—
A maid's devotion!

He stole one kiss! then two, three, four!
And gladly would have stolen more
Without repenting.
You've ta'en my heart; it must be true
These rosy lips were made for you!
You'd better take the residue
While I'm consenting.

MYSTERY OF A DREAM.

I am about to write the story of the one great mystery of my life. I have told the story to many people, but with one exception they have all looked very incredulous. Many shook their heads, and not a few acted as if they thought me a trifle demented. There is one, however, who is now sitting near the table at which I am writing that believes my story implicitly. Indeed Ediena, my darling wife, knows full well that the story which I am about to write is true.

I cannot tell when the knowledge that I loved Ediena Wyldmere was first revealed to me. We were children together, and as we grew older we seemed like brother and sister. Even then she was all the world to me, and how dear I was to her her own sweet lips have told me a hundred times. Our joys and sorrows were shared together. As happy, thoughtless children we romped and laughed, and many a time we mingled our tears in childish grief. As the years rolled away our affection for each other grew steadily stronger and deeper.

At 19 Ediena was as fair and pure as the most spotless thing under the sun. I almost worshiped her then, but I was still young and no thought of marriage entered my head. So beautiful a maiden could not long avoid attracting admiring suitors, and among those who flocked around her was one Cyril Staythorne, the tall, proud, aristocratic master of Staythorne hall, which had been left him at the death of his wealthy father.

I will not deny that I soon grew jealous of many of these fawning and flattering suitors, and of Cyril Staythorne in particular. Most beautiful young ladies are naturally a trifle inclined to be flirts, and Ediena Wyldmere was no exception. Not but that she loved me as truly and dearly as ever, but never had I made a serious declaration of my passion, and for a time she enjoyed the attention bestowed upon her by those who had been smitten by her rare charms of grace and sweetness.

I was poor, a carpenter's son, and this fact alone in the eyes of her parents disqualified me as a son-in-law. Our Saviour was a carpenter's son, but this fact has not caused the calling to be deemed more lofty than it was nineteen hundred years ago. Ediena's parents were on the outlook for a "good match" for their daughter and they looked with favor upon Cyril Staythorne. They were too wise to come out openly and request Ediena to have nothing further to do with the poor carpenter's son, but in divers ways they did everything they could to separate us and to install Staythorne in her favor.

I shall never forget the feeling of rage and despair that seized me as one day I saw Ediena seated in Cyril Staythorne's handsome carriage, with Staythorne himself by her side. I cannot describe our next meeting. How much I was to blame for what followed I now know, but I then thought I had just cause for what I did. Hot words were uttered, and for the first time we parted in anger.

The next day I left the quiet New England town where twenty-one years of my life had been spent. A passenger train bore me away out into the world. I was going anywhere that I might get away from the hateful spot that I had always known as home, where so many happy days had been spent with the one from whom I thought fate had separated me forever.

I sought and obtained employment in a great city, the crowded streets and hurrying rush of which seemed very strange and unnatural to me. I tried to forget my old home and Ediena, but I soon found it impossible to do so. Strive as I might to tear her image from my bosom her fair, sweet face was almost always before me. Sternly I fought against the power that seemed to be drawing me back to her. Many a night did I awaken and sit bolt upright in the darkness of my little room, with her plaintive cry sounding in my ears.

"Oh, Jasper, come back to me!"

It always seemed very real, but I reasoned myself into thinking that it was all imagination. I now know that many, many times she uttered that very cry.

One day an accident happened to me. I was passing along beneath the spot where repairs were being made on a building when a falling board struck me senseless. I was picked up and carried to a hospital, but when I recovered consciousness I did not know my own name. My mind did not seem deranged. I could remember events and people, but I could not recall the name of a single person whom I knew. They told me that I had been severely injured and that doubtless as I improved my memory would serve me better.

For several days I lay there, gradually growing better physically, but in no way improving mentally. Try as I might I could not recall names. I remembered my home, Ediena, Cyril Staythorne, everything; but I could not speak the name of a single place or person, although scores of times I seemed on the point of doing so.

Finally, I had so far recovered that I was informed that on the following day I was to be discharged from the hospital. The last night of my stay in the hospital arrived, and at a very early hour I sought my couch and was soon fast asleep.

I am not naturally a dreamer, but am a very sound sleeper. It did not seem that I dreamed that night, but suddenly I found myself in a familiar spot. It was night, and a thunderstorm was rapidly coming on. The black heavens were seamed with fire, and deep thunder roared like an enraged monster. I was standing on the old bridge which spanned a winding stream not far from my boyhood home. Suddenly a flash of lightning showed me Ediena hurrying along the bridge.

Startled and amazed that she should be there at such a time, I was about to make my presence known, when another flash showed a second person on the bridge. Plainly I saw his dark, mustached, evilly handsome face, and plainly I heard Ediena's cry of surprise and fear as he confronted her midway on the trestle. Then through the darkness floated his triumphant exclamation:

"Ah-ah! Ediena Wyldmere, I have you now! Twice I have asked you to be my wife, only to meet with refusal and scorn. To-night I swear you shall consent to marry me, or you meet your death in the waters of Crooked river!"

Then came another flash of light that showed my darling struggling in his vile clasp. To my ears came a cry that stirred every drop of blood in my veins:

In an instant I leaped forward and tore her from his arms; at the same time I dealt him a terrific blow that sent him reeling against the railing of the bridge. The rotten guard gave way, and flinging up his arms, with the look of unutterable horror on his face plainly revealed by the vivid glare, he uttered one wild cry and plunged downward into the dark water. Ediena uttered one joyful cry:

"Jasper! Jasper!"

Then she sank unconscious at my feet. From that moment I knew no more until I awoke in the morning to find myself in the hospital. And in the morning my memory was fully restored to its natural condition. I found that I knew my own name and the names of my friends. That day I left the hospital.

I remained in the city a week, and during the entire time my strange dream—if dream it was—worried me constantly. Was Ediena in trouble? Did she need my protection?

As a final result, one night I boarded a swift train, and in the morning I stood by my darling's bedside. She was just recovering from a brief but severe illness. As she clung to my hand and shed tears of joy she sobbed reproachfully:

"Oh, Jasper! Why did you leave me there on that bridge after rescuing me from Cyril Staythorne's hands?"

"What do you mean?" I hoarsely gasped, scarcely able to credit my ears.

Then she described a scene just as I had witnessed and taken part in my dream. She finally said:

"I was over to Mabel Gray's, where I intended to spend the night, when the thunder storm came up. I don't know why I did it, but I resolved to return home, and I started out despite the protests of both Mabel and her mother. I met Staythorne on the bridge. He seized me in his vile grasp, and I called for help. Then you came and snatched me from his hands, at the same time hurling him off the bridge. I caught one glimpse of your face as it was revealed by the lightning, and then I fainted. When I recovered consciousness it was raining and I was alone on the bridge."

"And Cyril Staythorne?" I asked.

"Was found the following day floating a corpse on Crooked river."

My story ends here. I have already told you that Ediena is my wife. I cannot explain the mystery of my dream. I can only write the question that I have asked myself a thousand times:

Was it a dream?—William T. Patten in Yankee Blade.

Origin of Long Measure.

Our measures of length originated in the dawn of civilization, and came to us through the Anglo-Saxons. The yard was originally the length of a king's arm; the foot, the length of his pedal extremities. The word inch is derived from the Latin uncia, a twelfth part, but why the foot was divided into twelfths, instead of tenths or elevenths, no one claims to be wise enough to tell. It has been suggested that probably the inch was originally the length of the second joint of the forefinger, and that twelve of these about equal the length of the forearm, which averages about one foot in length.

The inch used to be divided into three "barleycorns," which were simply the length of the grain or "corn" of the barley. The "mile" was reckoned at 1,000 paces, as its name shows, for it is derived from the first word of the Latin phrase mille passuum, "a thousand paces." The origin of the "rod" is doubtful.—St. Louis Republic.

A Tall Tree Story.

Fresno county, Cal., now comes to the front and claims ownership of the "largest large tree." A party of bear hunters, it is said, located it in the Sierras, in the most rugged portion of the mountains, two miles north of Kentucky Meadows. It was surrounded for a mile by almost impenetrable underbrush, so that the hunters were compelled to use both knife and ax to get to it. As three brown bears were captured near it no doubt the hunters crept forward with bated breath. What sort of "bait" may be inferred from their report that the tree was 129 feet in circumference four feet from the ground.—Philadelphia Ledger.

They Built a Fire on a Bombshell.

In the whole chapter of accidents there are not many more wonderful things than what is just reported from Tunis. A number of Sfax fishermen were sitting the other day round a fire which they had kindled on the shore, when suddenly there was a terrible explosion from the heart of the burning mass, one person being killed and several seriously wounded. It was subsequently found to be the explosion of a shell which had lain under the sand since the French bombardment in 1881.—London Tit-Bits.

Many of the witnesses called to Bakersfield on the Elliott trial drove to Mojave, left their teams and went by rail to Bakersfield.

The recent drop in the price of quicksilver has been of advantage to mill owners. The metal has declined from $56 to $32.50 per flask.

The year 1896 will be a leap year, after which there will not be another leap year until 1904. Skirmishing will be in order for the ladies in 1896.

Mr. Brooks, chief of the party who have made a survey for a big canal from Owens river to Salt Wells Valley, went to San Francisco last week. It is understood that it will not be anything near so difficult to make as was expected, and will not cost to exceed one-half of the first estimate.

General Miles received a telegram Dec. 8th, from Buffalo Gap, S. D., saying: "Ruachman and Indians have had a slight skirmish. The situation is more serious for the settlers are unarmed. Can you send fifty good rifles and ammunition so that the settlers can defend themselves?"

A large band of travelers recently passed through Owens Valley. They professed to be looking for a location to settle, but acted far more like gypsies or or other strolling vagabonds. At Indian Well, in Salt Well Valley, they tore down and burned the fence that had recently been placed about the well. Now cattle get into the spring and have tramped it into a useless mud hole. A tunnel has been driven to water in the hillside about fifty miles back of the old adobe building at Indian Well. The water is protected from cattle, and plenty can be got for passing teams.

A Petition.

To His Excellency, R. W. Waterman,
Governor of the State of California:—

We, the undersigned residents and tax payers of the County of Inyo, State of California, respectfully petition and represent:

That Emissaries from discontented bands of Indians have penetrated into our valley and are endeavoring to make hostile our otherwise peaceful Indians.

In Inyo County, should an uprising occur, they could call into the field nearly 1,000 Indian warriors.

There is not in the entire County to-day, in possession of the white population, arms or ammunition for 200 people.

Wherefore the undersigned pray that a sufficiency of arms and ammunition be furnished us to defend ourselves should an uprising of hostile Indians take place.

And your petitioners will ever pray.

The above petition has been sent circulated throughout the County and is being signed by all to whom it is presented.

SUPERVISORS' PROCEEDINGS.

WEDNESDAY, December 10th.

The Board of Supervisors of Inyo County, State of California, met in special session at 7 o'clock, p. m., pursuant to a call dated 1st Dec. 1890.

Present Supervisors Sneden, Harger and Stewart.

It was ordered by a unanimous vote of of the Board that Ordinance No. 21 be and is hereby repealed and another Ordinance No. 31 be enacted.

The following claims were allowed:

J. D. Harger	$20 10
S. G. Sneden	19 18

Tragedy Near Little Lake.

MOJAVE, Cal., Dec. 9, 1890.

MR. N. RHINE.—Yesterday (Monday) morning about 10 o'clock, and about six or eight miles below Little Lake, the four-horse team ran away and killed my wife and Johnny.

Mr. Given's man (Mr. Smith) unloaded the freight and brought the bodies here for inquest and burial.

We expect the Coroner here to-morrow morning. Yours respectfully,
J. W. SYMMES.

The above sad tidings were received here yesterday. Mr. and Mrs. Symmes and their three children were on their way to Los Angeles where they hoped the climate would benefit Mr. Symmes' health. It is with sincere sorrow that the many friends of Mrs. Symmes hear of the tragic death of herself and her son, and we join them in extending our heartfelt sympathy to the stricken family, for their great loss.

What California Lacks.

Eastern people who make their homes in California unite in saying that the greatest drawback to immigration to this state is the incredulity of the dwellers of the Atlantic states. Mantled with snow and chained with ice, they cannot believe that flowers bloom and vegetables grow in the open air on Christmas and New Year's day in the valleys of California. Yet a little reflection should convince them that such is the fact when they see carloads of California oranges rolling into the Eastern markets from the beginning of December to the end of April. A winter season mild enough to ripen the golden oranges is certainly mild enough for blooming flowers and lucious vegetables. "If I had the slightest idea that California possessed such a balmy, semi-tropic climate," said an immigrant to the writer a day or two ago, "and that her soil yielded such large returns with so little labor, I would have settled here ten years ago. Of course I heard a good deal, but I would not believe it, because some of my friends who had invested their all in the Los Angeles boom returned disgusted and told me that a poor man could not make a living in Los Angeles County; that it was a good place for rich people to spend the winter in—a much better place, so far as climate and health were concerned, than Florida—but that a man without capital to last him five or six years until his orange grove came into bearing would starve in the land of sagebrush and cactus. I believed this statement because my informant was an old friend and a man of veracity, and I do not think that he was far wrong; but there are counties north of Tehachapi, in the grand valleys of the Sacramento and San Joaquin, where a poor man can make a good living and after a few years can work himself into a position of independence. My visit here has convinced me that the half has not been told about California, and I propose to spend the remainder of my life here."

A simple and practical way of dispelling the ignorance that prevails regarding California has been suggested by William H Mills of the State Board of Trade. His suggestion is that people residing in California should write to their friends in the East and tell them the plain truth about this state. This would have more weight than thousands of pamphlets, for the word of the writer who is known to the recipient would be accepted without doubt and without question. No man having money enough to get away would live in a cave to avoid blizzards if he only knew one-half the truth about California. The thermal productive region of California is large enough to give plenty of elbow room to a population of ten million industrious people. All that this state needs is more population.—S. F. Post.

Pilgrims to Mecca in Ill Luck.

Cruel ill luck has befallen some of the Indian pilgrims to Mecca this year. The pilgrim steamer Deccan, which left Bombay for Jeddah on the 17th of June, had on board more than 1,200 of these pious Mohammedans, packed, it is said, as usual, "like herrings in a barrel." It is not surprising that during the voyage six cases of cholera occured. This led to the ship being detained in quarantine at the great Red sea port for ten days. When this period had elapsed another case was declared, which involved a second quarantine.

By this time the period of the sacred ceremony of walking round the kaabah or temple of the prophet and kissing the black stone said to have been given by an angel to Abraham was at an end, and the poor pilgrims having spent all they had upon this pious duty were compelled to return as they came. It is painfully significant that the Deccan brought back 122 persons less than she took out. A similar incident, it is said, has not occurred for more than half a century. It is regarded by the faithful as a visitation of divine displeasure.—London News.

On the Watch.

A man about 55 years old, accompanied by his son, a boy of 14, was waiting for a train in the Grand Central depot the other day, when a man on the same bench, who had been reading a paper, folded it up and asked:

"Has the McKinley bill affected your neighborhood any?"

"The what?"

"The McKinley bill. How does it strike you?"

The old man didn't know anything about the bill, and he was fishing around for a reply, when the boy called out:

"Father, you keep still! He wants you to say that it strikes you good or bad, and then he'll call you a liar and offer to fight the both of us!"—New York Sun.

Women and Astronomy.

A department has been recently opened at the Royal observatory, Greenwich, which is presided over entirely by women. Four ex-Newnham students, at the head of whom is Miss Clemens, a lady who was for some years resident in Manchester, are engaged in daily work at the observatory. Their employment includes exact measurement from photographs, as well as actual photography and night observations.—London Letter.

ORDINANCE No. 31.

THE BOARD OF SUPERVISORS OF THE County of Inyo, State of California, do ordain as follows:

SECTION 1. The regular meetings of the Board of Supervisors of Inyo County, State of California, must and shall be held at the Town of Independence, in the County and State aforesaid, being the County Seat of said Board on the first Monday of January, April, July and October of each year, and must continue from time to time until all the business before the said Board is disposed of. Such other meetings must be held as are otherwise provided by law.

SECTION 2. This ordinance shall take effect and be in force on and after fifteen (15) days from its passage, and Ordinances No. 2 and 21 of said Board of Supervisors together with all ordinances or parts of ordinances in conflict herewith, and each and all of them are hereby repealed.

SECTION 3. This ordinance shall be published in the INYO INDEPENDENT, a newspaper published in said Inyo County, at least two weeks, said publication to be made for said time and before the expiration of said fifteen days.

This ordinance was passed by the Board of Supervisors of said Inyo County, State aforesaid, at a Special Session of said Board, held on December 10th, 1890, by the following vote: AYES—J. D. Harger, J. J. Stewart and Seth G. Sneden.

SETH G. SNEDEN,
Chairman pro tem. of the Board of Supervisors of Inyo County, State of California.

{SEAL} Attest: P. H. MACK,
Clerk of said Board of Supervisors.

Proposals for Care of Indigent Sick of Inyo County.

Notice is hereby given that sealed proposals will be received by the Board of Supervisors of Inyo county, at the office of the County Clerk until 10 o'clock A.M. on Wednesday, Jan. 7, 1891, to contract for the care of said indigent sick for the term of one year from May 10th 1891 to May 10th, 1892, said bids to designate the amount for which parties contracting will care for said indigent sick on the basis of an average of four patients per day throughout the year, and to include all medicine, nursing, board, lodging and washing. Said bids to include the burial and funeral expenses of any indigent sick person or persons who may die while under such care.

Said contractor to care for all the indigent sick properly admitted to the contractor's care. And said bids to designate the price per head at which all excess of patients over the average of four each day throughout the year will be cared for, said excess to be paid for by extra allowance on presentation of bills duly sworn to, at the regular meeting of said Board immediately after said contract has expired. The average four per day to be paid for at the regular meetings of the Board on presentation of bills duly verified. All payments to be made by warrants drawn upon the Hospital Fund of said county.

The person or persons to whom said contract shall be awarded shall give a good and sufficient bond in double the sum of the contract price, for the faithful performance of said contract.

The care and management of said indigent sick by such contractor shall be at all times subject to the inspection of said Board of Supervisors, or any member thereof, or any person appointed by the Board for such purpose.

Said proposals must be endorsed, "Proposals for Care of Indigent Sick," and the same will be opened between the hours of ten o'clock and twelve o'clock A. M., on the 7th day of Jan. 1891, and the Board reserves the right to reject any and all bids.

Women are not slow to comprehend. They're quick. They're alive, and yet it was a man who discovered the one remedy for their peculiar ailments.

The man was Dr. Pierce.

The discovery was his "Favorite Prescription"—the boon to delicate women.

Why go round "with one foot in the grave," suffering in silence—misunderstood—when there's a remedy at hand that isn't an experiment, but which is sold under the guarantee that if you are disappointed in any way in it, you can get your money back by applying to its makers.

We can hardly imagine a woman's not trying it. Possibly it may be true of one or two—but we doubt it.

Women are ripe for it. They must have it. Think of a prescription and nine out of ten waiting for it. Carry the news to them!

The seat of sick headache is not in the brain. Regulate the stomach and you cure it. Dr. Pierce's Pellets are the Little Regulators.

Cheap local bitters, composed of fiery unrectified stimulants, with an infusion, or extract possibly, of some tonic bark, are still sometimes recommended as identical with, or similar to, or possessing virtues kindred to those of America's chosen family medicine. These perish speedily, while the great subduer and preventive of disease pursues its successful career, overcoming malaria, dyspepsia, nervousness, kidney troubles, constipation and rheumatic ailments, not only on this, but on many continents.

CRUELTY TO CHILDREN.

How "Baby Farmers" Conduct Their Business.

STARTLING AND INTERESTING FACTS.

Impossible for the Police Authorities to Prevent Abuses.

For some time the business of baby farming has been increasing in this city, until at the present moment it extends from the most squalid East Side localities to the magnificent and luxurious mansions on the ultra fashionable avenues. In this city every year an average of about 300 unfortunate infants are picked up in ash barrels, in hall ways, on the streets, and frequently in the river. These are nearly all the children of poor and indiscreet young women, who in an evil hour gave heed to the voice of the tempter.

Many of these children find their way into regular institutions which are incorporated for business of that description, such as the Foundling asylum, and a number of religious concerns where provision is made for the little waifs. But by far the great majority are "farmed out" to women who for a consideration care for the children or help to end their miserable lives, as the exigency of the case or the pecuniary interest involved may require.

The mother in most cases is drawn from the humbler walks in life and can afford to pay but a small sum for the maintenance of her child. She accordingly seeks out one of the baby farmers, who thrive in every part of the tenement districts of the city, and there arranges for the reception and care of her little one. A fixed sum per week is decided upon, ranging according to location from $1 to $5, and the transaction is concluded. Perhaps the unfortunate mother is sometimes lucky enough to have as partner in her guilt one who will pay the weekly stipend. He furnishes the money for three or five or ten weeks, but with each succeeding payment he grows tired of the job, and finally he drops off altogether.

The baby farmer gets impatient. She threatens the mother of the child and perhaps succeeds in having her make some personal sacrifice to help for its maintenance, but the struggle proves too much and the next chapter in the story is the announcement to the erring mother some day that the baby is dead. Of course, if the child has died while enduring some of the thousand ills that babyhood is heir to a permit for its burial is easily procurable, and that is the last of the drama. But in nearly all cases it is very hard for even a skilled physician to properly account for the little one's departure from this unfriendly world, and no more is heard of the case.

But there are other baby farms, many of them in the gilded neighborhood where Ward McAllister's "400" society ornaments flutter, and there the procedure, charges and arrangements differ, but in the long run the result is invariably the same. The prices charged for the reception of infants in some of these places run as high as $10 a week, but in the majority of cases the bargain is made by the payment of a lump sum which will cover the cost of keeping the baby until it is old enough to be received in an orphan asylum or disposed of in some other way. Generally the children of such people are offered for adoption and in this way nearly 40 per cent. of the baby farm children of the better class are disposed of, because the mothers do not wish to have them sent to asylums, where their "blue blood" may be tarnished by commingling with waifs of the common herd.

As the matter is at present conducted in this city all applications from persons "to keep and maintain infants" are turned over to the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children by the board of health. The society investigates the moral surroundings of the applicant, and the board of health looks after the sanitary arrangements. When everything is found all right a permit is issued. The establishment at that point is lost sight of, and the board of health or the Children's society may know no more about the place or the number of babies kept there or the way they are treated than the emperor of Morocco. Safety for the lives of these unfortunate waifs can only be relied upon in the regular institutions, where the utmost care that tender nurses, aided by the most approved scientific appliances, can give, is administered.

The utmost efforts of the police authorities or the Children's society to prevent abuses in the system thus far have failed because of the numerous obstacles thrown in the way of reform. The villainous women who, for a consideration, squeeze the young lives out of so many little waifs year by year, adopt many and clever ruses to escape detection in their foul work, and they generally succeed. These people give such an unenviable reputation to places constructed and run on a purely legitimate basis that the unfortunate mothers are more frequently tempted to throw their helpless offspring into the depths of the North or East rivers than consign them to a fate that is worse than death itself.—New York Journal.

Cooling Effect of Ice.

The cooling effect of ice is actually dependent upon its melting, as in this process the heat which causes it to melt is absorbed from the surrounding bodies. A pound of ice, in melting, will absorb sufficient heat to cool a pound of water from 174 degs. Fah. to the freezing point, or to cool 142 pounds of water one degree. The heating power of steam is due to the converse of this principle. A pound of water converted into steam and passed into a radiator will, upon condensing, give out enough heat to raise one pound of water, or about 4.2 pounds of air, from 32 degs. to 1,004 degs.—Public Opinion.

Delicacies for the Sick.

The customs division of the United States treasury have compiled a list of Chinese medicines that have recently been imported to this country. The list embraces such simple remedies as tigers' bones, ground blood, bears' gall, asses' glue, tree bugs, elephants' gall, fossil crabs, fossil teeth, fowls' gizzards, "insects of nine smells," Job's tears, cow hair, glass, rhinoceros' horns, cows' knee, puff balls, dragons' teeth, straw, hedge hog skins, dried silk worms, snake skins, crabs' eyes, horse tails and centipedes.—Philadelphia Times.

Public parks are recommended as a preventive of anarchy. A speaker in Philadelphia traced the connection between a certain class of virtues and open spaces. Riotous uprisings never find their source in that part of the population dwelling in the vicinity of the parks, since Anarchists frequent thickly crowded quarters, the alleys and densely populated courts.—Chicago Herald.

Ninety-nine Years for Nothing.

The famous case of Dell P. Wild, who was sent to prison for a year for refusing to do menial duty for Lieut. Steele and was summarily released by order of President Harrison, is eclipsed by the case of Lewis Carter, a private in the Twenty-fifth infantry, who has already served nearly five years of a ninety-nine year sentence in the Minnesota state prison. The case is probably without a parallel in either civil or military history, and is outlined as follows:

On the 24th of November, 1884, Carter, who, by the way, is a colored man, was stationed with his regiment at Fort Snelling, Minn. Two or three days afterward Carter was in St. Paul, and ran things with a high hand. His actions, however, were not called to the attention of the city police, and he went back to Fort Snelling unmolested. Arriving there he was arrested on the charge of assault, robbery and desertion. Brig. Gen. Terry, then in charge of the department of Dakota, summoned a court martial, to assemble at Fort Snelling, Jan. 27, 1885. This court was composed of Capts. Benzonio, Lawson, Roche and Stivers, First Lieuts. Tully and Glenn, and Second Lieuts. Phillips, Ahern and Tear, all of the Twenty-fifth infantry, while First Lieut. Luden, of the Fourth artillery, acted as judge advocate. The court, after a very brief session and apparently without attempting to probe the truth of the charges, found Carter guilty of all the four offenses and, with the usual army severity of punishing criminals, sentenced him to Stillwater prison for ninety-nine years.

Attorney Fred L. McGhee, of St. Paul, has been giving this case searching attention since Wild's release, and what he has found out is astonishing. He discovered in West St. Paul the person on whom the assault was alleged to have been made, and obtained an affidavit that Carter had not assaulted her. Then McGhee secured evidence that no robbery had been committed, and sent the two affidavits to Washington.

The action of the president was prompt and decisive. He found that Carter was guilty only of desertion, and has issued a full and free pardon, which is to go into effect May 25, just five years from the date of imprisonment. The president also reprimanded the court martial.—Washington Star.

Freaks of the Tornado.

Hundreds of interesting incidents are related of the freaks of the storm. A block of iron casting, weighing over one hundred and fifty pounds, was blown into the second story of the Chesapeake, Ohio and Southwestern Railway building, near Union depot. Nobody knows where it came from, and the nearest building from which it could have come is nearly one hundred yards away. Great sheets of tin roofing were dropped upon Dr. Barry's farm, near Turner's station, forty miles from the city, on the Short line. In the ruins of a house on West Main street a large office clock was found clinging to the wall, but no one knows where it came from. It was badly broken, but the hands still pointed to 8:20 p. m.

A large slab of marble found in a residence on West Madison street was never there before. It will weigh over 100 pounds. At Baint's drug store, on Market above Ninth street, two bird cages with the birds were blown in through the skylight. The cages were not injured, and the birds are as full of song as ever.

When the building occupied by Brand & Bethel, the tobacco men, on Green street, went to pieces, a portion of the framework dropped through the roof of a little cottage just east of the factory. It consisted of a heavy timber, to which were mortised four upright pieces of timber. When this came through the cottage the family were sitting around the table in the dining room, and the four uprights simply penned them in, but did not hurt them in the least.—Louisville Dispatch.

A Clever Diamond Robbery.

The death of the famous thief, Walter Stewart, alias Sheriden, in a Montreal prison recalls a bold robbery committed in a diamond merchant's store by him and a pal, ten years ago, which for skill and success has never been equaled in Philadelphia. Then Sheriden was the most expert diamond thief in America, and a decoy jewel box in the possession of Joseph K. Davidson, of No. 718 Sansom street, is the only relic of the daring theft and the mute reminder of the skill of the master thief.

Though Sheriden and his pal were arrested for the crime some time later not a shadow of the jewels were ever seen by the victim or the detectives. The box is a tin one about eight inches long, four inches wide and one inch deep. It contains white and blue papers, usually inclosing loose stones, but salt is the substance in them. Toward the end of March, 1880, Sheriden, in company with Dave Cummings, another noted crook, visited Davidson's place and purchased for $80 a diamond ring. They carefully noted the exact shape, size and appearance of the diamond box while selecting the stone from the collection.

Two days later they came back, looked at the box again and departed without purchasing. When Davidson examined his trusty box he found its counterpart in its place filled with the saltpaper. While the salesman was busy they cleverly substituted the false box and were perfectly successful in playing their trick.—Jeweler's Review.

Diamonds from the Sky.

Meteoric stones that sometimes fall to the earth are the objects of special study and thorough examination by scientific men. They are all similar in their combination of material or substance. But occasionally new facts are developed. In one stone were found organic remains showing the former existence of animal life. In another that fell in Siberia Sept. 4, 1886, weighing about four pounds, were found small diamonds. A small fragment of the stone was sent to Mr. George F. Kunz, who is with Tiffany & Co., New York. He found minute diamonds that were real stones, because they would scratch sapphires, diamonds being the only substance that can produce a scratch on the polished surface of a sapphire.—New York Star.

Novel Method of Communication.

It is related that Histaeus, anxious to order Aristagoras to revolt, as the only safe way took the truest of his slaves, shaved his head, and, pricking the message upon his scalp, waited until the hair grew again, when he despatched him to Miletus, telling him to tell Aristagoras "to shave his head and look thereon." This was one way to communicate an important message.—New York Commercial Anvertiser.

ALASKAN HUNTERS.

The Ceremonies Attending the Killing of a Bear.

THE SAGACITY AND ENDURANCE OF DOGS.

Superstitious Practices of Natives of Northern Alaska.

After tracking two days my companion and myself secured two natives as guides, and, leaving the river, set off for the mountains. At the end of the first day's tramp we sighted a black bear feeding upon berries about a mile distant. We were both so exhausted from our tiresome walk across the tundra that we concluded to send one of the guides after the bear. The Indian first seated himself and examined his rifle, selecting three cartridges and placing them in the gun. He then pulled a few hairs from his clothing, which he threw in the air to ascertain the direction of the wind, and then started so as to come up to leeward of the bear. We kept careful watch through a glass, and saw him on hands and knees work slowly toward the animal. When within 150 yards he fired two shots. The bear jumped and fell almost in his tracks.

There are probably no more superstitious people in the world than the northern Alaska Indians. Every action of their daily life is governed by some belief handed down from father to son, or originated by the shaman, the Indian doctor, who holds great sway over them. The ceremonies attending the killing of the bear will illustrate. Bruin was first placed upon his back with the head toward the mountains. The head was then skinned, severed from the body and taken by one of the natives, who, placing himself astride of the dead animal, raised and lowered the head three times, touching the bear just over the heart each time and muttering some incantation. The third time he threw it from him, uttering a loud shout in which the other natives joined. This was done to drive the bear's spirit to the mountains so that it would cause them no future trouble. A part of the dead animal had to be left on the spot where he was killed, or the hunters would get no deer that season. A camp was made at the place, and after the head had been roasted and picked clean it was placed in the top of a high tree, but for what purpose they would not tell. The skin was stretched flat upon the tundra—fur side down. The portion of the bear not consumed was placed in a tree and a rude scarecrow made to keep away birds. The following winter the skin and meat were sledged for and found in good condition.

A deer hunt which we witnessed was so different from our previous conceptions that I think it worthy a description. Upon this occasion, while sleighing with a party of Indians, a herd of deer was sighted. The natives took their rifles and started, some going in one direction and some in another, but all keeping to leeward of the deer. Those who went directly toward the herd waited until the others had got partly around before starting. The first shot was the signal, whereupon all hands rushed toward the frightened animals, who separated and plunged blindly in every direction. The Indians shouted, making all the noise possible, the fleeing animals in their fear mistaking Indians for deer and rushing on until a shot showed them their error, when they would turn and flee as blindly as before. Even after the first fright they circled around the danger, trying to get together, and in this way many more were killed. As much meat as could be carried was loaded upon the sled, while the remainder was cached in the snow, be sledged for at some future time.

After a hard day's march, a camp was established, it being then too dark to travel. The dogs are first unharnessed, and chained separately to bushes to prevent fighting. After an hour's rest they are fed upon dried fish, this being the only meal they receive in twenty-four hours. They are given all they can eat, unless the supply is short, and in such cases their endurance is wonderful, a small piece of fish once a day sufficing a dog and enabling him to work for a couple of weeks. A great many interesting facts could be given illustrating the sagacity and endurance of these animals. As a rule they have no affection. They recognize the person who feeds them as their master, but they obey only through fear. They are more than half wolf, as all young wolves caught are raised and used as dogs. In every team there is generally one dog who constitutes himself master. He is naturally one of the most powerful of the number, and the others seem to recognize his supremacy. This dog, upon seeing any one of the others habitually shirking while the rest are pulling, will attempt to reach and punish him, and if it is impossible to do so while in harness, will deliberately go to him when the day's sledging is finished and administer the deserved chastisement.

In establishing a night camp when in a wooded country, the most sheltered spot is selected and a pit is dug in the snow about fifteen feet in diameter and a foot deep. The bottom is then stamped down to make a hard floor. Around this pit is built a wall about four feet high, by laying young spruce trees on top of one another and cutting off their inside branches. This wall has two openings or breaks diametrically opposed, dividing the pits into halves with a through passageway separating them. Along this way, which must always face the wind, dried wood is piled and fired. On either side pine boughs are laid on the snow, and on top of them the sleeping bags. Such night camps are easily made, and the coldest nights can be comfortably passed in them. The only drawback is the difficulty in getting the wood.

In conclusion, the Indians of Alaska have been reported as savage and treacherous. In my experience I found the natives of interior northern Alaska the most kind and hospitable people in the world.—W. L. Howard in Popular Science Monthly.

PECULIAR INFATUATION.

Different Methods of Following the Injunction "Love One Another."

Do men ever fall in love with each other?

Women do. Not long ago a young woman in New Jersey was married to a youthful laborer on her father's farm. Some time afterward it was discovered that the husband was a female; the young wife refused, however, though earnestly entreated by her friends, to give up her chosen consort. The strangest part of the discovery was the fact that the bride knew her husband was a woman before she was led to the altar.

If men do not exhibit this strange infatuation for one of their own sex, they, at least, oftentimes, give evidence of the fact that they love one another. There are many instances on record where one man has given his life for another. There are many more instances where men have given life to another.

It is a proud possession—the knowledge that one has saved a precious human life. Meriden, Conn., is the home of such a happy man. John H. Preston, of that city, July 11, 1890, writes: "Five years ago I was taken very sick, I had several of the best doctors, and one and all called it a complication of diseases. I was sick four years, taking prescriptions prescribed by these same doctors, and I truthfully state I never expected to get any better. At this time, I commenced to have the most terrible pains in my back. One day an old friend of mine, Mr. R. T. Cook of the firm of Curtis & Cook, advised me to try Warner's Safe Cure, as he had been troubled the same way and it had effected a cure for him. I bought six bottles, took the medicine as directed and am to-day a well man. I am sure no one ever had a worse case of kidney and liver trouble than I had. Before this I was always against proprietary medicines but not now, oh, no."

Friendship expresses itself in very peculiar ways sometimes; but the true friend is the friend in need.

After a man has made a certain amount of money his neighbors begin to hear he had ancestors.

P. HINKLE'S PATENT CENTRIFUGAL ROLLER QUARTZ MILL

THIS cut shows the New Hinkle Centrifugal Quartz Mill, with plates as summer. This is the only mill made that needs no oil for the inside working parts, as it is thoroughly lubricated with water, supplied from a circular tank, which is connected to the mill spindles, slides and drips by rubber hose. By this means oil cannot interfere with perfect amalgamation. Other features of superiority are: Simplicity of construction; the free discharge of pulp; the wearing parts are easily replaced at a small cost. The small amount of power required to run the mill will recommend it to all practical mill men, as well as the small cost of erection and transportation of mill to the mine. 5-foot mill weighs 9,000 lbs.; pulverizers 38 in diam.; run, 80 to 90 revs per minute, with a capacity of 20 tons per day. This size mill complete $1,500. With Silver Plates, Stamper and Ore Feeder, $1,800.

P. HINKLE'S PATENT ORE FEEDER.

Positive Feed and Ready Adjustment.

IN this Improved Ore Feeder the falling tappet of the mill causes a backward movement of the feeding-tray. As the ore comes from the hopper on to the tray, a transverse bar prevents the ore moving backward, and a small portion of the ore is thus forced off the front edge of the feeding-tray into the battery. The amount of movement of the feeding tray may be regulated, thus regulating the feed of ore. This feeder can be arranged for roller mill or stamps. It is strong and durable, and feeds wet or dry ore in regular quantities.

Value of the Eucalyptus Tree.

The eucalyptus belongs to the myrtle tribe. It is said that there are as many as 150 varieties of the tree. They are native to Australia, but have already been introduced into most of the tropical and temperate countries of the world. Two kinds have been chiefly cultivated, the red gum (resinifera), and the blue gum (globulus), which is the better known. It is famous for its rapid growth, as it often makes an increase in height of from six to nine feet a year. The tree continues growing at this rate until it has reached an enormous size.

The products of this tree are numerous and varied. The wood is said to be valuable for the carpenter's and builder's uses. The gum, or rosin, is employed in the manufacture of "soaps, perfumes, lozenges, court plaster, liniments, syrups, pomades, toilet vinegars, as well as many preparations used for artistic purposes, such as varnishing oils, veneer and tracing paper." There has been for some years established in Paris a store for the sale of eucalyptus perfumery.

But by far the most valuable and important property of this tree is its power of correcting malaria. This quality is, perhaps, due to the aromatic oil which the tree contains, or more probably to the drainage effected by its roots. It has been proved in many countries in which the tree has been planted. In Algeria the cultivation of the tree has rendered many low lying or marshy districts inhabitable, where, in the early years of French occupation, foreigners could not live on account of deadly fevers.—Youth's Companion.

The World's Highest Mountains.

Every once in a while we discover that some mountain peak must give up the undeserved distinction conferred upon it of holding its head higher than all other summits. For a long time Mount Chimborazo was supposed to be the highest mountain in the world until in the progress of the Himalayan surveys Mount Everest was found to overtop it. Four years ago W. W. Graham, who has been higher above the sea than any other mountain climber, asserted that Everest must yield the palm of supremacy to an unnamed peak about seventy miles from it. We long supposed that Mount St. Elias was the loftiest mountain of North America, but we now know that that honor belongs to Mount Wrangel, which is about 500 feet higher than St. Elias. It was also supposed that Mount Kilima-Njaro, 18,700 feet high, was the greatest elevation in Africa, but now comes Count Teleki, the Hungarian traveler, with the assertion that this mountain must play second fiddle to Mount Kenia, about 200 miles north. He is the only man who has yet ascended Kenia.—New York Sun.

The Poison of Tobacco.

It is very unusual to find in a great smoker a healthy appetite for plain food, and medical opinions may be had in any number as to dyspepsia caused by smoking. To whatever degree the habit affects the nervous organization, it appears to be certain that the process which is regarded as soothing is really destructive. Sir Benjamin Brodie must have known what he was writing about when he declared that "the poison of tobacco acts by destroying the function of the brain." In a Russian hospital in 1866 a Dr. Chadnowski took the liberty of examining by means of a pump the digestive powers of six smoking and as many non-smoking soldiers, and he recorded that "in the former the time required for digestion averaged seven hours, while in the case of the non-smokers the mean period of digestion was only six hours." With the present enormous consumption of tobacco the social consequences, apart from those concerning the bodily and mental powers of the consumers, are important.—Pall Mall Gazette.

A Popular Delusion.

The idea that the body "changes" every seven years, or at any other period, is a popular delusion. Read any text book of physiology and you will find that life is really a constant series of changes, which proceed every minute you live. Changes of chemical and physical kind are always going on within the body, and the very fact that you require food daily is a proof of this.—Herald of Health.

Philanthropist—Poor man, are they all dead?

A Great Day.

The Burlington Free Press says it is a great day for garden beds when the rain comes down in sheets. Yes, and it is a great day for hay harvesters when the rain comes down in pitchforks.

Bismarck as a Swordsman.

The chancellor, while a student at Goettingin, by his skill and strength gained the reputation of being a crack swordsman. It is said that he challenged two students the very first day he came to Goettingen, and afterward defeated both, although they had had much experience. A very cunning trick, in escaping an attempt made by a "pedell," a university officer, to break up a fight, is credited to Bismarck. When he was at Jena on a visit, arrangements were made for him to fight a duel at Woellnitz, a small village. The "pedell"—Kahle by name—was very much disliked by the students, as he had often interrupted their fights. He had gotten knowledge thereof, and on the morning fixed for the fight had gone to Woellnitz and hid himself under a large barrel used in a brewery. He had placed the barrel in such a position that he could overlook the dueling place through the bunghole, intending to see all the fight and get the names of all principals.

Kahle's presence was noticed, however, by some peasants, and by Bismarck's suggestion the barrel was suddenly turned around so that the hole stood against the wall. Several students then seated themselves upon the barrel and remained there until all the fights had been finished, when the unlucky "pedell" was released from his prison and was heartily laughed at. It is a fact that Bismarck shortly afterward was ordered to leave the city by the university authorities.—Baltimore Sun.

How Big Bells Are Rung.

The twelve bells of St. Paul's cathedral in London are said to be the grandest ringing peal in the world. It is a matter of pride with the English that they always swing their bells instead of merely swinging the clappers after the fashion prevailing in Russia and other parts of continental Europe. The Briton swings even his largest bells in the good, old fashioned way, and it is quite an undertaking to swing the sixteen ton "Great Paul," which, with its five-ton brother, supplements the noble peal on the grandest Protestant cathedral in the world. On the day Gen. Garfield's body was carried to the grave, the writer stood in the square in front of St. Paul's, and heard these chimes peal in honor of the dead president. Dense crowds filled the neighboring streets, and the adjacent windows and housetops were black with humanity. All London was there to listen to the mournful requiem of the bells. It was a solemn spectacle when, as a stranger in a strange land, one saw those tens of thousands of Englishmen thus doing honor to the noble dead. It was an evidence of international sympathy, affection and brotherhood which one who saw it can never forget.—Boston Herald.

Winning at the Lottery.

Travelers who have found it hard to win at trente-et-quarante will probably try to recoup themselves by backing their fancy in the Italian lottery. An infallible plan for winning has been communicated to me by a learned Florentine, but I forget some of the details. After incantations, which you can get up for yourself in Petrus de Abano, you have a little dinner for two laid on Christmas eve or the eve of St. John. One of the plates must be blackened with smoke on the bottom. You sit down and utter Aves and Pater Nosters till the door flies open and in rushes Saint Pasquale somebody (I forget his highly respectable family name). He is dressed all in red and fetches you two swinging boxes on the ear, for he is angry at being summoned from paradise. As he is doing this you hand him the plate with the smoked bottom, on which he writes a terno of figures with his finger. You plank your bottom dollar on the terno and (if the government pays up) you are a made man. This is only a rough sketch of how to win. I have discovered no other way.—English Monthly.

Taking Up the Thread Again.

There had been a runaway. A pair of horses were down, a carriage smashed to pieces, and the driver and a lady lay groaning on the grass with their hurts. The street car stopped and many got off to render aid. Among those who stood on the rear platform were two ladies, one of whom held up her hands in horror and exclaimed:

"Mercy on me! but what an awful, awful affair! How long did you say you boiled your grape jelly, Mrs. Smith?"—Detroit Free Press.

A Wearing Responsibility.

Bishop (to Pat, returning from work)—You look tired, Pat.

Pat—Oi am, sorr. It's a harrud day I've had, sorr, as foreman o' the gang—tin straight hours.

Bishop—Ah, Pat, we all have to work hard in this world. I often put in eighteen hours a day.

Pat—Yis, your rivirence, but your wurruck is aisy loike, and clane, and ye's hasent any responsibility.—New York Sun.

SELF-CONFIDENCE.

Persistence, the Key to Ultimate Success.

DEADWEIGHTS DO NOT LIKE CHANGES.

Two-Thirds of the People Nothing But Immitators.

If your faith in your power, your confidence in yourself, or your idea or plan are destroyed or weakened by the first sneer or voice of opposition it meets, you are hiding yourself and your light under the bushel. You will remember that a large proportion of the world are mere copyists. They do only what others have done before them and only what they have learned from others. They oppose and sneer at every new idea, and afterward applaud it and use it, when the man or woman who will not allow their light to be hid under the bushel force it into notice and success. In days past the great herd of copyists sneered and ridiculed the idea of steam as motive power on land and sea. So they did with the electric telegraph and the telephone. So it will be with hundreds of new ideas, new inventions and new powers to be developed in the near future.

These ultra conservative deadweights in every business, art or profession, do not like changes. They are wedded to their rut. They don't want to get out of it. To do so makes them homesick. Besides, it hurts their business. They want to jog on in the "good old way"—in the stage coach instead of the railroad, in the "sailing packet" instead of the steamer. They oppose the new as naturally as rats and earwigs oppose the entrance of light to their underground habitations, and for a similar reason. The light annoys them. It drives them off. It ruins their business. They "love darkness better than light." Hence, they want your light "under a bushel."

If you allow them to keep your light under that bushel they will keep you under it also. They will keep you always in the background. If the first Napoleon had not by force of will ridden over the objections of the veteran martinets who opposed his new methods of warfare, he would never have triumphed at Marengo and Austerlitz. If Cyrus W. Field had not persistently kept his mind centered on the project of the ocean cable despite sneer, obstruction and failure after failure, it might not have been laid today. The glow of every new light upon ths world is always the work of one man or a very few men against the many. Three or four men in California, years ago, built the Pacific railroad. They first kindled their light in a dingy Sacramento grocery. They kept it lighted and also kept pushing it to the front, while others were indifferent, or dared not take hold of such an undertaking.

You had no need to bluster or bully your light to the front. It is not the force of physical effort or speech that will carry it there and keep it there. It is the silent force of a persistent determination, bent on one single aim. When you are temporarily overcome and tired out through the opposition of the deadweights and earwigs who love darkness, fall back on yourself and the power behind you. Leave the crowd, leave all not in sympathy with you. Go to your room, seclude yourself. Sleep, and before you sleep, demand, pray, desire more power to cope with opposition. It will surely be given to you. How, we know not, but you will enter on the contest tomorrow with renewed strength, and the silent power you gain in this way will, of itself, work results for you.

In the past thousands of "lights" have, by this dead weight, run in a rut, live in a rut and die in a rut sentiment and crushing out force, been hidden under bushels and died out under bushels. Actors of genuine humor and talent are today playing in third rate theatres or accepting inferior parts in first class ones because they have allowed sneer or opposition or a more or less failure to drag their minds into that permanent discouraged, disheartened attitude which is always saying: "What's the use of trying? Luck's against me—I'm bound to fail, anyway!" On the heels of this comes drink, to "drown care."

So it is with thousands of other actors in all the parts of life. Their own permanent state of mind is the real and only force which keeps their "light under the bushel." They use their own force against themselves. They expend it in talking and complaining to others. They have no knowledge or faith in the fact that a mind decided and determined on a purpose at all times and in all places—a mind that fights off the mood of despondency and discouragement as it would fight off a mad dog—carries and uses the greatest of all powers to keep its light shining and keep it ever in the front.—Prentice Mulford in New York Star

Exclusiveness of "Society."

The number of people who have real merit and talent for society, who are kept out by the exclusiveness of self constituted tyrants of society, must be very large; but if they have tact and learn to wait, they will find their way. The most certain way to please is to show a modest indifference to the smiles of the great. (They call it patronage in England. We have no such ugly word here, nor have be any really "great people" socially.) They should not "push." There is, however, always an ideal exclusiveness, a society which should only admit the cultivated, the wise, and the good. Every hostess should inquire into the general characteristics of her guests, their moral, social and political standing. We use the word political in its largest sense. In spite of all we can do, objectionable men and women do get into the most carefully guarded society; and we have as yet no such inviolable insight that we can rates Dives and Lazarus before their death as they are said to be rated afterward.—Mrs. M. E. W. Sherwood.

Tea and Coffee.

Tea and coffee are not foods. If this pair of moderate stimulants were lost from off the face of the earth today and forever they would not take away an ounce of physical prosperity. They do no good—are simply cumberers of the table that add to nothing save expense.—Iowa Democrat.

Summer Literary Poison.

Almost every one starting off for the summer takes some reading matter. It is a book out of the library, or off the bookstand, or bought of the boy hawking books through the cars. I really believe there is more trash read among the inteligent classes in July and August than in all the other ten months of the year. Men and women who at home would not be satisfied with a book that was not really sensible, I find sitting on hotel piazzas or under the trees reading books the index of which would make them blush if they knew that you knew what the book was. "Oh," they say, "you must have intellectual recreation." Yes, there is no need that you take along into a watering place "Hamilton's Metaphysics," or some ponderous discourse on the eternal decrees, or "Faraday's Philosophy." There are many easy books that are good.

You might as well say, "I propose now to give a hale rest to my digestive organs, and instead of eating heavy meat and vegetables I will, for a little while, take lighter food—a little strychnine and a few grains of ratsbane." Literary poison in August is as bad as literary poison in December. Mark that. Do not let the vermin of a corrupt printing press jump and crawl into your Saratoga trunk or White Mountain valise. Are there not good books that are easy to read—books of entertaining travel, books of congenial history, books of pure fun, books of poetry, ringing with merry canto; books of fine engraving, books that will rest the mind as well as purify the heart and elevate the whole life? There will not be an hour between this and the day of your death when you can afford to read a book lacking in moral principle.—T. De Witt Talmage in Ladies' Home Journal.

Prince of the Comoros.

Another sable personage is now visiting Paris in the person of Prince Mardjane, of the Comoro Islands, which lie off the east coast of Africa near Mozambique. He is here in order, it is said, to furnish the government with information concerning his country, but this would seem to be a vague, semi-official explanation of his presence in Paris. Whatever may be the object of the prince's coming he has neglected to provide himself with an interpreter through whom he could make his business known; and when he and his secretary appeared at the ministry of marine not a single official could understand a word which either of the strangers uttered.

After a weary waste of atrocious French on the one hand and of absurd Arabic on the other an interpreter was summoned hastily and some light was at last thrown on the wishes and intention of the distinguished black. Prince Mardjane has had a perilous voyage from his native land, for he was shipwrecked a few days after its shores receded from his view and, having been picked up by an English vessel, he was taken to the Cape.—Paris Letter.

Grew Old While Drowning.

Richard L. Edwards, 19 years old, was drowned while rowing on the Ohio. The body was swept beneath some barges and could not be recovered. Friday a corpse was found floating in the river near Rising Sun, Ind. On the body was a watch and ring both bearing the initials R. L. E. Apparently the body was that of a man at least 50 years of age with snow white hair.

Edwards' brother positively identified the body from the jewelry and clothing. When the young man fell into the river his hair was coal black; that of the corpse was pure white. Fright doubtless made the change while he was struggling for life. There has been great excitement along the river over the mysterious case. It is the first instance on record where a man was prematurely aged while drowning.—Cincinnati Cor. Pittsburg Dispatch.

Gift to Richmond College.

The family—wife and children—of T. C. Williams have given $25,000 to endow a law professorship in Richmond college. Some months before his death Mr. Williams sent to Treasurer C. H. Ryland his check for $10,000 to aid in endowing the college and at the same time he offered to give $5,000 toward endowing a chair of law, conditioned on the raising of $20,000 more in a given time. The condition was not complied with, and of course Mr. Williams' estate was released from the obligation to pay the $5,000. But now his wife and children step forward and pay the entire $25,000, and thus give to Richmond college the T. C. Williams law professorship.—Richmond Herald.

The Fashionable Fox Terrier.

Every dog has his day, and the fashionable dog of just this present day is unquestionably the fox terrier. Abundant evidence of this fact can be picked up any fine afternoon by a walk through a fashionable New York thoroughfare. The younger set of men about town, almost to a man, own fox terriers. Their sisters and the other fellows' sisters of their acquaintance own them; blushing school girls own them, and, like certain kinds of patent medicine, children cry for them. Indeed, it may be truly said that there are few well to do families who have not at one time or another had one of these sprightly, intelligent and pugnacious little dogs.—New York Tribune.

A thoroughbred Poland China sow, owned in Mount Leonard, Mo., recently gave birth to a hairless, flesh colored monstrosity, with head, ears, teeth and one fore foot resembling a bull pup, and the rest of its body resembling a pig. All who have seen the thing unite in declaring its resemblance to the dog family, though its skin is almost human and its body that of a hog.

A school teacher in Marcellus, Mich., received the following note from an angry parent: "Mey 18.90 when my Boys are Staing away from School I have Work For them; and when They are dare you Teach them, and when They are to home, that is non of your Bisness you hant rening My Shenty not by a good Side, at my home."

WAR REMINISCENCE.

Wonderful Nerve Display by a Commander.

HAND TO HAND CONFLICT ON DECK.

Fearful Sea Fight Between the Albemarle and the Sassacus.

Now came the decisive moment, for by this action, which was in reality a maneuver of our commander, we had acquired a distance from the ram of about 400 yards, and the latter, to evade the Mattabesett, had sheered off a little and lay broadside to us. The Union ships were now on both sides of the ram, with engines stopped. Commander Roe saw the opportunity, which an instant's delay would forfeit, and boldly met the crisis of the engagement. To the engineer he cried, "Crowd waste and oil in the fires and back slowly! Give her all the steam she can carry!" To Acting Master Boutelle he said, "Lay her course for the junction of the casemate and the hull!" Then came four bells, and, with full steam and open throttle, the ship sprang forward like a living thing. It was a moment of intense strain and anxiety. The guns ceased firing, the smoke lifted from the ram, and we saw that every effort was being made to evade the shock. Straight as an arrow we shot forward to the designated spot. Then came the order, "All hands lie down!" and, with a crash that shook the ship like an earthquake, we struck full and square on the iron hull.

Our ship quivered for an instant, but held fast, and the swift plash of the paddles showed that the engines were uninjured. My own station was in the bow, on the main deck, on a line with the enemy's guns. Through the starboard shutter, which had been partly jarred off by the concussion, I saw the port of the ram not ten feet away. It opened, and like a flash of lightning I saw the grim muzzle of a cannon, the straining gun's crew naked to the waist and blackened with powder; then a blaze, a roar and a rush of the shell as it crashed through, whirling me round and dashing me to the deck.

Both ships were under headway, and, as the ram advanced, our shattered bows clinging to the iron casement were twisted round and a solid shot from a Brooke gun almost touching our side crashed through, followed immediately by a cloud of steam and boiling water that filled the forward decks as our overcharged boilers, pierced by the shot, emptied their contents with a shrill scream that drowned for an instant the roar of the guns. The shouts of command and the cries of the scalded, wounded and blinded men mingled with the rattle of small arms that told of a hand to hand conflict above. The ship surged heavily to port as the great weight of water in the boiler was expended, and over the cry, "The ship is sinking!" came the shout, "All hands repel boarders on starboard bow!"

The horrid tumult, always characteristic of battle, was intensified by the cries of agony from the scalded and frantic men. Wounds may rend, and blood may flow, and grim heroism keep the teeth set firm in silence; but to be boiled alive—to have the flesh drop from the face and hands, to strip off in sodden mass from the body as the clothing is torn away in savage eagerness for relief, will bring screams from the stoutest lips. In the midst of all this, when every man had left the engine room, our chief engineer, Mr. Hobby, although badly scalded, stood with heroism at his post; nor did he leave it till after the action, when he was brought up, blinded and helpless, to the deck. I had often before been in battle; had stepped over the decks of a steamer in the Merrimac fight when a shell had exploded covering the deck with fragments of human bodies, literally tearing to pieces the men on the small vessel as she lay alongside the Minnesota, but never before had I experienced such a sickening sensation of horror as on this occasion, when the bow of the Sassacus lay for thirteen minutes on the roof of the Albemarle. An officer of the Wyalusing says that when the dense smoke and steam enveloped us they thought we had sunk, till the flash of our guns burst through the clouds, followed by flash after flash in quick succession, as our men recovered from the shock of the explosion.

In Commander Febiger's report the time of our contact was said to be "some few minutes." To us, at least, there seemed time enough for the other ships to close in on the ram and sink her or sink beside her, and it was thirteen minutes as timed by an officer, who told me, but the other ships were silent, and with stopped engines looked on as the clouds closed over us in the grim and final struggle.—E. Holden, M. D., late U. S. N., in The Century.

Plague of Rats in China.

A plague of rats is reported in a recent number of The Pekin Gazette, which recalls the German legend of the rats of Hamelin. Certain postal routes have had to be changed in Outer Mongolia on account of the honeycombing of the whole country by myriads of rats, who have burrowed and eaten up the pasturage so extensively that the supply of food for camels and horses is greatly diminished, and the burrows are dangerous to all mounted travelers and couriers. The prize offered by the Australian government for a riddance of the rabbits which infest that country may afford a suggestion to the authorities in China to offer inducements which M. Pasteur or some unknown Whittington may find advantageous enough to undertake the task of ridding the country of these vermin. China and the Chinese have been afflicted enough of late, what with earthquakes, floods, restricted immigration, etc.—Demorest's Monthly.

To Have a Big Globe.

Students of the earth's surface will be anxious to see the huge globe that is to be exhibited next year in the Champs de Mars, Paris. It will rotate properly on an axis, and will be accurately constructed on a scale of one-millionth. Even at that it will be a tremendous thing and give considerable of an idea of the appearance of the world we live in.

Where Flies Call the Guests.

"The queerest hotel in the world is in Guatemala city, Central America," said an English tourist. "While there I stopped a day at the biggest hostelry, and met with more surprises than I have previously encountered in my trip around the world. The house is built only one story high on account of the earthquakes. It is constructed in the form of a hollow square, and the interior court is made beautiful with trees and flowers. The exterior presents the appearance of a prison. After pounding a high knocker on the outer door you are ushered into a scene of verdant beauty. The hotel was formerly the private residence of one of the richest families of Central America, but the owner was banished by President Barrios for an alleged conspiracy against the government.

"Around the interior were balconies overlooking a garden filled with orange and peach trees, palms and beautiful flowers. The fare was good, and we had our choice of pancakes with honey, fish, poultry, fruits and coffee and chocolate. You can't eat there if you are in a hurry though. Only one thing is served at a time, and you can't get a cup of coffee till everything else has been served. The hotel furnishes candles, but matches are extra. Then there is a system of calling the guests which entitles the hotel to the name of the queerest one on earth. You are called by flies. The flies down there are nearly as large as an English sparrow and they sting like a hornet, though the bite is not poisonous. They never kill them, but brush them away. The halls of the hotel are filled with these pests in the morning.

"Over each door is a transom. Now if you leave a call for 7 o'clock your transom is opened and the flies go in. Do they wake you? I should say so. The sensation is like that of being sandbagged. In five minutes from the time your transom is opened you are down stairs looking for the proprietor. It doesn't do any good to kick, though, for that system has been the custom for years."—Chicago Tribune.

An Odd Signal Man.

The baboon is a well known character in the Cape Colony, but more particularly in the neighborhood of Port Elizabeth. The history attaching to him is a curious and probably unique one. The signal man, his owner, was, through no fault of his own, run over by a passing train, and had to have both legs amputated, which would naturally incapacitate him from work, but the idea struck him to secure a baboon and train him to do his work. This he has successfully accomplished, and for many years the one in question has regularly looked after the levers and done the hard work of his afflicted master. The animal is possessed of extraordinary intelligence and has never made a mistake.

Of course the human servant works the telegraphs, and the baboon the levers according to instruction; and taking into consideration the fact that at the station in question, Uitenhage Junction, and about twenty miles from Port Elizabeth, there is a large volume of traffic, the sagacity of the creature is really wonderful. At first passengers raised a strong protest against the employment of the animal, on the score of risk of accident, but the baboon has never yet failed during his many years of work, and on more than one occasion has acted in a manner that is simply astounding to those who never had personal experience of the intelligence of these brutes. One of his most noteworthy performances was the correct switching of an unannounced special train on its correct line in the absence of the signal man. The latter lives about a mile up the line, and the baboon pushes him out and home morning and night, and is the sole companion of his legless master.—Illustrated Sporting and Dramatic News.

Colors in Garnets.

Garnets are not always shaded in red. They appear in brown, black, green and yellow. Colorless and white specimens have also been found. There is a coarse variety known as common garnet found in sufficient quantities to be used as a flux in the smelting of iron. It is the noble garnets or the precious garnets, sometimes called almandine, that are of great value. They are generally of a crimson red color, sometimes of so deep a tint that jewelers hollow it out beneath or place a plate of silver at the back of it. The cinnamon stone is said to be a garnet. There is a variety found in Siberia which is called the Grossularia, from its resemblance to a green gooseberry in form, size and color. Powdered garnets are often used for polishing and cutting other stones. The powder is known among lapidaries as red emery.—Keystone.

Ghastly Cleverness.

Pinetti, the famous conjurer, was commanded by the Empress Catherine II of Russia to give her a specimen of his cleverness. On presenting herself at his lodgings, in response to his invitation, her majesty was conducted into a room that was entirely draped in black and lighted up with tapers. A sort of wooden gallows was erected in one corner of the room, on which, to her horror, the empress saw hanging the body of Pinetti. After a while the conjurer flung off one of his legs, then the other, in like manner his arms, then his head, and last of all the trunk dropped to the ground, and uniting with the limbs presented the figure of the performer restored to life and vigor. Catherine made him a handsome present, but sent him an intimation to leave the country.—Exchange.

A LESSON TO A LIAR.

How a Man Was Effectually Squelched.

TEN YEARS LOOKING FOR REVENGE.

A Story Teller's Life Spared Only on Condition.

"I know," the northern member would occasionally say, "that people would be slow to believe some of the things I have been telling about my experiences in the war, but they are all true to the letter."

"I don't doubt for a moment," said the western man, who wasn't in the war. "And now just let me tell you a little maritime story—true beyond a doubt and not in the least fishy, though I will confess it is so old that it has burrs on it. A crowd of men were sitting in a saloon one night and a man got up and commenced to relate an experience of his own. It ran like this: 'I was on a ship ten years ago which was wrecked in mid ocean. Many of the passengers did not succeed in getting into the life boats and some of us had to jump into the water. I sank twice and then managed to catch hold of a piece of timber just big enough to support me. Recovering my breath I congratulated myself on having support enough to possibly keep me afloat until I could be picked up by some passing vessel. Suddenly I felt one end of my timber go down, and turning my head, discovered that another man had grabbed hold of my lumber. In a moment or two we were about to sink. I urged him to be careful, but he would not heed me. We drifted along for some minutes, when I made up my mind that one or the other of us would have to go down, for with such pressure it was only a matter of time when we would both lose our piece of timber. I finally edged my way up to the man and choking him, made him release his grip. He fell off, and I suppose drowned, for I paddled away and saw him no more. It was a cruel thing to do, but self preservation being the first law of nature, I looked out for No. 1. You may not believe this, but, gentlemen, it is the truth.'

"Then," the western congressman went on to relate, "a big man, with bushy beard and fierce looking eyebrows, arose from a corner and said: 'Alas for you, it was true. I was the man you pushed that awful day from the piece of timber. Ha! ha! you thought you had drowned me, but I live to face the man who treated me so. Kind fortune, when I arose from beneath the angry waves, sent along another piece of timber, and, though bruised by you, I had strength enough left to cling like an oyster to my timber, and in a few hours I was rescued by a passing ship. For nearly ten long years I have been hunting you, sir, and you shall die. I will give you five minutes to prepare for death—more than you would give me in mid ocean.'

"The crowd seemed disposed to interfere, but the big man with bushy beard drew two pistols, and called out: 'Stand back, everybody!' and with the death dealing weapons he covered the party who had narrated the ocean experience. The latter pleaded for mercy, and eventually the big man with the bushy beard said: 'I will spare your life only on one condition.'

"'Name it!' gasped the frightened man.

"'That you will confess to this crowd that no such thing as you have related ever occurred, and that you have simply been telling a whopping lie, thinking that these people would believe you.'

"As quick as a flash the man admitted that he had simply been romancing. He was forgiven, but not until after he had treated the house."—Detroit Tribune.

WOMAN'S WORLD.

YOUNG WOMEN AS TICKET AGENTS IN BROOKLYN.

Won't Sit in the Front Row—For Rosebuds of Marriage—Pretty Souvenirs. What Miss Potter Has Done—Will Women Combine?—Wedding Gowns.

The recent appointment of two women as ticket agents at the Boerum place station of the Kings County Elevated railway has led others to apply for places. They are told there are no vacancies at present, but their names often are taken and reserved for future reference. In the absence of General Manager William T. Goundie a representative of the company said recently that positively none of the men would be turned away to make room for women.

"But," it was asked, "is it to be the rule hereafter that women will be appointed to fill vacancies as they may occur?"

"There is no reason why women should not be appointed," was the reply. "We believe they will prove honest and capable."

The official, however, would not commit himself as to whether or not this was to be the future policy of the company. There are drawbacks to the employment of women. A ticket agent on the elevated roads, as everybody knows, has often to deal with some pretty ugly customers. The two women who are now acting as ticket agents are not deterred by this consideration.

Of the two female ticket agents, one goes on duty at 5 a. m. and stays until 3 p. m.—ten hours. She is relieved then by the other, who remains until 1 o'clock the next morning—ten hours. They will be expected to work seven days in the week, the same as the men. He said they understand this, and had offered no objection. It is said the road had economy in view when it introduced the innovation. The men are paid $12 per week, whereas the women receive $9. A saving of $3 a week out of each of the eighty-eight ticket agents on the road would mean $264 a week for the owners.—New York Sun.

Won't Sit in the Front Row.

The custodian of the large hall in Cooper Union undertook to perform a gallant act on the occasion of the Municipal league mass meeting, and he is now wiser in the ways of the fair sex than he was. Before the clamoring crowd in front of the building was admitted to the hall he told his assistants and the policemen on guard that he wanted the front row of seats reserved for ladies. He was very particular on that point and admonished the police over and over again not to let any men occupy those front seats unless they escorted ladies. The wielders of the persuasive night sticks said all right. Then the doors were opened and the rush came. Of course, every man and boy scurried down in front and swarmed over the front row of seats. Several seated themselves in that forbidden quarter, but they were unceremoniously expelled.

It cost the police and the custodian and the custodian's assistants a great deal of trouble to keep that front row vacant, but they succeeded. Several ladies entered the hall and were politely invited to "step right down in front." They were shown to the front row, but after glancing at the empty seats they turned back and found other places not so far forward. Not one woman could be induced to sit down in that front row. The gallant custodian was sorely puzzled, and finally he mustered sufficient courage to ask one lady who declined to accept his invitation to sit in the front row why she objected. "I don't want to sit there," she exclaimed impatiently, "because there is no place to put my feet."—New York Times.

For Rosebuds of Marriage.

Let me venture a few little points to those of my girls who since the summer have worn a bright ring on their third finger:

My dear, don't let the man to whom you are engaged to be married pay any of the expenses of your living or trousseau until you are his wife. A calico dress and contentment are much more to be desired than a fine silk one garnitured with scandal.

Don't complain to the man to whom you are engaged of the different members of your own family; it is not a good preface to matrimonial bliss.

Don't write silly letters to him, even if he is fond of affection given in that way. Let it be by word of mouth rather than with pen and ink.

Don't expect him to love you as no man has ever loved before. The methods of loving are very much the same all the world over. Be satisfied if you have got a good, honest love.

Don't believe that he is a combination in beauty of all the ancient gods, of all the gallant knights and of all the great statesmen, but conclude that he is a gentleman, and that should be your ideal.

Don't believe that he is thinking of you every hour of his life. He is not; be satisfied if he is working away, with every now and then giving a thought to the girl for whom he is making a home over which he expects her to preside as a loving, thoughtful wife.—Ladies' Home Journal.

Pretty Souvenirs.

A lady who has just returned from the seashore showed me some souvenirs of her vacation. Among them were several jewel receptacles made out of the shells of the sea urchin. Three of these shells, about four inches across and of a delicate lavender, were lined with pale pink silk and fastened to triangular pieces of heavy cardboard with beveled edges, thus making a dainty addition to a bureau or toilet table. To prepare these the opening was made larger by carefully cutting or breaking away the shell; then a small piece of cardboard was placed in the bottom of each, and the shells were fastened by a few stitches to the triangular piece. Some delicate cotton was sprinkled with sachet powder and placed inside. A circular piece of silk was cut large enough so that when gathered over a cord one-half inch from the edge and drawn up to fit the opening it would nicely line the shell, allowing the ruffled edge to lie on the outside of the opening. These may be arranged singly and in groups, but the triangular arrangement was especially pretty.—Housewife.

What Miss Potter Has Done.

Miss Beatrice Potter is at present one of the most famous and talked of women in England. She is a superbly beautiful woman, is of aristocratic connections and owns a large fortune in her own right. For several years past she has been a devoted pupil and disciple of Herbert Spencer. Having read and heard all manner of grewsome stories of the horrors endured by women in sweaters' shops, she dressed herself in the odious rags worn by that class, went down into the City, found work, and for two months lived and labored side by side with those miserable white slaves of the needle.

Few knew her secret, and so cleverly were her plans carried out that neither employers nor employes ever suspected her identity. When she had thoroughly informed herself on all minutiæ relating to the criminal tyranny exercised by the sweaters, and on the hideous lives led by their female victims, she threw off her disguise, returned to the West End, gave exhaustive newspaper interviews and appealed for legislative interference. So strong and unanswerable were her arguments, seconded by her own experiences, that parliament discussed ways and means for righting this great wrong.—New York Telegram.

Will Women Combine?

Will women combine is a question that some of the foremost women in the United States are considering with reference to representation in a federation at the World's fair. The strongest female organization in the world is said to be the Women's Christian Temperance union, which has auxiliaries all over the country and a membership of 200,000. The King's Daughters, including all the circles and subcircles, number 135,000. There are 100,000 women in the Ladies' Relief corps, the Suffragists are about 75,000 strong, the Kindergarten association 50,000, and the working girls' societies in New York alone have an army of 130,000. Here is a league of more than half a million women banded together for mutual and general good, to which, under wise legislation, there should be nothing but success, advancement and prosperity. And yet the question has been raised in Europe and America, Will women combine?—Exchange.

Wedding Gowns.

Pretty Parisian wedding gowns for the season are artistic and beautiful in the extreme. The richest are composed of the new brocaded satins, on whose lustrous surface branches of orange blossoms, white lilacs, snow drops, or the popular fleur-de-lis are strewn. Silver embroidery or brocade is seen on several Worth dresses. When a plain fabric is desired peau de soie, bengaline, soft, thick, repped silk or white satin sewn thickly with pearls, a la Dorothy Tennant, may be chosen. For trimmings there are ruches of white ostrich tips or of lace, thick, close frills of white mousseline de soie, or handsome silver and pearl passementeries. Often the long polonaise is of brocade, and the underskirt of embroidered lace or muslin. Or a plain skirt with bodice waist has a long train of rich brocade.—New York Ledger.

An Exile's Wife.

Mrs. O'Brien, wife of the Irish exile, is a Russian lady of social distinction, and is described by those who have met her as highly intelligent and accomplished. In personal appearance she is of a dark type of beauty, petite and fascinating. She is a zealous adherent of her husband's cause, and has translated into Russian and French the works of John Morley, the Liberal leader, for the widespread dissemination of his views. Being Russian born, it is to be presumed that the present complication in her husband's affairs is in no way disheartening to her—political hot water seeming to be the condition upon which the czar's subjects thrive, or at least in which they frequently find themselves.—New York Times.

Some Complexion Tints.

The cold winds of autumn make the following advice very seasonable: Rose water and brandy is recommended for roughness caused by walking or driving in the wind. Another skin tonic is alcohol and water. The white of an egg beaten well, five grams of alum in five grams of sweet almond oil, is said to be a sure remedy for wrinkles. One teaspoonful of carbolic acid in a pint of rose water is an excellent remedy for pimples. Strong tea will darken the eyelashes, we are told, while sage tea makes the hair dark, and cream made by a pint of glycerine and six ounces of lime water will, when rubbed thoroughly into the hair, make it glossy and keep the scalp clean.—New York Journal.

Springfield's Nurses.

Springfield, Mass., is to have a directory of nurses. The board of registration will consist of two from the trustees and two from the medical staff of the hospital, who will pass upon each applicant. The manager will know the location of every nurse; those unemployed can be reached at short notice, and both the sick and the nurse will be benefited through the convenience of the directory. Mrs. C. A. Nichols is one of the hospital trustees on the board of registration.—Boston Woman's Journal.

The Influence of Reading.

Seventeen years ago Miss Ticknor, of Boston, having been often appealed to to direct the reading of young girls, founded a society to encourage home study. This society, including at first half a dozen names, now has a membership of 524 active students, whose intellectual work is planned and simplified by the Boston office. One of the very best results of the disinterested labors of Miss Ticknor and her fellow workers is found today on a North Carolina farm. The farmer, a lady who is taking three courses of study under the direction of the society, has started on her own place a school, where, at a nominal cost, she offers instruction to that large class of her compatriots "on the border land of good or bad citizenship," who otherwise would have no instruction at all. This school is full, and the gain of the pupils in intelligence and character already visible.—Harper's Bazar.

TUESDAY, December 16th.

Steward vs. Robinson—Election contest Votes of Independence precinct re-counted and James B. Steward declared elected Supervisor in Third District.

BORN.

CONKLIN—At Independence, Dec. 18, to Mr. and Mrs. N. E. Conklin, a son.

Tim Madden came up from Cerro Gordo last week.

Dave Holland is in town learning the ropes of the Sheriff's office.

If you don't think Norm is happy just look at him four blocks off—it's a boy.

County Clerk Mack started for San Francisco yesterday and will return home next Wednesday.

John N Yandell has been in the County Clerk's office for some days past learning the routine of office business.

There are a great many cattle ranging in Salt Wells Valley and Big Dixie. Weeds are starting to grow and stock look very well.

Walter Ober was to have run a race with a man named Withington at Bakersfield last Sunday, The result has not yet been learned.

O. I. Mairs and Harry Jiggins went to Los Angeles last week from Bakersfield, the former to meet his sister, and the latter, his mother.

The tragic death of Mrs. Symmes and her son is deeply felt throughout the County. Mr. Symmes with his two remaining children, has gone on to Pasadena.

Wm. Rowam passed through town to-day with a band of horses for the Los Angeles market. There are forty head in all, most of them being half-breed Normans.

A number of witnesses and others connected with the Elliott trial at Bakersfield, including the attorneys, Messrs. Laird, Kittrell, Hayden and Blair, are at the New Southern.

The county road north of the school house at Georges Creek is in a villainous condition. A suit for damages against the county will be the probable result if it is not attended to immediately.

Israel Rutgers arrived last Tuesday at Lone Pine from Kern County, where he has resided for three years past He came up on business connected with the Land Office and will remain in the valley a few days.

Mr. and Mrs. A. R. Conklin and Miss M. Conklin passed through Mojave last Sunday en route for San Bernardino. Governor Waterman was on the same train. The parties were going to attend the ceremonies of laying the corner stone of a public building at that place.

Bar silver is again on the rise. On Tuesday quotations opened at 1.05 and closed at 1.09¾. On that day Mr. Sanders introduced a bill in the Senate to amend the silver coinage law so as to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase all the silver offered at a price not exceeding $1 for 371.25 grains of pure silver, and to issue Treasury notes in payment therefor.

Last Saturday William Parkinson met with a serious accident. He was coming down the hill from Cerro Gordo with a load of ore. When going down a steep pitch between high, narrow walls, known as the "Devil's Gate," his brake gave way, letting the wagon on the team. Four animals were killed one or two more injured. Mr. Parkinson fortunately escaped injury.

T. B. Scovil's residence at Georges Creek was entirely destroyed by fire last Monday night. During the absence of their parents the children, in some way, set fire to the building. Mrs. Scovil returned in time to rescue the children, but all of their household goods were destroyed and the charity of their neighbors is required to prevent them from suffering. Mrs. J. V. Skinner went to Lone Pine on Tuesday and secured bedding and clothing. The little children were left naked and houseless, and it is incumbent upon the people to afford them relief.

In the contested Supervisor case last Tuesday Mr. Robinson failed to appear. The ballotts were opened and on a recount Mr. Steward was declared elected and a certificate ordered to be issued. His majority was forty-three. In all three precincts the number of ballots upon which no name appeared for Supervisor was twelve. It has been claimed that the fact of Mr. Robinson's name not being printed on the Democratic ballots caused his defeat but the returns prove that if he had received all the blank ballots Mr. Steward would still have been elected by a majority of thirty-one.

Sitting Bull Killed.

ST. PAUL, Dec 15,—The report received here late this afternoon that Sitting Bull had been killed is apparently confirmed by advices received by General Miles in this city. He received two dispatches to-day, the first from Pierre, South Dakota, stating that Sitting Bull and his son had been killed, but giving no further particulars. The other dispatch was from Standing Rock Agency, South Dakota, and stated that Indian Police started out to-day to arrest Sitting Bull, having understood that he proposed starting for the Bad Lands at once. The police were followed by a company of cavalry under Captain Tochet and infantry under Colonel Drum.

When the police reached Sitting Bull's Camp, on Grand River, about forty miles from the agency, they found that arrangements were being made for his departure. The cavalry had not yet reached the camp when the police arrested Bull and started back with him. His followers quickly rallied to the rescue and tried to retake him. In the melee the wily old Chief is said to have been killed, and also five of the Indian police. One of the police rode back to the cavalry and infantry, telling them to hurry up to the support of the police, and then hurried on to the agency with news of the battle.

Nothing later than this has been received, but the death of Sitting Bull and at least five of those who captured him seems undoubtedly true.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 15.—Indian Commissioner Morgan this evening received from Indian Agent McLaughlin the following, dated Fort Yates, North Dakota: The Indian police arrested Sitting Bull at his camp forty miles northwest of the agency, at daylight. His followers attempted to rescue him, when fighting commenced. Four of the police were killed and three wounded. Eight Indians were killed including Sitting Bull and his son (Crow Foot) and several others were wounded. The police were surrounded for some time, but maintained their ground until relieved by the United States troops, who now have possession of Sitting Bull's camp, with all the women, children and property of Sitting Bull's followers.

Probably 100 men deserted their camp and fled west of Grand river. The police behaved nobly and great credit is due them. Particulars by mail.

CHICAGO, Dec. 15.—At 9 o'clock to-night Assistant Adjutant General Corbin of General Miles' staff received an official dispatch from St. Paul saying that Sitting Bull and five of Sitting Bull's men and seven of the Indian police had been killed in a fight to-day following an attempt by the police to arrest Sitting Bull.—Virginia Enterprise.

The Elliott Case.

P. H. Mack and I. H. Mulholland were excused by the Defense in the Elliott case at Bakersfield last Saturday evening and arrived home last Tuesday. Up till Saturday afternoon, nine jurors had been obtained and sworn to try the case out of ninety summoned to appear. The third venire of forty was summoned to attend at 10 a. m. of Tuesday. As the Grand Jury of Kern County was also to meet that same day a considerable delay in the proceedings was expected. It is not at all likely that the case will be concluded before Christmas. There has been considerable change in sentiment at Bakersfield as concerns Elliott and a conviction may be reasonably be expected. Mr. Laird is making every effort to secure a verdict. He is canvassing the jury thoroughly and hopes to secure good and honorable men to try the case. It is a difficult matter to say just what the cost to the county will be, but $12,000 will not be far from the mark. Just how this large sum will be appropriated is an arduous subject for the Supervisors to determine. If there should not be sufficient fund at the close of the present fiscal year somebody will be likely to "get left." Elliott is at liberty and apparently under no surveillance by the authorities. The Sheriff is said to be impressed with Elliott's innocence and affords him every indulgence in his power

Stripped, Robbed and Mutilated.

TOMBSTONE, ARZ., Dec. 15.—The bodies of Bridger and Robinson, who were killed by Apaches, were brought in to night. Both bodies had been stripped, robbed and mutilated. The Coroner's jury met but adjourned without rendering a verdict. Cattlemen and prospectors feel unsafe—as the Indians are believed to be still in the vicinity of the killing—and are coming in for protection. No action has been taken by the military.—Enterprise.

Henry Levy has the timber on hand, and work will be commenced on a new livery stable to be run in connection with the Independence hotel. There will be stalls for thirty horses and sheds for loose stock and buggies. A specialty will be made of caring for transient stock.

There was lately landed in San Francisco a freak worth mentioning in the shape of a coal black mare from Australia that is utterly and absolutely without a single hair, having not so much as mane or tail. In all other respects she is a model of the equine race.

At the recent meeting of the American Street Railway association the belief was expressed that it was the last convention at which horse traction would ever receive serious consideration, as electricity in one form or another was bound to replace the horses.

For a considerable time Mr. Isbell, of Rivera, Cal., has been troubled by bees, which took possession of the upper part of his house. A few days ago he had them cleared out, and gathered 6,000 pounds of choice honey.

An Austrian has invented an instrument resembling a piano in appearance which contains six violins, two violas and two violoncellos, and is manipulated by a keyboard.

MISCELLANEOUS.

ORDINANCE No. 31.

THE BOARD OF SUPERVISORS OF THE County of Inyo, State of California, do ordain as follows:

SECTION 1. The regular meetings of the Board of Supervisors of Inyo County, State of California, must and shall be held at the Town of Independence, in the County and State aforesaid, being the County Seat of said Board on the first Monday of January, April, July and October of each year, and must continue from time to time until all the business before the said Board is disposed of. Such other meetings must be held as are otherwise provided by law.

SECTION 2. This ordinance shall take effect and be in force on and after fifteen (15) days from its passage, and Ordinances No. 2 and 21 of said Board of Supervisors together with all ordinances or parts of ordinances in conflict herewith, and each and all of them are hereby repealed.

SECTION 3. This ordinance shall be published in the INYO INDEPENDENT, a newspaper published in said Inyo County, at least two weeks, said publication to be made for said time and before the expiration of said fifteen days.

This ordinance was passed by the Board of Supervisors of said Inyo County, State aforesaid, at a Special Session of said Board, held on December 10th, 1890, by the following vote: AYES—J. D. Harger, J. J. Stewart and Seth G. Sneden.

SETH G. SNEDEN,
Chairman pro tem. of the Board of Supervisors of Inyo County, State of California.

Attest: P. H. MACK,
(SEAL) Clerk of said Board of Supervisors.

By ALEXANDER CLARK, Deputy Clerk.

[ENDORSED.]

ORDINANCE NO. 31.

Filed and recorded December 10th, 1890, in Ordinance Book "B" on page 69 et seq.
P. H. MACK, Clerk.
by ALEXANDER CLARK, Deputy Clerk.

Proposals for Care of Indigent Sick of Inyo County.

Notice is hereby given that sealed proposals will be received by the Board of Supervisors of Inyo county, at the office of the County Clerk until 10 o'clock A.M. on Wednesday, Jan. 7, 1891, to contract for the care of said indigent sick for the term of one year from May 10th 1891 to May 10th. 1892, said bids to designate the amount for which parties contracting will care for said indigent sick on the basis of an average of four patients per day throughout the year, and to include all medicine, nursing, board, lodging and washing. Said bids to include the burial and funeral expenses of any indigent sick person or persons who may die while under such care.

Said contractor to care for all the indigent sick properly admitted to the contractor's care. And said bids to designate the price per head at which all excess of patients over the average of four each day throughout the year will be cared for, said excess to be paid for by extra allowance on presentation of bills duly sworn to, at the regular meeting of said Board immediately after said contract has expired. The average four per day to be paid for at the regular meetings of the Board on presentation of bills duly verified. All payments to be made by warrants drawn upon the Hospital Fund of said county.

The person or persons to whom said contract shall be awarded shall give a good and sufficient bond in double the sum of the contract price, for the faithful performance of said contract.

The care and management of said indigent sick by such contractor shall be at all times subject to the inspection of said Board of Supervisors, or any member thereof, or any person appointed by the Board for such purpose.

Said proposals must be endorsed, "Proposals for Care of Indigent Sick," and the same will be opened between the hours of ten o'clock and twelve o'clock A. M., on the 7th day of Jan. 1891, and the Board reserves the right to reject any and all bids.

P. H. MACK,
Clerk.

All on one side—the offer that's made by the proprietors of Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy. It's $500 reward for an incurable case of Catarrh, no matter how bad, or of how long standing. They mean what they say; they're responsible, and the offer has been made for years. It's all on your side—you lose your catarrh, or you're paid $500 for keeping it. But it's safe for them, too—they know you'll be cured.

Dr. Sage's Remedy produces perfect and permanent cures of Chronic Catarrh in the Head, as thousands can testify. "Cold in the Head" is cured with a few applications. Catarrhal Headache is relieved and cured as if by magic. It removes offensive breath, loss or impairment of the sense of taste, smell or hearing, watering or weak eyes, and impaired memory, when caused by the violence of Catarrh, as they all frequently are. Remedy sold by druggists, 50 cents.

THE BUCCANEERS OF OLD

Flaunted the skull and cross bones, their ensign, defiantly at the masthead. Your modern pirate, not on the high seas, but upon the high reputation of standard remedies skulks under various disguises. His hole and corner traffic has never to any degree affected Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, although that standard invigorant and corrective has long been the shining mark at which his shafts have been directed. Cheap local bitters, composed of fiery unrectified stimulants, with an infusion or extract possibly, of some tonic bark, are still sometimes recommended as identical with, or similar to, or possessing virtues kindred to those of America's schoolin family medicine. These perish speedily, while the great subduer and preventive of disease pursues its successful career, overcoming malaria, dyspepsia, nervousness, kidney troubles, constipation and rheumatic ailments, not only on this, but on many continents.

HOW TO HELP YOUR DIGESTION.

Almost every day we feel the unpleasant sensations of indigestion. Try ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTERS and be relieved. J. F. Davenport, of Canarsie, New York, writes:

"I have been very much troubled with a violent pain below my chest bone. I was told by several physicians that it was rheumatism of the diaphragm. It resulted from cold and exposure. I had very little appetite and digested my food with great difficulty. I placed one ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTER below the breast bone and two on each side. In the course of twenty-four hours all pain ceased, and I was able to eat and digest a good square meal, something I had not done before in two weeks. I got better constantly, and at the end of seven days found myself entirely well. Since then I have used ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTERS for colds, coughs and pains in my side, and I have always found them quick and effective."

THE NOSEMAKERS.

Peculiar Methods Employed by the Hindoos.

NOSES MADE TO SUIT ONE'S FANCY.

Rings Worn in the Noses of Widows and Girls.

A correspondent of the Allahabad Pioneer gives an account of the Kangairas, a people who have long enjoyed a reputation as nosemakers. They live chiefly in Kangra, a small hill canton in the Punjaub. Altogether there are fourteen families remaining out of which only two individuals are practical nosemakers. Their reputation still remains. People come to them from the remotest parts of the Punjaub, and even Afghanistan, actuated by the sole desire of having their facial promontory repaired or renewed. The Kangra nosemakers consider their art as one specially granted to them by the great Bajreshwu Devi of the place. They therefore perform the operation in strict secrecy. The writer says:

"It was only with great difficulty that I procured the following information respecting the modus operandi of this plastic operation for restoration of nose from an old bald and habitual opium eater. My friend thinks nothing of daily consuming forty-five grains of opium, and whenever he can afford, just to keep aglow the sunshine of his mind, adds considerable amount of bhang and charus (Capabis Indica, leaves and extract) and arsenic. They say the bald is well versed in the science of physic and astrology, besides having a denizen of the other world at his beck and call, by whose assistance he is able to open the gates of the unseen. When sent for to advise on difficult cases, he never fails, before going, to summon and consult his ghostly servitor as to the prognosis of the disease he is called to cure. In the event of an unfavorable prognosis, he declines to attend, but furnishes his would be patient with the exact date and hour of his demise.

"The old bald, it seems, was a kind of family doctor or professor of medicine to one of the nose makers, and in this capacity has more than once witnessed the operation of nose restoration. He therefore considers himself in possession of the secret, if secret it is. His narrative ran thus. After drugging their patient with some narcotic, the Kangairas forthwith proceeded to paint the forehead with a medicated lotion as a preliminary step. On asking the composition of this lotion, the only answer vouchsafed was a grave shake of the head. The next step is to cut a piece of leather to the shape and size of the required nose. This being done, it is placed on the forehead and used to mark out the lines of incision. Then they beat the forehead with an old slipper until the part marked out becomes swollen and prominent. Zinc tubes, with a plate between them to serve the purpose of septum nasi, are then lodged in the nostrils. The next proceeding is to dissect a flap of the swollen flesh with a razor, leaving the lower part attached to the forehead. In doing this they take a vein with a flap, the name and position of which is a profound secret known only to himself and the nose makers. The success of the operation depends entirely on the preservation and careful dissection of this secret vein. The next step was to turn up the flap with the secret vein a particular way over the tubes. This being accomplished, the other parts of the nose are pared and fastened to it with silk ligature, and the whole thing is brought to an end by the application of a special ointment.

"For several days, until the wound is healed, the patient must keep a recumbent position. On union taking place, the piece which was left attached to the forehead is severed, and the patient comes forth with a new born nose. I ought to have mentioned that the removal of the zinc tubes is effected as soon as convenient. Thus ended the narrative of the medical adviser to the nose makers.

"It only remains now to inquire how far their work is successful and if their skill be on a par with their reputation. That they have many opportunities of exercising their profession is beyond question. The wearing of baloo or nath (nose ring) by the married women and girls to distinguish them from widows is a source of injury to the left ala nasi. This is specially the case with the hill women of Kangra, whose rings are far heavier than those of women dwelling in the plains, consequently one often sees the left ala nasi completely split open, giving a more than slight disfigurement and preventing the distinguishing mark from being kept up. Many of these women make use of the nose makers; but, as far as my observation goes, and I have had many opportunities of seeing their work, I have never seen a satisfactory result. On the contrary, I have known many cases where the operation has simply left the woman in a worse plight than before."—St. James' Gazette.

Too Much Better Than Not Enough.

Stout Old Lady (to druggist's boy)—Boy, d'ye keep a preparation for reducin' the weight?

Boy—Yes'm.

Stout Old Lady—Well, I don't eggsactly how much I ought to git.

Boy (diagnosingly)—Better take all we've got, ma'am.—Harper's Bazar.

Called Her a "School Lady."

"Don't call me a school girl. I just hate it," said a little miss just fresh from a Toronto boarding school the other day. I thought of the discussion over the term "shop girl," and of the preference some of the employes in our dry goods stores had expressed for the term "sales ladies." "Very well, my dear," said I, "I suppose you and the other little school ladies are real glad to have the summer holidays come." The little minx looked puzzled, teased and finally disgusted, and for twenty-four hours I called her a "school lady," till she begged for mercy and for a return to the good old term, "school girl." I wonder if there are any little school ladies in Buffalo.

The Story of a Werewolf.

A noble gentleman of Brittany, in high favor with the king, married a lovely lady. There would have been no limit to their happiness but that three days out of every week the gentleman mysteriously disappeared. When pressed by his wife for an explanation he confessed that he was a Bisclaveret or werewolf, and for three days in the week was condemned to assume a wolf's shape. The lady was sore troubled and determined to rid herself of so objectionable a husband. Learning that if the lord's clothes were stolen after the metamorphosis was effected he could not resume his human shape, she and a false cavalier who loved her watched him and got possession of the castoff garments. As from that day the husband was no more seen she married the cavalier.

One day the king was out hunting when a wolf that had been sore pressed by the hounds made its way to him and looked at him with so pitiful and human an expression that the king's heart was touched. He spared it and brought it home to his court. The animal proved gentle and tractable and became a great favorite. But one day when the false cavalier came to court it jumped upon him with a wild cry and bit him severely. And when some days later the wife claimed an audience with the king the wolf flew at her, too, and bit off her nose. Swords were drawn and the wolf would have been killed, but that a wise man counseled the prince to find out first what could be the reason of the wolf's grudge to the lady and her husband. And, being threatened with imprisonment, the lady, terrified, confessed all she knew, and when the clothes of her former husband were given to the wolf he was transformed into human shape and the king rejoiced to recognize his old favorite. The guilty pair were ignominiously banished. They lived several years and had many children, all the girls being born without noses.—American Notes and Queries.

Plain Lectures on Health.

If the women's colleges would add to their course of study a series of very plain lectures on the care of health, it would be worth any amount of Anglo-Saxon literature on political economy. Nothing would make a school more popular than to supplement such lectures with strict personal care of the habits of each pupil. It would become a "beauty school" in the full sense of the word, as celebrated for sending out young ladies with brilliant complexions as Harvard for its athletics. And why is it not as necessary for young ladies to have their faces chased as to have their manners and their grammar corrected? Now, the most high minded and fastidious of Lady Sylvias has a slender body, which works over daily not less than seven pounds of food and drink, or ought to, and throws out no less than five pounds of waste by its great ducts, the bowels and kidneys, and its millions of needle ducts in the skin. Really this is very terrible for discussion, and I warmly agree with her majesty Victoria in thinking stomachs entirely unfit for mention to ears polite. But thousands of women are losing beauty and dying of painful disease for want of knowing the full significance of their internal economy and the care they owe it.—Shirley Dare.

Painting the Baby's Face.

A letter from Paris informs us that the doctors are again at war with silly mothers belonging to the fashionable circles. The latest fanaticism of La Mode is to apply the horrors of face painting to little children. In the public gardens babies of 3 years old may now be seen whose eyebrows have been blacked or dyed by their senseless mothers. Other anxious parents, distressed at the vulgarly ruddy and rustic hue of their children's cheeks, carefully powder them before sending them forth to meet the gaze and criticism of the world. Little coquettes of 10 years are not permitted to go abroad until the regulation black stroke has been painted beneath their eyes. The doctors warn the mothers that when the children thus barbarously treated reach the age of 16 they will have a colorless and ruined complexion, to say nothing of the injury to health, which is an argument less likely to produce much effect.—Pall Mall Gazette.

Who Are the Lucky Ones?

After all, what is luck? She is the handmaiden of every man at one time or another, and in one form or another. She is ever by one's side, ready to give a helping hand. The blind do not see her; the timid or irresolute decline to take her outstretched hand. The unlucky man is the man who forgets to strike when the iron is hot. The lucky man is the one who takes advantage of proffered fortune. Circumstances, it is to be confessed, throw more of such proffers in the way of one than another. But if one will follow the footprints of the lucky men of the world it will be found that at the points where they seized fortune at the flood there are tracks which show that there were many faltering and hesitating ones near by, any one of whom had within his reach the same opportunities as the fortunate one had.—Chicago Times.

The Doll Had It, Too.

There was a slight impediment in a little Boston girl's speech, and she had been "drilled" out of all patience by well intentioned teachers and friends. When she received a doll for a birthday present, she was delighted to find that by pulling out a green string a very passable "mamma" was produced. But the "papa" which followed the twitching of a white string was imperfect, and when the little mother discovered that her child had inherited her own infirmity, her heroic nature was shown. She lost no time in putting to account her own training, and pulling repeatedly on the white string, with an unfaltering hand, she said firmly: "Dolly, you must be trained till you learn to say that plainer."—Detroit Free Press.

For the Reading Room.

A motto suggested for the reading room of a popular library is: "Tolle, aperi, recita, ne lædas, claude, repone!" which, freely translated, means: "Take me down, open me, read me, don't injure me, shut me up, but put me back!"—Chicago Herald.

BLENDING OF RACES.

Olive Skins, Elegant Figures, and Straight Profiles.

PECULIAR TYPE OF PHYSICAL BEAUTY.

Vigorous, Graceful, and Healthy Specimens of Humanity.

Then you begin to look about you at the black, brown and yellow faces that are studying you curiously from beneath the yellow striped Madras turbans, or from under the shadow of mushroom shaped straw hats large as umbrellas. Watching the bare backs, bare shoulders, bare legs and arms and feet, you find that the colors of flesh are more varied and surprising than the colors of fruits. And it is only with fruit colors that many of these skin tints can be compared at all, the only terms of comparison used by the colored people themselves being terms of this kind, such as peau-sapotille, "sapota skin." The sapota or sapotille is a juicy brown fruit, with a rind satiny like a human cuticle, and just the color, when fresh and ripe, of a fine mulatto skin. But among the brighter half breeds I think the colors are much more fruit like; there are gourd tints, banana tints, orange colors, with occasional flushes of pink showing through, like the first pink of the mango. Agreeable to the eye the darker tints certainly are, and often very remarkable, all tones of bronze being represented; but the brighter hues are absolutely beautiful in certain half breed types, coolie and quadroon. Standing perfectly naked at doorways, or playing naked in the sun, astonishing children may be seen—banana colored and mango colored babies. But there is one peculiar type, totally unlike all the rest; the skin is an exquisite metallic yellow, a perfect gold tone; the eyes are long and black; the intensely dark and lustrous hair falls over the neck in a heavy mass of thick, rich, glossy curls that show blue lights in the sun.

I cannot speak of this comely and extraordinary type without translating a passage from Dr. J. J. J. Cornilliac, an eminent Martinique physician, who recently published a most valuable series upon the ethnology, climatology and history of the Antilles. In these he writes:

"When, among the populations of the Antilles, we first notice those remarkable metis whose olive skins, elegant and slender figures, fine straight profiles, and regular features remind us of the inhabitants of Madras or Pondicherry, we ask ourselves in wonder—while looking at their long eyes, full of a strange and gentle melancholy (especially among the women), and at the black, rich, silky gleaming hair curling in abundance over the temples and falling in profusion over the neck—to what human race can belong this singular variety, in which there is a dominant characteristic that seems indelible, and always shows more and more strongly in proportion as the type is further removed from the African element. It is the Carib blood, blended with blood of Europeans and of blacks, which in spite of all subsequent crossings, and in spite of the fact that it has not been renewed for more than two hundred years, still conserves, as remarkedly as at the time of the first interblending, the race characteristic that invariably reveals its presence in the blood of every being through whose veins it flows."

All this population is vigorous, graceful, healthy; all you see passing by are well made; there are no sickly faces, no scrawny limbs. If by some rare chance you encounter a person who has lost an arm or a leg, you can be almost certain you are looking at a victim of the fer de lance—the serpent whose venom putrefies living tissue. Without fear of exaggerating facts, I can venture to say that the muscular development of the working men here is something which must be seen in order to be believed; to study fine displays of it, one should watch the blacks and half-breeds working naked to the waist—on the landings, in the gas houses and slaughter houses, or on the nearest plantations. They are not large men, perhaps not extraordinarily powerful; but they have the aspect of sculptural or even of anatomical models; they seem absolutely devoid of adipose tissue; their muscles stand out with a saliency that astonishes the eye. It is marvelous. At a tanning yard, while I was watching a dozen blacks at work, a young mulatto, with the mischievous face of a faun, walked by, wearing nothing but a clout about his loins; and never, not even in bronze, did I see so beautiful a play of muscles. A demonstrator of anatomy could have used him for a class model; a sculptor, wishing to shape a fine Mercury in bronze, would be satisfied to take a cast of such a body, without thinking of making one modification from neck to heel.—Lafcadio Hearn in Harper's Magazine.

The Climate of St. Petersburg.

If it is May or June do not come to Russia without the heaviest winter clothing and the heaviest of winter wraps, even though you may have left England all ablaze with hawthorne blossoms, Holland carpeted with tulips and Berlin at summer heat. Remember that the Russian calendar is twelve days later than ours. Remember that St. Petersbug is on the shores of the Baltic sea. Remember also that you are on the direct route to the North pole. Already I have seen two hard snow storms, and our teeth have been on a continual chatter since reaching here. In the country (May 28) the peasants are just plowing and sowing for their summer crops, and in the city heavy overcoats and furs seem quite at home.

There is one thing, however, that strikes an American very agreeably as well as strangely, and that is the suddenly increased length of the days. Even now the sun does not set until about 9 o'clock and rises no one knows how early; and soon the longest days will have reached here when the sun is only nominally below the horizon from one-quarter past 10 till one-quarter before 2, but really the twilight is so bright that one can read with ease all night. No doubt this has much to do in maturing the harvest so rapidly in the few months of summer.—Cor. Detroit Free Press.

Dolls of Eastern Siberia.

Lieut. Hooper, writing of the people on the east coast of Siberia, says: "Few countries are there where dolls are not a great resource; the Tuski children have theirs; make and clothe them with the minutest attention to details; every article of dress is provided, and everything put on and off in the proper manner. The boys have miniature sledges, boats and bows and arrows; the girls their dolls, and also embroidery, which they early begin to practice as a pastime, and soon become expert in."—Youth's Companion.

WOMAN'S INTUITION.

Nearly Always Right in Her Judgment in Regard to Common Things.

An old gentleman over seventy, came into the city from his farm, without his overcoat. The day turned chilly and he was obliged to forego his visit to the fair.

To a friend who remonstrated with him for going away from home thus unprepared, he said: "I thought it was going to be warm; my wife told me to take my overcoat, but I wouldn't. Women have more sense than men anyway."

A frank admission.

Women's good sense is said to come from intuition; may it not be that they are more close observers of little things. One thing is certain, they are apt to strike the nail on the head, in all the ordinary problems of life, more frequently than the lords of creation.

"According to Dr. Alice Bennett, who recently read a paper on Bright's disease before the Pennsylvania State Medical Society, persons subject to bilious attacks and sick headaches, who have crawling sensations, like the flowing of water in the head, who are 'tired all the time' and have unexplained attacks of sudden weakness, may well be suspected of dangerous tendencies in the direction of Bright's disease."

The veteran newspaper correspondent, Joe Howard, of the New York Press, in noting this statement, suggests: "Possibly Alice is correct in her diagnosis, but why doesn't she give some idea of treatment? I know a man who has been 'tired all the time' for ten years. Night before last he took two doses of calomel and yesterday he wished he hadn't."

A proper answer is found in the following letter of Mrs. Davis, wife of Rev. William J. Davis, of Basil, O., June 21, 1890:

"I do not hesitate to say that I owe my life to Warner's Safe Cure. I had a constant hemorrhage from my kidneys for more than five months. The physicians could do nothing for me. My husband spent hundreds of dollars and I was not relieved. I was under the care of the most eminent medical men in the State. The hemorrhage ceased before I had taken one bottle of the Safe Cure. I can safely, and do cheerfully, recommend it to all who are sufferers of kidney troubles."

The plumber came down like a wolf on the fold,
And his pockets were bulging with silver and gold.
Nine hours and a half he made love to the cook,
And eighty-one dollars he charged on his book.

P. HINKLE'S PATENT CENTRIFUGAL ROLLER QUARTZ MILL

THIS cut shows the New Hinkle Centrifugal Quartz Mill, with plates and Slummer. This is the only mill made that needs no oil for the inside working parts, as it is thoroughly lubricated with water, supplied from a circular tank, which is connected to the roller spindles, slides and drips by rubber hose. By this means oil cannot interfere with perfect amalgamation. Other features of superiority are: Simplicity of construction; the free discharge of pulp; the wearing parts are easily replaced at a small cost. The small amount of power required to run the mill will recommend it to all practical mill men, as well as the small cost of erecting and transportation of mill to the mine. 5-foot mill weighs 9,000 lbs.; pulverizers 38 inches diam.; run, 80 to 90 rev. per minute, with a capacity of 20 tons per day. This size mill complete, $1,500. With Silver Plates, Slummer and Ore Feeder, $1,800.

Corner Fremont and Mission Streets, San Francisco, Cal.

P. HINKLE'S PATENT ORE FEEDER.

Positive Feed and Ready Adjustment.

IN this Improved Ore Feeder the falling tappet of the mill causes a backward movement of the feeding-tray. As the ore comes from the hopper on to the tray, a transverse bar prevents the ore moving backward, and a small portion of the ore is thus forced off the front edge of the feeding-tray into the battery. The amount of movement of the feeding tray may be regulated, thus regulating the feed of ore. This feeder can be arranged for roller mill or stamps. It is strong and durable, and feeds wet or dry ore in regular quantities.

Fines in Germany.

A curious system of fines obtains in Germany. People are fined for every curious little alleged offense. An estimable lady (very near and dear to me) went out for a walk in the old part of Hanover. Wandering about in the quaint, narrow streets she lost her way, and, being unable to speak German or to find a cab, she meandered wildly hither and thither until at last she found herself in a remote suburb quite in the country. Seeking to make a short cut back to the city she started across an open field, but was speedily overhauled by a native who implied by his tones and gestures that she was committing a grave offense.

To make a long and harrowing story short, this estimable lady was ultimately compelled to pay a fine of three marks for trespassing (most innocently) upon the private property of a suburban farmer. If it were not, however, for the severity of the trespass law farms, orchards and meadows would be ruthlessly overrun, for fences are what the book sellers would call "excessively rare."

Boys are fined for playing games in the streets; to throw a snowball at any person or any thing costs three marks. Whistling upon the streets is a finable offense; so is dropping nutshells or fruit peelings upon the pavement. If your neighbor keeps poultry and the cackling disturbs you a complaint to the police results in the immediate abatement of the nuisance. When the young woman of the family practices upon the piano the windows of the room must be closed in order that the neighborhood shall not be pestered.

Having had three boys at school in Germany not only am I pretty well informed as to the number of finable offenses, but I have a pretty positive theory as to how the German empire is enabled to bear the cost of so large a standing army. The regular fine is three marks; for this sum the average American boy can commit any one of those characteristic actions or carelessnesses which in his native land are considered the natural prerogatives of masculine youth. When one says that Germany is the cheapest place in the world in which to educate a boy either he does not take the American boys into consideration or he does not include the inevitable fines in his estimate.—Eugene Field in Chicago News.

Puzzled Cigarette Dealers.

Hereafter sellers of cigarettes in Maryland must pay an extra license of $50 yearly and make oath that the cigarettes which they sell contain no "injurious drugs." Their situation is not a pleasant one, for it is impossible for them to know what a cigarette contains, and the phrase "injurious drugs" is capable of very varied interpretation. For that matter tobacco is classed by many as an "injurious drug," and there is ample expert evidence to sustain their position. But this is a minor point.—Boston Post.

A Great Chimney.

The great chimney recently built at Fall River, Mass., which is 340 feet in height, will be far surpassed by one now under construction at the imperial foundry at Halsbrucke, near Freiburg, in Saxony, which is intended to carry the noxious gases from the furnaces to such a height as to prevent any inconvenience to the surrounding country. It will be 453 feet high, with an interior diameter of 15¾ feet. The chimney is built entirely of brick.—New York Commercial Advertiser.

Enriched by the Kick of a Mule.

In the case of Johnson against the George Hammond Packing company, a suit for $10,000 damages, alleged to have been received by the plaintiff by kicks from a runaway mule owned by defendants, the jury rendered a verdict awarding the plaintiff damages in the sum of $4,750.—Omaha Republican.

Watermelon Molasses.

A negro farmer in Dougherty county, Ga., has succeeded in making excellent syrup from watermelons, and thus a new use is devised for the surplus crop.—Chicago Herald.

There is a respect due to mankind which should incline even the wisest of men to follow innocent customs.—Dr. I. Watts.

English and American Women.

English and American girls bear off the palm among the nations of the world. There is, however, a difference between their respective qualities of beauty. I have elsewhere sufficiently portrayed the sweet and coy beauty of our American girls not to tell them the whole truth on this occasion. The English girl is thoroughly active in her pursuit of healthy exercise; she walks, and runs, and plays lawn tennis a great deal; riding, if she have the means, is one of her most favorite amusements; while boating and tricycling is eagerly sought whenever opportunity occurs. Our American "rosebuds," on the contrary, have a very trying climate to contend with; they take too little exercise and too much iced water.

The result is that English girls are able to bring a more roseate bloom to their cheeks, to walk longer distances and to stand much more fatigue; they are, in fact, more robust and have better developed figures; and although there are, no doubt, in New York, or in any other large city of the United States, a dozen women as perfectly beautiful in form and face as any chisseled by the greatest artists, our American girls are in the main less bright in color, more delicate and pale than would otherwise be the case if they more steadfastly resorted to the invigorating means of health, outdoor exercise, long since adopted by their English sisters, and to which, doubtless, the latter owe their exquisite forms and also the fact that they remain youthful in appearance much longer than our compatriots; in fact, an English woman of 40 looks younger than an American woman of 30 years; of course I do not now refer to women of the working class.—Frank Leslie.

A Cyclone Relic on a Car Truck.

Station Master Raser discovered a curious paper in a truck of a sleeping car on the limited train from the west. He picked it out and found that it was a bond and mortgage payable by the Western Farm Mortgage Trust company, of Lawrence, Kan. The principal is $400. Attached to the mortgage are twelve coupons for the interest, payable at the Bank of the Republic at Boston. The series is 20, and the number 156. It is duly signed and sealed, and signed by the president and secretary. The first interest coupon is payable Aug. 1, 1890. It probably is a souvenir of the great storm in the west, and was blown into the truck by the wind.—Utica Observer.

A Russian Law Suit.

The courts at Tiflis, Russia, have before them the suit of a man to recover from a professional assassin the sum of $165. The man hired the assassin for $75 down to kill an enemy, and promised $75 more when he should receive proof of the death in the shape of the enemy's ear. The assassin brought around an ear and received the $75, with $15 added for a tip. A few days later the man met his enemy, alive and entirely whole as to his ears, upon the street. An investigation showed that the assassin had also received $100 from the enemy as a reward for having betrayed the plot to him.—Philadelphia Ledger.

Russia's New Railway Route.

The Siberian Pacific railroad has not yet been commenced, and already a new Siberian railway is projected. It will be called after the river Obi. Its connection with the bed of that stream and with a suitable port to the west of Walgatz island will open a double new road to Siberia by land and by water. It is proposed to "circumvent" the mouth of the river Obi, the peninsula of Yalmal, and the Kara sea, which are difficult of access, owing to the masses of drifting ice. The new route will only be 400 versts long, taking a northwesterly direction from the mouth of the river Obi to the Walgatz sea, in a bay of which a harbor is to be built. The site chosen for this harbor is sheltered from the wind by the Pae-Choi mountains.

The country being level and well studded with forests, the construction of the line will offer little difficulty. The entire cost, including the harbor, is estimated at 20,000,000 rubles. Under existing conditions the transport of merchandise to Barnaul, via Tiumen, Perm and St. Petersburg to London takes three months, whereas by the new line two months will be saved. Western Siberia produces annually 30,000,000 Russian poods of wheat. The opening of the Obi line will materially increase commercial intercourse with the west, and be the means of supplying the European market with wheat at a considerably lower price than that produced at home.—Paris Cor. London Telegraph.

Of the twenty-three presidents we have had, Jefferson, Madison, Jackson and Lincoln are the only ones whose names stand for state capitals, and Montgomery is the only other historic American so remembered.

FREEZING TO DEATH.

A Night's Experience in the Lumber Regions.

THE PECULIAR SENSATION OF DYING.

Easy to Die but Agonizing to be Resusitated.

"In February, 1840," said Capt. R. L. Zeby, of Uniontown, "I had an interest in some lumber way up in the Piscataquis region, and I had to go up there and see how things were getting along. It was a long journey, but the sleighing was like glass, and I had one of the best horses that ever stood inside the thills. On my second day out the thermometer stood at 20 degs. below, and was inclined to go lower. I knew I would reach one of those queer little villages common to the Maine backwoods early in the evening. There I intended to stay all night, and drive on next morning to the house of the agent of the lumber property, twelve miles further along. I reached the village and found that there was no tavern there.

"This, of course, upset my plans. So I ate supper in the village and started on, intending to proceed to the agent's the same night. It was a starlight night, but the air was filled with that peculiar frozen mist frequently noticeable on very cold nights. As we neared the river this haze became denser, until finally it was with difficulty I could see anything ahead of me. It was like passing through a storm of scaly ice. Suddenly, as I was thinking that we must be almost on the margin of the river, there came a crackling sound, a loud splash of water, and the next second my horse was floundering about in water, which also covered the sleigh, the robes and myself up to my waist.

"The water splashed about soon drenched the rest of me, and in less time than I can tell it I was coated with a rapidly thickening armor of ice. I guess my noble beast must have floundered at least a minute in that hole before he knew exactly what had happened. When the situation did come to him he became quiet, threw his fore feet up, and lodged them both in the ice with a concerted blow like a trip hammer. The ice was thick, but beneath that blow an immense cake was broken off and was carried down in under the edge of the ice below. The horse swam onward, dragging the sleigh with it through the rapidly freezing slush. Once more he pounded the ice ahead of him with his powerful fore feet, and again the ice yielded.

"During all this time I was shouting for help. I might, at the first break, have turned and leaped back to shore, but had not collected myself in time. It was now too late, and even if it had not been I was so stiffened by the casing of ice that I couldn't have moved to save myself from death. The horse kept on, and, strange as the story seems, broke a channel for fifty feet across that river, and drew the sleigh out safely on the other side. And he didn't tarry when he got there, but started off at the top of his speed toward our destination. He soon struck the road and away we went. I knew that although one danger was escaped, a greater was before us, and I urged the horse on with my voice. My robes and clothing had frozen so solid that if I had been encased in iron I could not have been more motionless. My horse was a jet black, but his icy coating made him stand out, even in that frozen mist, like a specter horse. I could not move even my hands. We were not yet half way to the agent's house when I found myself growing drowsy. I could no longer use my voice. The clatter of the horses' hoofs and the creaking of the runners on the ice sounded to me like thunder claps and weird, hideous cries. I knew that I was freezing, but I labored hard to rouse my will and fight with it against my fate. The stars looked like great coals of fire, although before they could be seen but dimly through the peculiar haze. The trees, with their branches covered with snow, took on the shapes of gigantic ghosts. Still I preserved all my powers of reasoning. Finally I felt myself growing deliciously warm. A languor, such as De Quincy might have described, with attending visions of loveliness, took possession of me. I heard the most delightful music. Still I made one mental effort to shake off this fatal spell, and that was all.

"I don't know how far I was from the agent's house when I froze to death, but the next thing I remembered I was suffering such tortures as a victim of the rack might feel. He never felt worse. Suddenly, at my feet, the pricking of a million needles assaulted my flesh. Torturing me at that spot a moment, until I writhed in agony, it dashed quickly up my leg, stopped an instant, as if gloating in my misery, and then crawled with that awful pain slowly upward, until it seemed that tiny jets of the fiercest flame were being blown into my body, heart and brain. The intensity of this agony was not constant. If it had been I would have died again in a short time. It came in waves, so to speak. Each wave was a little less furious than its predecessor, until at last the storm was passed, and I found myself a weak, speechless, limp and helpless mortal, lying on a robe before the fireplace of my friend, the agent. He had brought me back to life.

"When I was strong enough to hear it, he told me that he was awakened in the night by the peculiar and loud neighing of a horse. He looked out of the window and saw a sight that startled him—a ghostly horse and sleigh and driver in the road before his door. He recovered himself and went down. Then he discovered that the driver was dead. He quickly carried the driver into the house, laid him on the floor before the fireplace, and recognized me. Knowing that even if I was not beyond all aid, nothing could be done for me until the robe and clothing were thawed, he made the fire blaze and hurried to the rescue of the faithful and intelligent horse that had reasoned with itself that it must stop at the first house it came to on that terrible night, and that life and death depended on it. By the time the horse was cared for I was in shape to be resuscitated in case any such thing could be done. I was stripped and rubbed briskly with snow and snow water for more than an hour before I gave any evidence that I might be called back. Then another hour was spent in the same treatment, when a spoonful of brandy was poured down my throat. After that the circulation was started, and my agony began. That suffering lasted for an hour, and—well, I can say this: Freeze to death if you want. You'll like it. But don't let anybody fetch you to again."—New York Sun.

The Aztecs of Cortez's Time.

The Aztecs of the time of Cortez were in many respects a superior people. They cultivated the ground. They had a king and a form of government, laws, courts, and tribunals, immense and costly public buildings. Their king and the chieftains lived in all the glittering splendor of eastern monarchs. Their wealth in gold when the Spaniards first entered the country was almost fabulous. Their dresses were made dazzling with wrought gold and beautifully colored feather work and plumage of birds. They were worshipers of the sun, and their practices of superstition were most cruel and horrible. Every city of note contained a Teocallis, or tower of sacrifice. The towers at Cholula and Tenochitlan each covered nearly an acre of ground, and were several stories in height. On these towers the sacred fire was ever kept burning. On an open battlement or unenclosed area on the top of each tower, in plain view of the whole city round about, stood the idols or gods, and also the sacrificial stone. Scores of priests and executioners at certain seasons of the year assembled on this open area, and the broad, winding outside stairways were crowded with thousands of human victims awaiting their turn.

These enormous sacrifices made it necessary for the Aztecs to remain at perpetual war with neighboring tribes, as the prisoners taken in battle supplied the victims, and when they fell short of what was needed for sacrifice, the number lacking had to be drawn from their own ranks. The manner of sacrifice was so horrible that war was hailed with a sense of relief and joy by every Aztec. Torture of victims was not practiced by them, except as a sacred duty. They did not have their war dances and gloat over sufferings at the stake as do the roving tribes of our own day.—New York Post.

Fresh Eggs the Year Round.

"A new process of preserving eggs has been discovered," said a grocer to a reporter, "and it is going to have an important effect on the trade."

The speaker then opened an egg that looked fresh without and within, and explained that it had been laid months before and subjected to the new treatment invented by a resident of Copenhagen. The process consists in subjecting the eggs to a carbonic acid bath. They are kept in a hermetically sealed tank that is filled with carbonic acid, and not taken out until they are to be placed on the market. The eggs subjected to this treatment show a sharply defined yolk and an unchanged white. Eggs preserved by a coating of lime do not maintain this condition. Carbonic acid tanks can be made especially for shipment and eggs thus preserved can be sent on long voyages.—New York Mail and Express.

A Plagiarist in the Pulpit.

Imagine a popular preacher in a London pulpit, with a grave old gentleman sitting at the foot of it, waiting as it were, with a landing net for plagiarisms, and informing the congregation whenever he caught one. "That is Shylock's," he said at the third sentence; at the seventh, "That is Tillotson's." The preacher, who knew that there were plenty more to come, was in a pretty state; if he did it again he made up his mind to speak to the man. "That is Blair's," came out at the tenth sentence. "Fellow," said the preacher, leaning over the pulpit, "if you interrupt again you shall be turned out." The old gentleman looked round on the congregation with the same calm confidence of recognition as before, and, without moving a muscle of his countenance, observed, "That's his own."—The Argonaut.

English and American Divorce.

American women who marry English husbands will have much difficulty in dissolving their union if the conditions are unhappy, by a new divorce decision of an English court, which establishes the point that if an American woman married to an English husband wishes to obtain a valid divorce, she must sue in the English courts, or she cannot get it, the domicile of her husband being the controlling fact in the eye of the law. The daughter of an American consul, who obtained a divorce in a Colorado court from her husband, who declined to appear, has recently lost the custody of her child, and been divorced from her husband by the English court.—Boston Budget.

The North Magnetic Pole.

Future explorations will be purely expeditions of scientific research. One of the first and most important things to be done is the determining of the north magnetic pole. This is not identical with the pole proper, but is the point where the ordinary needle refuses to act and the dip needle stands perpendicular. This pole has been approximately located twice—in 1831 by Ross, and in 1879 by me. Ross located it in Boothia, on Cape Adelaide, and was made Sir John for doing so. I found it roughly about twenty miles northwest of Cape Felix. In this age of electricity the locating of this pole is a matter of intense interest to the scientific world.—Lieut. Schwatka.

Sunshine and Good Health.

After thirty years of traveling in all climates of the earth, we are satisfied that sunlight is one of the most important factors of life, and indispensable to vigorous health. Shade tends to weaken the skin, and acts deleteriously on the nerves and liver. We always, therefore, wherever we sojourn select a room on the sunny side of the house, making little account of the outlook in other respects. The finest prospect toward the north is not for a moment to weigh against the rays of the cheering, life giving orb of day. We recommend this practice to our readers.—Dr. Joseph Simms.

Follows as a Matter of Course.

A novel shortly to be published will bear the title, "Shut the Gate." It must be a sequel to "The Dog Is Loose."—Rochester Post-Express.

THE GIANT BANYON.

Big Tree of Calcutta's Botanical Garden.

THE GIRTH OF ITS TRUNK IS 45 FEET.

Circumference of its Crown About 850 Feet.

But the great "sight" of Calcutta is unquestionably its splendid Botanical garden, on the further shore of the Hooghly, and the giant banyan tree which stands in the midst of its palms and bamboos like a king amid his courtiers. It is true that the five mile drive thither across the Canning bridge and through the endless bazars of Howrah (the Brooklyn of Calcutta) is anything but an easy enterprise to achieve satisfactorily. If you start in the morning the whole journey there and back is one long martyrdom to a heat and dust and glare which only those who have been in India can fully appreciate. If you start in the evening you arrive just in time to see the whole garden vanish from your eyes into the deepening darkness of night, and have to console yourself perforce with the time honored joke, "There was nothing to be seen, and I saw it thoroughly." The latter result attended the first effort which we ourselves made to reach the renowned banyan, and the bazar happening to be unusually full that night, our homeward drive through it in the dark, with an accompaniment of shouting and whip cracking worthy of a royal "progress," vividly recalled Sir George Trevelyan's famous definition of "hi!" as "a monosyllable used by cabmen and omnibus drivers preparatory to running over deaf people."

But such a spectacle as the monster tree of Calcutta is well worth a double journey, and our second attempt was more fortunate than our first. Starting from our hotel at 4 p. m., we reached the garden a little before 5, and had already driven more than half way across it when our "gharri" (carriage) halted suddenly at the entrance of a long, straight avenue flanked by two ranges of lofty trees, and our Bengal driver, pointing to the far end of it with his lean, brown forefinger, said impressively, "Dekho, burrah gach wahan hai" (look, there is the big tree).

We followed the pointing finger with our eyes, but saw nothing except a thick grove of small trees, in which the path seemed to lose itself, and this was all we could make out till we got within about 100 yards of it. Then, to our amazement, we found that the supposed grove was all one giant tree, and that its countless trunks were nothing more than the shoots which it had sent down into the earth from each of its mighty boughs, to take root there and spring up again till the whole plantation was covered. After walking many yards beneath one huge bough, and noting that this giant was only one among scores—some of which, although so vast and ponderous as to need supports of solid brickwork, seem mere twigs compared with the enormous mass of the parent stem—I began to have a clearer idea of the real size of this vegetable Goliath than I could ever have gained from the inscription attached to one of its largest branches stating that the girth of its trunk is 42 feet, that the circumference of its crown is 850, and that it has sent down into the earth 252 "aerial roots."

The same inscription tells you that the tree is more than 100 years old. When it was first planted Warren Hastings was turning his face homeward to figure in the greatest political trial which England had seen since Cromwell and his grim comrades sat in judgment upon "the man Charles Stuart." Two-thirds of India and the whole of Burmah were still independent of the British crown. Frederick the Great was still reigning in Berlin. The French revolution lay hid in the unknown future, and the battle of American independence, though nobly fought, was not yet won. And it may be that when not one stone of Calcutta shall remain upon another, and when tigers shall prowl and vultures shriek over the ruins of the viceroy's palace, the giant tree will still uprear amid a vast solitude those mighty boughs that once shaded the bravest men and fairest women of India, a silent and solitary mourner at the tomb of that great empire whose childhood was coeval with its own.—David Ker in New Times.

Danger in Sea Bathing.

Sea bathing is a common, but often unsuspected, source of injury to the sense of hearing. People should always be careful how they wash their ears at home. In this operation, simple though it may appear, and harmless as it is in other respects, a portion of the fluid—small it may be—passes into the outer passage of the ear and becomes lodged there, as it is a difficult matter to dry this passage, especially in the inner half of its extent. The water which thus remains is gradually removed by evaporation and absorption, and a chilled condition of the passage results, highly conducive to inflammation of the part, and subsequent impairment of the organ of hearing. To obviate this danger stop the ears with oiled wool.

Bathing in the sea is dangerous in other ways for old people, for very young children (especially before the first dentition has been completed), for persons of full habit of body, for those whose circulation is weak or irregular or who are suffering from heart disease, chronic chest affections, disorders of the brain or nervous system, or local accumulations of blood, such as hemorrhage from the nose, lungs, etc.—Home Journal.

An experienced and highly respected physician gave me a valuable hint the other day which others may find as useful as I did. "I am convinced," said he, "not only from practical personal experience, but on theoretically scientific grounds also, that a safeguard against much prevalent summer illness lies in the free use of lemon juice. Citric acid helps to supply the place of the fluids which are unduly dissipated through the pores of the skin in hot weather. Eat plenty of lemons and you can stand the heat infinitely better than those who do not make use of the fruit with which nature has supplied tropical countries."—The Epoch.

He Offended the Empress.

The Veritzins were boyars of enormous wealth and power. Paul held a high office in court. One night, glittering with jewels and orders, the young prince, who was one of the handsomest men in Russia, danced in a quadrille opposite the empress.

As she passed him in the dance she fancied that his eyes scanned her gross figure with covert amusement. After the quadrille she beckoned to him, and, with a smile, handed him her tiny ivory tablets, containing seven pages, one for each day in the week. On the first was written: "The imperial ball room, St. Petersburg." On the last: "The mines, Siberia."

He read it, his face grew gray as that of a corpse, bowed low, kissed her hand and withdrew, "taking," says the old chronicle, "his wife, the beautiful Princess of Novgorod, with him. He was heard to say as he left the ball room: 'My minutes are numbered; let us not lose one.'"

Flight or resistance was impossible. The hold of Catharine on her victims was inexorable as death. Prince Veritzin was forced to remain passive in his palace, while each day the power, the wealth and the happiness that life had given him were stripped from him.

First, he was degraded from all his offices at court; next, his estates were confiscated by the crown; his friends were forbidden to hold any communication with him; his very name, one of the noblest in Russia, was taken from him, and he was given that of a serf. Then his wife and children were driven out of the palace to herd with beggars.

"On the last day," says the record, "Paul Veritzin, in rags and barefoot, chained to a convict, bade an eternal farewell to his home and departed to the dark and icy north. He was seen of men no more."—"Life of Prince Paul Veritzin."

The Explorer in Africa.

Now, it may be a surprise to the unenlightened to learn that probably no explorer in forcing his passage through Africa has ever, for more than a few days at a time, been off some beaten track. Probably no country in the world, civilized or uncivilized, is better supplied with paths than this unmapped country. Every village is connected with some other village, every tribe with the next tribe, every state with its neighbor, and, therefore, with all the rest. The explorer's business is simply to select from this network of tracks, keep a general direction and hold on his way. Let him begin at Zanzibar, plant his foot on a native footpath, and set his face toward Tanganyika. In eight months he will be there. He has simply to persevere.

From village to village he will be handed on, zigzagging it may be sometimes, to avoid the impassable barriers of nature, or the rarer perils of hostile tribes, but never taking to the woods, never guided solely by the stars, never, in fact, leaving a beaten track till hundreds and hundreds of miles are between him and the sea, and his interminable footpath ends with a canoe on the shores of Tanganyika. Crossing the lake, landing near some native village, he picks up the thread once more. Again he plods on and on, now on foot, now by canoe, but always keeping his line of villages, until one day suddenly he sniffs the sea breeze again, and his faithful foot wide guide lands him on the Atlantic seaboard.—Tropical Africa.

Methods of Reducing Flesh.

We Americans used to have the reputation of being a thin and wiry people, but among women, at least, one hears just now more queries as to methods of taking off flesh than of putting it on. The number of specialists, mostly women, who treat women for superfluous avoirdupois is growing all the time. They never seem to lack patients, and one or two drive expensive turnouts and import dreams of gowns. Each establishment has its own method of restoring shape and comeliness, but they agree in this one particular, treatment is paid for by the month and the reduction process is timed to your wishes—you may take it fast or you may take it slow.

If you are a person of leisure and can devote yourself to your figure, you are trained down in three months, though you may find it a difficult matter to summon strength to walk three blocks when the business is fairly under way. If you can't afford to weaken yourself in such fashion, the period is doubled, and in six months or eight months after less violent measures you may order a gown of the waist measure you please, without, so they say, suffering inconvenience meanwhile. It is a more difficult matter, however, to control wrinkles, which nearly always follow any successful attempt to make a fleshy woman thin.—Chicago Herald.

Wreckers of the Bahamas.

The Bahamas are said to have been settled as early as 1629, and their population is estimated to be about 40,000 souls. But they are a listless, indolent lot, to whom simple existence is the highest aspiration. For the most part the language is a curious mixture of the English, Spanish and negro tongues. Sponge gathering, fishing, conch gathering, fruit picking and wrecking constitute about all the labor done. The islands swarm with these wreckers, nearly all good natured souls, who regard everything cast upon the shores, every vessel that grounds upon the dangerous wrecks and cays, and every craft that can even be lured upon the rocks, as their rightful gain, and receive all such ocean salvage as if the blessing of Heaven accompanied it; though for that matter our own government permits quite as bad a state of things at Key West and along the Pine islands off the coast of Florida.—Edgar L. Wakeman in St. Louis Republic.

A Sixteenth Century Map.

In the National library at Paris there is a Spanish globe 350 years old, on which the Congo follows in a remarkable manner the course now given to that river on the maps. All the best maps in the Sixteenth century showed the Congo as rising in the lake far inland, while in this century we first tried to identify the Congo with the Niger, and then for many years made it flow north.—Chicago Herald.

A New York lawyer propounded a hypothetical question of 872 words.

THE TEREDO NAVALIS.

Its Peculiar Mode of Attacking Timber.

IT TAKES ITS FOOD THROUGH ITS FEET.

It's Remarkable Ravages in Riddling Timber.

Just at high water mark and extending a foot below it, I saw the stanchest timbers wasted away until I could have spanned their circumference with my hand. The constant friction of the waves alone could not have done this. It was the work of that dread enemy of wharf owners and ship masters, the teredo navalis. Now, I could account for the sinking in of the floor of the dock in many places. The worm would attack a pile and, with his numberless comrades, eat and eat away the wood until it was absolutely honeycombed. The waves would then complete the work. The point of attack chosen by these bivalvular pests, in a pile, is from about fifteen inches below up to high water mark. This generally breaks the timber at about midway between the wharf and the surface of the earth.

Imagine a stout pine trunk, of a diameter of a foot and a half, completely filled with long, tortuous channels varying from one-quarter to three-quarters of an inch, and running from outer edge to outer edge. Now, as thin as is this sheet upon which I write these lines, as thin as the transparent division against which the golden honey rests in the waxen comb, so thin are the walls between each of the fatal channels which mark the passage and progress of the worm through the doomed timber. As singular as it may seem, they never break through, they never disturb each other or trespass upon each other's territory. There may be a thousand of them in a single pile, but no instance has yet been found in which one of these passageways intersected another or trenched upon another's right of way. They may all be boring at once—some up, some down, some laterally, some obliquely—and they may make their division walls as thin as it pleases them, but there is never an infraction of this law, of absolute inviolability of each individual's right of way. It will easily be apprehended, therefore, how quickly a timber thus riddled will be worn away by the constant attrition of the tides, until it finally breaks, and brings with it in its fall the beam above, of which it was the support.

A study of the history and habits of this singular worm will be found neither uninteresting nor unprofitable. Its habitat was originally in the tropic seas, but being carried in the timbers of vessels into North American and European waters, it has become the terror and dread of wharfmen and captains of unsheathed sailing craft along the Atlantic and Pacific coasts and in the harbors of numbers of Mediterranean cities. According to the classification of Linnæus, this bivalve belongs to the family of pholadidæ, and genus teredo, so called from their habit of destroying ship or other timber. The shell is equal valved, and in form it is short, thick and round and widely open in front and rear. This shell is situated at the inner end of a tube, somewhat cylindrical in shape, and either straight or crooked, as the case may be; this tube being open at each end in the full grown specimens, and lined or coated with a white, chalky paste or substance, which seems to be its digestive apparatus.

The weapon of the teredo is not teeth, as might be supposed. This singular animal has still another peculiarity, dependent, however, upon the one last mentioned, for since its instrument is its foot, so it feeds itself not from the mouth, but from the foot itself. The valves above noted are simply appendages of the foot. In fact, if a teredo should have his foot amputated he would in a most vital sense "lose his grip." In the center of the circular opening of the valves the foot is protruded, like the blade concealed in a spring cane, and the entire arrangement constitutes a boring machine of power inconceivable in so small an object. But the strength of this machine becomes apparent when upon a closer examination one notes the strong rubber like ridges of the valves, which can contract with great force, and the comparatively immense size of the great abductor muscle which enables the teredo to use its sharp foot with the ease of an auger passing through the softest pine.

This worm attains often a great length, but it is usually from one foot to a yard long, its size depending on the length of time it has been in the wood and frequently on the size of the wood itself. It is provided with two respiratory tubes, each of which has a siphon attached to a calcareous, flattened, triangular plate on the outside of the body. It has two heads—if such they can be called—each attached to the extremity of a tube much smaller than the main trunk, and which are each (the small tubes) about six inches long; or, in other words, the main body splits into two small tubes at about a foot or six inches from where the head is in a teredo, and where the tail would be in a snake. This worm is oviparious, and when the young are born (with a smooth shell) they swim around by means of a vibratile cilia; sometimes creeping with the foot until old enough to begin work on a piece of wood. A good, nice, new pile having been selected, they fasten themselves to the wood by means of the suction apparatus in their heads, strike in with their foot and bore inwardly until only the head remains outside. Then they fasten themselves to the opening, flush with its very edge, just as a clerk will fasten sheets of paper together by turning over the sides of a brass clamp, and henceforward their sole aim, object and ambition in life is to grow, bore and make sawdust. Small when they enter, they could no more creep backward out of their original hole after feasting a month or two on a rich pine log than a camel could go through the eye of a needle.—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

A Philadelphia firm advertises "a nice porous plaster for 10 cents." And yet there are some persons in that city who are complaining of hard times! It doesn't seem reasonable.—Norristown Herald.

The Garnering Time.

Fair is the world now autumn's wearing,
And the sluggard sun lies long abed;
Sweet are the days now winter's nearing,
And all winds feign that the wind is dead.

Dumb is the hedge where the crabs hang yellow,
Bright as the blossoms of the spring;
Dumb is the close where the pears grow mellow,
And none but the dauntless redbreasts sing.

Fair was the spring, but amidst his greening
Gray were the days of the hidden sun;
Fair was the summer, but overweening,
So soon his o'ersweet days were done.

Come then, love, for peace is upon us,
Far off is falling, and far is fear;
Here where the rest in the end hath won us,
In the garnering tide of the happy year.

Come from the gray old house by the water,
Where far from the lips of the hungry sea
Green groweth the grass o'er the field of the slaughter,
And all is a tale for thee and me.

—William Morris in English Illustrated Magazine.

Got the Names Mixed.

There must be something in a name, after all. The grand jury reported a number of "true bills" against certain law breakers, and also reported that they could not find sufficient evidence on which to hold a number of alleged law breakers. Among the former was a colored gent named Jackson, against whom an indictment was found for carving a colored brother with a razor, and among the latter was a white man of the same name.

When the sheriff was ordered to produce his prisoners in court yesterday he was handed a list of the names of the men wanted. The first batch brought over were those against whom "no bill" was reported. When the names were called at the jail the white Jackson did not answer to his name, but in his place the colored party stepped up. He of the white face thought it policy to "lay low," so he said nothing.

When the names were called in court and the prisoners were ordered to stand up the colored man answered promptly to the white man's name, and he was duly discharged by Judge Seaver. Mr. Jackson returned to the jail for something, and the jailer, happening to know that Jackson had been indicted, thought there was some mistake and locked him up. He was rearraigned later and pleaded guilty. The white Jackson was finally released.—Buffalo Commercial.

Let Your New House Dry Out.

Many houses were built during the summer, and now people are hurrying into them, not stopping to think that there is too great haste in occupying a house after its completion. In many places there is such demand for dwellings, and often business apartments, that, as soon as finished, they are occupied. This is especially true of small dwellings. There is more danger in this than is supposed. There is no health in dampness and mold under any circumstances, and in living apartments, where the tendency is toward poor ventilation, the dampness of newly finished houses contributes largely to ill health.

In the town of Basle, Switzerland, a regulation has been adopted which prevents newly built houses from being occupied until four months after completion. Under many circumstances so long a time as above specified is not necessary, but it is often well to err on the side of safety. The size of the house, its location, surroundings, the material used and the state of the weather enter into the consideration of the time necessary in which a building should become sufficiently dry for occupancy.—New York Journal.

A Siberian Exile's Story.

An escaped Siberian exile, who has been in England for some time under the name of Felix Brant, is now made known by the new paper called Free Russia as Felix Volkhovsky. The reason for his retention of an assumed name for some time after his safe arrival on free soil helps one to realize the terrible anxieties of the unfortunate men who offend the Russian government. He was afraid that his child might be seized by that government, and that they would punish him for his escape through his daughter.

She is now safe in London, and the anxieties of the parent on her account are at an end. He endured seven years of solitary confinement in a Russian fortress, and eleven years' exile in Siberia for political opinions in which we are told terrorism had no part. Eluding the vigilance of the Siberian authorities, he made his way right across Siberia to the Pacific and so to Canada.—London News.

Chautauqua Has Some Apples.

Some western apple dealers arrived in this city Tuesday, and will make a tour of the county for the purpose of buying apples for western markets. Contrary to earlier expectations, the apple crop in Chautauqua county was a fair crop. There will not only be enough to supply the local market, but some for shipping as well. A peculiarity is that one orchard will yield fairly well while a neighboring one will be barren. One farmer said, "Last year, which was a better one for apples than this, I did not have an apple for sale, while this year I will have nearly a hundred bushels."—Jamestown Journal.

Mr. McMeans, of Santa Rosa, Cal., owns a horse that deserves a gold medal. One day last week the animal escaped from the barn yard and made its way to the orchard. Here he proceeded to eat apples from the nearest tree, and after it had eaten all within its reach the beast turned around and kicked the tree repeatedly, bringing down a shower of the luscious fruit.

A man died in St. Paul the other day leaving a fortune of $4,000,000. The will directed its division among his wife and children, except one wayward son, who is $50,000 in debt. The beneficiaries destroyed the will, allowing the young man to receive his share of the property.

A mushroom described by a leading physician of Portland, Ore., as having sprung up in a single night near his doorstep measured 24 inches in circumference and weighed 1½ pounds.

ORDINANCE No. 31.

THE BOARD OF SUPERVISORS OF THE County of Inyo, State of California, do ordain as follows:

SECTION 1. The regular meetings of the Board of Supervisors of Inyo County, State of California, must and shall be held at the Town of Independence, in the County and State aforesaid, being the County Seat of said Board on the first Monday of January, April, July and October of each year, and must continue from time to time until all the business before the said Board is disposed of. Such other meetings must be held as are otherwise provided by law.

SECTION 2. This ordinance shall take effect and be in force on and after fifteen (15) days from its passage, and Ordinances No. 2 and 21 of said Board of Supervisors together with all ordinances or parts of ordinances in conflict herewith, and each and all of them are hereby repealed.

SECTION 3. This ordinance shall be published in the INYO INDEPENDENT, a newspaper published in said Inyo County, at least two weeks, said publication to be made for said time and before the expiration of said fifteen days.

This ordinance was passed by the Board of Supervisors of said Inyo County, State aforesaid, at a Special Session of said Board, held on December 10th, 1890, by the following vote: AYES—J. D. Harger, J. J. Stewart and Seth G. Sneden.

SETH G. SNEDEN,
Chairman pro tem. of the Board of Supervisors of Inyo County, State of California.

Attest: P. H. MACK,
SEAL Clerk of said Board of Supervisors.

Proposals for Care of Indigent Sick of Inyo County.

Notice is hereby given that sealed proposals will be received by the Board of Supervisors of Inyo county, at the office of the County Clerk until 10 o'clock A.M. on Wednesday, Jan. 7, 1891, to contract for the care of said indigent sick for the term of one year from May 10th 1891 to May 10th, 1892, said bids to designate the amount for which parties contracting will care for said indigent sick on the basis of an average of four patients per day throughout the year, and to include all medicine, nursing, board, lodging and washing. Said bids to include the burial and funeral expenses of any indigent sick person or persons who may die while under such care.

Said contractor to care for all the indigent sick properly admitted to the contractor's care. And said bids to designate the price per head at which all excess of patients over the average of four each day throughout the year will be cared for, said excess to be paid for by extra allowance on presentation of bills duly sworn to, at the regular meeting of said Board immediately after said contract has expired. The average four per day to be paid for at the regular meetings of the Board on presentation of bills duly verified. All payments to be made by warrants drawn upon the Hospital Fund of said county.

The person or persons to whom said contract shall be awarded shall give a good and sufficient bond in double the sum of the contract price, for the faithful performance of said contract.

The care and management of said indigent sick by such contractor shall be at all times subject to the inspection of said Board of Supervisors, or any member thereof, or any person appointed by the Board for such purpose.

Said proposals must be endorsed, "Proposals for Care of Indigent Sick," and the same will be opened between the hours of ten o'clock and twelve o'clock A. M., on the 7th day of Jan. 1891, and the Board reserves the right to reject any and all bids. P. H. MACK, Clerk.

—The INDEPENDENT tenders the contracting parties its heartiest congratulations, with wishes of many a "Merry Christmas"

Don't forget the inaugural ball New Years.

The Inyoites are expected back from Bakersfield to-morrow.

Ben. Lasky went to San Francisco last Saturday for a short visit.

Walter A. Lamar started for San Jose on the 18th to remain for the holidays.

A lot of new winter suits have been received at RHINE'S. Call and see them.

Mr. J. W. Robinson came down from Carson last week and remained in town for some days.

There will be vacation in the Independence public school from the day before Christmas until after New Years.

L. A. Anger started for Mojave on Tuesday with the remainder of Mr. Symmes' goods. He will bring back a load of freight.

There is a strong probability that the County will have to stand the expense of another protracted murder trial, the result of bad whisky on a would-be bad man.

During the past two years the Sheriff of Inyo County has collected for licenses and fees over $12,000. This has paid his salary and left over $2,000 to the County.

Sheriff Eldred and George Hall got back from Bakersfield last Tuesday. Elias and R. H. Blake passed through town on their way home on Wednesday.

The Election contest case of Mairs vs. Keegan came up in the Supreme Court on Monday last. On recounting the ballots the result remained just the same as in the election returns, viz. Mairs, 52, Keegan, 51.

Messrs. Horace Bellows, Chas. Pacheco, Ira Brown, Agustus Walker and J. B. LaMar came up from Olancha last Tuesday to attend the remains of their old neighbor, William Walker, to his last resting place.

The case of Manuel Leon, held for murder, was brought up for preliminary examination before John Baxter, J. P., on Wednesday. The defendant being without counsel the hearing was postponed until the 6th of January.

A Christmas tree was given the children of Independence by the Sunday School, under the direction of Mrs. I. J. Woodin. The exercises were held in the church and consisted of singing and recitations, followed by Santa Claus. The little ones enjoyed themselves thoroughly.

The Grand Inaugural Ball on New Years eve is to be the affair of the season. The management is in the hands of the Silver Cornet Band, and the boys make it a point of honor to render all their affairs a complete success. The band will play on the street at 8 p. m., and the Grand March will positively begin at 8:30 o'clock. Tickets are now on sale at the business houses in town.

Death of William Walker.

William Walker died at his home at Olancha last Monday at 7 o'clock p. m., after a lingering illness. On his return from Independence last September, where he had been attending the Democratic Convention, he was taken ill and confined to his room until his death. Mr. Walker came to California in 1850 and located in Sierra County, where he remaiund until 1873, when he came to Inyo County. Early in 1874 he moved his family here, and his home has been at Olancha for seventeen years. As "Pap Walker" he was known to nearly every one in the County. He was a man of genial, kindly nature, and possessed an exceedingly warm heart. Hosts of friends will unite with the bereaved family in lamenting the death of "Pap". The remains were brought to Independence last Tuesday for interment and the funeral ceremonies took place on Wednesday under the auspices of the Masonic fraternity. The deceased leaves a widow and six children to mourn his loss. One daughter, Mrs. John Mason, lives in Sierra County, another, Mrs. Pike, in Maine, and the other children were with him at the time of his death.

BAKERSFIELD CORRESPONDENCE.

THE ELLIOTT CASE.

The Elliott case was called in the Superior Court of Kern County on Tuesday. December 9th. Seventy jurors had been summoned; when all of these had been examined five had been accepted by the case. A new venire of twenty was ordered. From these three were chosen, and a third venire of forty jurors was ordered. The last one of the forty was accepted and made the twelfth juror, as three had already been taken from the same venire. This was on Tuesday afternoon, just eight days after the trial had been opened. As on both of the former trials, John Kenney was the first witness called by the prosecution. Mr. E. Crocker was the next witness and then followed Sam Spratt, O. Allerton, A. G. McAffee, E. Smith, J. Tracey, Milton Crocker, Miss Angie McDonald and Mrs. Baker. The examination of these witnesses, direct and cross, took up the time till Court took recess for the day on Friday afternoon. At the beginning of the trial Judge Arick was sick and at the time of ordering recess on Friday afternoon was very much exhausted and suffering severely from pain and weakness. Next morning he was unable to attend Court, and nothing was done in the trial that day. For several days prior to this the Judge himself had felt apprehensive that he would not be able to finish the trial, and an effort was made to get some other Judge to serve. Nine different Judges were applied to, but all were occupied with cases in their own Courts, and none of them could come. At last the Governor was asked to appoint some Judge to try the case, and at this writing a reply from him is waited for.

During all this time Elliott walks about, a free man, apparently no more affected by his crime or its consequences than the ministers of the different churches of Bakersfield. Yesterday four men accused of highway robbery and attempt to commit murder were guarded from jail to a photograph gallery to have their pictures taken in order to aid in their identification. Today a batch of twelve men were guarded along the same street by the Sheriff and his assistants to a barber's shop. From the appearance of the strong guards, and the jaded and worn appearance of the twelve guarded men, a stranger might readily have supposed that they were as desperate criminals as the men who on the previous day had been taken by the same guard to have their pictures taken for the "rogue's gallery." But the twelve were not accused of any other crime than that of being law-abiding citizens and tax-payers of Kern County, condemned to be jurors for the trial of W. T. C. Elliott, who cut the heart of John B. White with a butcher knife and doesn't deny it. Mr. Elliott could sit on a rocking chair with his heels up on the hotel window sill, enjoying his cigar and watch the procession of captives who had been chosen to try him as they passed by under guard. Our criminal laws are fearfully and wonderfully made, and under them all must quake in terror who are liable to jury duty, or who may be so unfortunate as to be in a County where a murder is committed. For it matters not if a person knows nothing whatever about the facts of a murder; the accused can have any number of people he pleases to name subpœnaed to another County, taken hundreds of miles away from their homes, kept away for weeks at a time, entailing great expense upon them and perhaps ruining their business. Under the practice of our Courts in criminal cases there is mercy for every body but the law-abiding. The act of Elliott has already cost the people of Inyo a very large sum, and still the expense keeps piling up, and the end cannot yet be seen.

[The latest news received is to the effect that the jury failed to agree upon a verdict, standing 8 for acquittal, 4 for conviction, and were discharged. The county is at the very least mulcted in the sum of $10,000 and we now stand just where we did at the conclusion of the previous trial.]

AROUND BAKERSFIELD.

A thick fog prevailed over Kern Valley when the people from Inyo arrived at Bakersfield. This prevailed till last evening nearly two weeks. Fog is something the people of Inyo are not used to, and this chilled all of them entirely through, making them creep about with rounded shoulders noses blue and frequently blowing, and with bodies bent like boys who had eaten sour apples. This morning the sun shone out clear and and everything indicates that spring is at hand. Today parties of the witnesses drove out to Mr. W. B. Carr's place at Bellevue, eight miles distant from Bakersfield. There, orange trees are laden with fruit, roses of many kinds are in bloom, geraniums, mignonette and many other kinds of flowers are blooming as if it were mid-summer, instead of the Christmas holidays. The fields are green with young grass and grain. Herds of cattle and horses are resting drowsily among the trees and the whole scene looks as if Oberon and Titania and all the train of attending fairies might hold their revels there tonight as if it were "A Midsummer Night's Dream." Evidently a great deal of business is done at Bakersfield; there are many large business houses and all appear to be doing considerable business. Hotels are full and yet there appears to be hotel buildings enough for a town of much larger size. The "Southern," where your correspondent is quartered, is a large and beautiful building. It was first opended for business last October. The proprietor told your correspondent yesterday that he has lately been forced several times to refuse guests because he could not accommodate them. All the other hotels are full and many people find rooms in different parts of town and board at restaurants. Bakersfield has long had an unenviable reputation as the haunt of rough and lawless characters. It would appear that this is not unlescved. Last Wednesday evening the County Treasurer, Mr. T. A. Baker, when on his way from his house to his place of business, was attacked by a party of robbers. One of them suddenly grasped Mr. Baker about the neck from behind and tried to choke him. The others attacked him in front and tried to rob him. Mr. Baker, fortunately, had a pistol with which he fired back over his own shoulder putting two bullets into the robber behind him. Another robber seized the pistol and managed to get it from Mr. Baker and then attempted to shoot him. The bullet just grazed the back of his head. The pistol shots attracted other citizens to the place and the robbers fled. The one who was shot was conveyed to the Hospital where his wounds were dressed. He died next night. Four men are now in jail under suspicion of being assailants of Mr. Baker. Haggin and Carr for years past have employed large numbers of men on their immense tracts of land near Bakersfield. These men were without families or homes and as they earned good wages and spent their money foolishly, this attracted many bad characters of both sexes to the place. Now the vast estate is being divided up into small tracts, and sold to settlers. Already several colonies are located. The Illinois, the Indiana and English colonies contain many families each, and all are steadily increasing. Where a year or so ago there were only large camps of men engaged in making canals and other work, now there are homes inhabited by women and children. Nearly all of these new people are church going people, Sunday schools are already established and preaching and other religious services are held every Sunday. With mothers and children came the Sunday school and prayer meeting, home and all its civilizidg and holy influences, and when these come the rough element go, and what is even better, not a few are redeemed from evil courses and restored to society as useful members. The best way to destroy evil characters is to convert them to decency. Strong proofs of the lessening influences of evil characters here is found in the following fact: A few days ago three men belonging to the Salvation Army arrived here and begun their peculiar work. Every evening they march through the streets. One plays a cornet, another a guitar, and the third a zither. They attract large crowds, sing, pray and exhort. After leaving the street they go to a large hall and here meetings are held every evening. In no church in the land do congregations behave with more decorum. An earnest spirit seems to pervade the meetings, and men and women of respectability and intelligence take part in them. Not the slightest annoyance is offered to the Salvation men upon the streets or in the hall, and this is very creditable to the town. The streets of Bakersfield are being much improved. There is a good sewage system, the water supply is abundant and of good quality, the town is supplied with electric lights and gas. Within a very few years Bakersfield will have a population of at least fifteen thousand people. The land, water and climate are here to induce settlers. There is an abundance of capital and energy, skill and influence to bring the settlers. Those already here have demonstrated the ease and certainty of making homes and achieving success and therefore the rapid increase of population and wealth are certainties. Some facts and statistics, pertaining to this subject may be given on another occasion.

A Foul Murder.

Last Sunday afternoon the body of "Little Maggie", a well known Indian woman, was found lying near the M.E. church. Her clothing was saturated with blood, and a large pool had formed about her head. The poor creature's throat had been cut from ear to ear, completely severing all the arteries. It is supposed that the fiendish crime was committed early Saturday evening. Maggie was a woman of far brighter intelligence than the average of her race. She spoke English fluently, the result of constant intercourse among whites. She was aged about thirty years and had worked in the various households at Independence since early childhood. The coroner's jury met on Monday and adjourned until Tuesday. The object of the adjournment was to await the arrival of Manuel Leon, who was arrested on suspicion. An Indian known as "Bill" was examined at length and his testimony was very clear. A number of other witnesses were called on the stand and their evidence taken. After retiring to deliberate a short time the jury returned the following

VERDICT.

We, the undersigned, the jurors summoned to appear before Thomas Parker, the Coroner of the County of Inyo, at the Court House at the town of Independence, on the 23d day of December 1890, to inquire into the cause of the death of an Indian woman named Maggie, having been duly sworn according to law and having made such inquisition after inspecting the body and hearing the testimony adduced, upon our oaths, each and all do say that we find the deceased was named Maggie, was an Indian aged about 35 years, that she came to her death by having her throat cut with a knife in the hands of some person to us unknown; and we further find that from the evidence, in our opinion, we believe the knife or instrument was in the hands of one Manuel Leon.

All of which we duly certify by this inquisition in writing, by us signed this 23d day of December, 1890.

WM. H. HUFF, Prop'r

Copyright, 1890.

A departure from ordinary methods has long been adopted by the makers of Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery. They know what it can do—and they guarantee it. Your money is promptly returned, if it fails to benefit or cure in all diseases arising from torpid liver or impure blood. No better terms could be asked for. No better remedy can be had. Nothing else that claims to be a blood-purifier is sold in this way—because nothing else is like the "G. M. D."

So positively certain is it in its curative effects as to warrant its makers in selling it, as they are doing, through druggists, on trial!

It's especially potent in curing Tetter, Salt-rheum, Eczema, Erysipelas, Boils, Carbuncles, Sore Eyes, Goitre, or Thick Neck, and Enlarged Glands, Tumors and Swellings. Great Eating Ulcers rapidly heal under its benign influence. World's Dispensary Medical Association, 663 Main Street, Buffalo, N. Y.

FIGHTING DEATH.

The Awful Experience of Several Californians.

The saving of lives is the work undertaken by the new institution, the Cosmopolitan Dispensary, of San Francisco. They have gotten together the greatest array of medical and surgical talent ever brought to the Pacific Coast, and the wonderful cures they have already accomplished are marvelous. Mr. A. Astorg, living in Marin County, Cal., near San Rafael, was taken to them on crutches, and two weeks later was able to walk. "They saved my life," he wrote to the San Francisco papers. Mrs. S. G. Smith, of 1705 Market street, San Francisco, was dying when she was taken to them. She was given up by six physicians. She said to a reporter a month later: "If it had not been for the Cosmopolitan Dispensary I would have been in my grave to-day." Mr. Wm. P. Kane, of 1713 Post St., Mrs. M. J. McManus, 814 Jessie St., Chas. Hempler, 502 Davis Street, David Williams, 379 Shotwell St., Alex. Wood, 505 Seventh St., P. A. Anderson, 1390½ Stockton St., L. M. D. Wright, 1324 Florida St., and any number of others of San Francisco have been cured by them.

There is not a disease under the sun that they cannot treat. Young, middle aged, or old men who are suffering from the awful effects of follies and excesses have been restored to perfect health, manhood and vigor. The institution has proved a great boon to those unfortunates out of the city suffering from private diseases. They are treated successfully by mail, and the utmost secrecy is preserved. They diagnose, examine, and give their opinion of cases free. Hundreds are being treated by mail successfully. A letter explaining a case may save many thousands of dollars and years of suffering and perhaps a life. A letter to any of the ladies and gentlemen whose names are mentioned above would bring a reply substantiating their printed statements. Sufferers from Rheumatism, Asthma, Consumption, Catarrh, Dyspepsia, Indigestion, Scrofula, Female Weakness, Seminal Weakness, Cancer, Heart Disease, Bronchitis, Eruptions, Salt Rheum, Baldness, Tape-Worms, Deafness, any Sexual Diseases, Lost Manhood, Malaria, Urinary Troubles, Piles, Bowel Troubles or any other disease, should write and obtain their opinion and advice. It will cost nothing. It would be best to note the address, Cosmopolitan Dispensary, Stockton, Ellis and Market streets, San Francisco, Cal. FORGETTING WRONGS.

Some grave their wrongs on marble; he, more just,
Stoop'd down serene and wrote them on the dust;
Trod under foot, the sport of every wind,
Swept from the earth and blotted from his mind;
There, secret in the grave, he bade them lie,
And grieved they could not escape the Almighty's eye.

—Dr. S. Madden.

"MAN OR DEMON."

It is nearly forty years since all Paris was flocking to see Frederic Lemaitre in a certain grisly melodrama bearing the above title. Parisian dramatists have always had a leaning to the ghastly in melodrama, and Parisian audiences have encouraged that inclination, as witness "La Tour de Nesle," "L'Hotel de la Tete Noire," and a good many other plays of the grisly order; but this psychological mystery called "Man or Demon" was a new departure in the morbid and the ghastly, and the auditorium of the Ambigu Comique thrilled and shuddered as one man at the performance of the great Frederic. There was a touch of the supernatural in the play. The damatist and the actor had adapted the old machinery of "Les Pilules du Diable" to tragical uses.

The story of the play was simple; the plot turned upon one ghastly pivot—demoniac possession. A physician, a man of science and enlightenment, refined, intellectual, of blameless life and gracious bearing, beloved and respected by the world he adorned, was possessed by devils. In the broad light of day, in the exercise of his profession, in society, he was his own man, all went well with him; but with night and solitude the demon came and took possession of his victim, and impelled him to deeds of blood.

Through the darkened theatre there thrilled a silent horror that held the crowded audience spellbound, as the man of science flung a handful of powder into his crucible, and, in the lurid light that rose around him, was seen the awful change from man to monster. The tall, slim figure of the physician, graceful and elegant in his neat evening dress, swelled to gigantic dimensions, brawny, muscular, the form of a savage Hercules, while the fashionable modern dress changed to the blue blouse and blood red cap of the sansculotte. The face changed, too; the pale, refined features thickened, the brows grew penthouse-like above the lurid gleam of the malignant eyes; while, with a cry that had nothing in it of humanity, the transformed creature rushed forth to revel in rapine and murder.

Needless to expatiate upon the action of the play. The later scenes reeked with blood, the whole scheme of the drama was baseless and wild; but the glamour of Lemaitre's genius held the audience in a state of breathless interest, which flagged not till the fall of the curtain. The play was the greatest success the Ambigu had known for many years.

One fact gave an additional and extraneous interest to the performance. Those who knew the celebrities of the city were able to recognize the curious and startling likeness which Lemaitre, in his make up as the physician, had contrived to present to one of the princes of modern science, Marc Avalon, the celebrated chemist—a man who, at something less than 40 years of age, had reached the very pinnacle of professional success, who had given laws to science, and had made discoveries which had advanced the progress of chemical experiment further in his twenty years of labor than his predecessors had done within a century. So striking was the resemblance as to be at once perceived and remarked upon, both at the first performance of the play and in the public press. It was even thought that Marc Avalon would take offense at this appropriation of his outward semblance, and possibly make it the subject of a lawsuit; but the great chemist seemed amused, and even flattered, when he read the comments of the critics upon this particular feature of Lemaitre's characterization. He went to see the play—was interested; went again—saw Lemaitre in his dressing room, and made various suggestions, which intensified the grim realism of the scene in the laboratory.

It was observed by and by that Avalon was present nearly every night during some period of the performance. He generally occupied one particular avant scene and kept himself perdu, but those few persons who were able to see his face, as he sat in the shadow of the curtain, remarked upon its intent expression and the keen delight he seemed to derive from the actor's masterly embodiment of a most unreal character.

It was during the run of this play that Paris was startled by a series of murders more hideous than any crime that had shocked society during the reign of the citizen-king; murders which bore a horrible resemblance in being to all appearance motiveless, and the work of a monster whose sole desire was to steep himself in the blood of an unoffending victim. Once, twice, thrice, within a period of less than three months was the city horrified by a revolting act of butchery; once in the Rue Ste. Marguerite, where a wretched inhabitant of that human shambles was found stretched in the gutter, weltering in her blood; another in the Rue de la Vieille Lanterne; a third in the Rue des Feves.

Paris and the police of Paris were on the alert, looking for the Chourineur. It was by that grim name the murderer was talked of in those circles where slang is the only language. Day after day the journalists of the gutter announced that the Chourineur had been heard of and conversed with here or there; had eaten or drank in this or that restaurant, from the Bocher de Cancale to the Chat Noir. The whole flight of canards were on the wing, and every morning and evening there was a new one let fly upon Paris; but those who knew anything at all about the matter knew that, so far, the police were at fault. No trace, no clew, no hint of the Chourineur had yet been obtained. Cauler, the chief of the secret guardians of the public safety, had worked till he was weary; weary of his own false lights and failures; wearier of other people's futile and sometimes idiotic suggestions. He was sitting in the April twilight before a café on the Boulevard des Italiens, not many doors from the Ambigu theatre, sitting alone at one of the little marble tables, taking his demi-tasse after a temperate dinner, and listening idly to the conversations around and about him. He was off duty, resting a jaded brain, yet the old habit of listening and putting two and two together at all times and in all places was so strong upon him that his ear was on the alert unconsciously, and his brain soon awakened to interest in the talk of two men at a table near his own.

They were of the flaneur species both, one young, one middle aged—men who knew their Paris, evidently.

"Here he comes," said the elder man, looking down the boulevard toward the Grand opera. "I felt sure he would pass us before 8 o'clock; he is there every night."

"Not every night, surely?" said the other.

"I have seen the piece at least half a dozen times, and he was in the theatre every time. Men have told me the same thing. It is a kind of mania—a diseased vanity—I suppose. He likes to see himself on the stage—the central figure, the cynosure of every eye."

The man they spoke of approached and passed toward the theatre. Tall, slim, well dressed, with a light coat over his evening suit, pale, with a fixed look about the eyes, a curious mobility about the mouth.

"He looks harassed and ill," said the young man.

"Overwork, brain pressure," said the elder. "I should not be surprised if I were to hear within the next few months that Marc Avalon had gone off his head."

Cauler rose and followed the great chemist into the theatre, followed him to the door of his avant-scene, and then went round the other side of the house, and got a stall from which he could observe the face in the shadow of the curtain as well as the lowered lights would allow.

That idea of this prince of science being on the verge of lunacy had started a curious train of thought in the brain of the skilled detective. He had some time since made up his mind that the murders of the Rue Ste. Marguerite, the Rue de la Vieille Lanterne and the Rue des Feves were the work of the same hand, and that the hand of a homicidal maniac; but it had never occurred to him that these ghastly, motiveless, insane murders might be the reproduction of something shown upon the stage of a Parisian theatre. To-night, for the first time, he, the busy workingman, whose hours were gold, saw the grisly play which all the idlers of Paris had been gloating upon for the last four or five months, and he also saw, or believed that he saw, the germ and suggestion of those strange and bloody assassinations which had convulsed the city.

Such a play, acting upon the prepared mind of an unrevealed lunatic, might inspire a sudden sanguinary impulse, an itching eagerness to taste those sensations and emotions depicted in all their hideousness by the actor. That which was appalling and revolting to sane minds might exercise a morbid fascination upon the insane. The higher the education and the greater the refinement, the deeper might be the descent into crime.

The detective hung about the vestibule till he saw Marc Avalon leave the theatre, and was able to keep him in sight without appearing to follow him. An elderly man, who looked like a doctor, accosted the savant as he went out, and the two men walked along the boulevard together in the clear, mild night as far as Tortoni's, where they went in. Cauler had followed close enough to be able to overhear their conversation, which was upon indifferent subjects. The chemist's friend remarked upon his looking ill and wearied, and remonstrated with him for over agerness in his scientific experiments.

"You are trying to get a quart of water into a pint bottle," he said; "nobody ever succeeded in doing that yet. Take care you don't burst the bottle. There are very few men of your age who have made as great a mark upon the century as you have. Can't you be content to rest upon your laurels?"

"I am not overworking my brain," Avalon answered, doggedly. "You talk to me as if I were an incipient lunatic. Do you see any signs of overwork about me?"

"Yes, several—hurry, pallor, dry lips and a tendency to laugh at things that make other men serious. I am talking to you as your old friend, and with perfect frankness."

"My dear Pignon, this is the common cry when a man devotes himself to his profession and succeeds a little better than his fellow workers. Overstrain, brain work, incipient madness! That is what his friends say about him. Kindly meant, no doubt, but arrant twaddle!"

They went into the cafe, came out again in a quarter of an hour, when Avalon hailed a cab.

The detective followed him in another. The fly deposited him at his own house in the Rue St. Guillaume. Cauler drove to the end of the street, dismissed his cab and went back to Marc Avalon's doorway on foot. The house in which the chemist lived was a fine old mansion in a quadrangular court, dull, dignified, respectable. It was a moonless night, and the court yard was black as Erebus at this hour, save for one lamp which burned dimly over the porte cochere. There was plenty of cover for the detective.

He saw the light of a lamp travel slowly through two rooms upon the second floor and finally settled in a third room.

The external Venetian shutters were closed, but there were no curtains drawn within, and the lamplight shone betwixt the wooden bars.

M. Cauler took up his position in the embrasure of a doorway leading to the offices, an obscure doorway in a corner of the great, grave house, as if he meant to stay there half the night. A curious waste of power, one might suppose, this night watch in the Rue St. Guillaume, but of late Cauler had been wasting much power in hunting will-o' the wisps across the morass of Paris, and one ignis-fatuus is as good as another. To-night it was Cauler's whim to watch the windows of Marc Avalon.

The lamplight continued undisturbed for an hour and a half. The third quarter after 1 tolled heavily from the tower of Notre Dame yonder, and other church chimes repeated the solemn measure. Suddenly those windows on the second floor grew dark. This time the light did not travel from room to room; it was extinguished on the spot.

"The man of science has gone to bed," said Cauler, with a touch of disappointment. "I may go home and get my supper."

He waited some minutes notwithstanding, and, looking up presently, he gave a cry of triumphant surprise.

"Dieu de Dieu! I have hit it this time," he muttered.

There was a light shining through the shutters of those three upper windows—a light more vivid than the shine of the domestic lamp, a fiery crimson glow, such as he had seen in the theatre three hours ago, in the famous laboratory scene. It lasted three or four minutes, and then came darkness again.

This time Cauler had no idea of going home to supper. He writed for the expected opening of door or window.

It came presently; a window on the ground floor was cautiously lifted and a man stepped out into the courtyard—a man wearing a blue blouse and a red cap, a ruffianly looking brute, with big, projecting teeth, like the fangs of a wild beast, and long, coarse black hair, like the hair of a wild beast.

This brutal figure crept stealthily across the yard and out of the porte cochere, Cauler following more stealthily; for in the walk of the blouse there was the overacted caution of the novice, in the walk of the detective there was the subtlety of of the man accustomed to hunt his fellow men.

"This is Blueblouse, whom we have heard of from one lot; this is Redcap, who has been seen by another lot. This is the man."

He followed that creeping figure, slouching across the road, doubling, winding, his hand clutching something in his breast. Cauler followed him from the Rue St. Guillaume to the Quai des Grands Augustins, across one of the bridges to the Cite, from the Cite by another bridge to the region of the markets; never lost sight of him, yet on the way contrived to call in at a station of night police and to enlist a couple of policemen in the chase. The three contrived to keep Blueblouse in sight, wind and double as he might; watched him as he accosted a night wanderer in a dark alley, and saw her fly from him, scared at that grim face and panther teeth under the red cap. They followed him through the intricacies of a labyrinth of squalid streets which has long disappeared; saw him stop to speak to a woman, more wretched perhaps than she who had fled from him half an hour before—saw him bend to speak to her as if in friendliness, then with a sudden clutch fasten one livid hand upon her throat, while the other hand was thrust into his breast.

Quick as they were to spring upon him, they were not an instant too soon. Another second and that long knife would have done its deadly work, as it had done thrice before in the streets of Paris. The Chourineur, the murderer of the Rue Ste. Marguerite, the Rue de la Vieille Lanterne and the Rue des Feves, was found. Yes, this was the solution of the mystery. Homicidal mania, the fatal outcome of a brain wrecked by overwork, day labor and night labor—the too ardent thirst for knowledge, the too keen ambition to achieve. It had needed but a spark to fire the brain, and the spark had been found in the suggestion of the drama at the Ambigu. Marc Avalon had watched and brooded over the play till it had become reality to him, and he had yielded to the irresistible impulse that drove him to act out the idea in his own person.

He died before the end of the year in a state lunatic asylum. In searching his laboratory the police found more than one set of fangs, carved in ivory, which the chemist had laboriously fashioned in imitation of the actor's hideous make-up. It was discovered, too, that he had carried his experiments with the magnesium light, then little known, far beyond the mechanism of the theatre; but confessions made by him later to the doctors of the asylum revealed that he had firmly believed in his possession of occult knowledge by which he was able to assume diabolical attributes and diabolical power.

Cost of Living Abroad.

In England house rent, clothing, and nearly all the commodities of life are cheaper than they are in America. Hotel charges, admission to theatres and railway traveling are exceptions—unless you travel third class. There is talk of abolishing the second class and give people their choice only between first and third. As it is, many of the first class carriages run empty and only encumber the trains. For high charges in French restaurants and hotels there is good reason. New York does not appreciate the great advantages it enjoys in its abundant and cheap market supplies. In Paris three francs per pound (sixty cents) is charged for the same quality of beefsteak which we buy in New York for thirty cents. Good coffee in Paris costs the same price per pound, three francs.

They grow some fruits in France and England that we don't raise in the north, but on the whole the fruits of these two countries will not compare in abundance and flavor with those produced even in our northern states only; and as for grapes and peaches their best specimens are grown under glass, but it must be admitted that no grapes in the world equal for size and beauty the English hot house grapes. English hot house peaches are pretty to the eye, but they lack the juiciness and rich flavor of the American peach and their cost is very great. The nights in England and France are too rainy for the favorable production of fine fruits in the open air. Retail dealers over there instead of selling vegetables and fruit in our rough-and-tumble way, by measure, which by its very uncertainty is unsatisfactory both to seller and buyer, sell them by weight or number, potatoes and apples by the pound, peaches and large "William" pears by the dozen.—"M. P." in Home Journal.

The Bulls of Spain.

This allusion to los toros naturally led to my asking the impresario if the breeds had not degenerated.

"Los toros degenerated," he exclaimed, "Dios mio, son tan bravos como siempre, los angelistos (our bulls, good God, sir, they are as brave as ever, the little angels)! One would think you had never seen a bull fight. We have splendid breeds in Northern Spain, in Castile and in Andalusia. The Navarrese bulls of Larriquiri are the smallest, but they are powerful and terribly quick and agile. They have a knack of jumping over the barriers into the sort of promenade that runs round the ring between the seats of the public and the ring itself, and have often leaped up, as they did at Vitoria two years ago, right in the midst of the lower seats, los tendidos, and caused frightful panics thereby.

"A Navarro bull costs from $250 to $300, to which sum must be added the cost of carriage and many incidental expenses that increase 20 per cent. the original price. The Castilian bulls are very good and cost from $350 to $450, exclusive of incidental expenses. The most famous breeds in Castile are those of Colmenar, a few leagues from Madrid, in fine pasture lands, where you can go and pick out the animals while grazing—that is, if you are a good rider, for they are sure to chase any outsider they espy."—Madrid Cor. Philadelphia Times.

Living Entirely on Meat.

Dr. T. W. Greene, writing to an English journal from Montevideo, says that fresh meat forms the staple article of diet in a part of the province of Buenos Ayres, where he lived for four years. Vegetables and fruit were unknown except for one month in the autumn, bread could not be had, and biscuits and farina, a meal made from mandioca, were too expensive for the poor. The population live entirely on meat, and drink nothing but the mate de yerba, a bitter kind of herb, containing the same active principle as tea and coffee. It is not uncommon for a man to eat four or five pounds of meat at a meal; but Dr. Greene thinks it contains less fibrine and albumen, and more salts and water, than English meat. He never knew a case of scurvy, or anything like it, during the four years he practiced amongst the inhabitants.—Boston Budget.

Life on the Rail.

Conductor of a Dining Car—Yes, I get pretty tired of this sort of life. The worst part about it is the uncertainty. When I say good-by to my wife and babies I never know when I shall meet them again. I don't mean what you think I mean—death by accident. A railroad man soon gets over that. It has to. The constant fear of that sort of thing would make a man crazy. What I refer to is this: I left Cedar Rapids one morning. I expected to be in Chicago by 2:30 p. m. An accident to a freight train up the road caused us a delay of several hours. Now, I get a telegram telling me to drop this dining car at a certain point, and to go back with it on the next train. That sort of thing is liable to happen on every run I make for a week, and I may not see my family for that time or longer. A railroad man never knows what orders he is going to get. I have got home, that is to the station where my home is, often, and just as I was starting to my house I have received orders to take somebody else's run, and had to do it before I had time to go see my family. We may not have as hard a time of it as some, but don't you get it into your head that we sleep on beds of roses and never have anything to worry us.—Chicago Tribune.

The death rate among the Indians who aim to live like white people is three times that of those who continue to live a semi-wild life. The Pawnee tribe has lost more men by lung troubles in the last ten years than they lost in battle during the previous thirty.

WHAT CURES?

Editorial Difference of Opinion on an Important Subject.

What is the force that ousts disease; and which is the most convenient apparatus for applying it? How far is the regular physician useful to us because we believe in him, and how far are his pills and powders and tonics only the material representatives of his personal influence on our health?

The regular doctors cure; the homœopathic doctors cure; the Hahnemannites cure; and so do the faith cures and the mind cures, and the so-called Christian scientists, and the four-dollar-and-a-half advertising itinerants, and the patent medicine men. They all hit, and they all miss, and the great difference—one great difference—in the result is that when the regular doctors lose a patient no one grumbles, and when the irregular doctors lose one the community stands on end and howls.—Rochester Union and Advertiser.

Nature cures, but nature can be aided, hindered or defeated in the curative process. And the Commercial's contention is that it is the part of rational beings to seek and trust the advice of men of good character who have studied the human system and learned, as far as modern science lights the way, how far they can aid nature and how they can best avoid obstructing her.—Buffalo Commercial.

It is not our purpose to consider the evils that result from employing the unscrupulous, the ignorant, charlatans and quacks to prescribe for the maladies that afflict the human family. We simply declare that the physician who knows something is better than the physician who knows nothing, or very little indeed about the structure and conditions of the human system. Of course "he does not know it all."—Rochester Morning Herald.

I have used Warner's Safe Cure and, but for its timely use, would have been, I verily believe, in my grave from what the doctors termed Bright's Disease.—D. F. Shriner, Senior Editor Scioto Gazette, Chillicothe, Ohio, in a letter dated June 30, 1890.

"Papa, why do they call this census report a rough count?" "Because it has not been filed yet, my son."

THE RESULT OF MERIT.

When anything stands a test of fifty years among a discriminating people like the Americans, it is pretty good evidence that there is merit somewhere. The value of a medicine is best proved by its continued use from year to year by the same persons and families, as well as by a steady increasing sale. Few, if any, medicines have met with such continued success and popularity as has marked the introduction and progress of BRANDRETH'S PILLS, which, after a trial of over fifty years, are conceded to be the safest and most effectual purgative introduced to the public.

That this is the result of merit, and that BRANDRETH'S PILLS actually perform all that is claimed for them, is conclusively proved by the fact that those who regard them with the greatest favor are those who have used them the longest.

BRANDRETH'S PILLS are sold in every drug and medicine store, either plain or sugar-coated.

THE BUCCANEERS OF OLD

Flaunted the skull and cross bones, their ensign, defiantly at the masthead. Your modern pirate, not on the high seas, but upon the high reputation of standard remedies skulks under various disguises. His hole and corner traffic has never to any degree affected Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, although that standard invigorant and corrective has long been the shining mark at which his shafts have been directed. Cheap local bitters, composed of fiery unrectified stimulants, with an infusion, or extract possibly, of some tonic bark, are still sometimes recommended as identical with, or similar to, or possessing virtues kindred to those of America's chosen family medicine. These perish speedily, while the great subduer and preventive of disease pursues its successful career, overcoming malaria, dyspepsia, nervousness, kidney troubles, constipation and rheumatic ailments, not only on this, but on many continents.

DR. LIEBIG'S WONDERFUL German Invigorator

To Prove its Wonderful Power and Superiority, A $1 Bottle will be given or Sent Free on application, personally or by letter.

Every one knows that Brown-Sequard's Veritable Elixir of Life was a failure, and that Dr. Liebig's Invigorator is the original and only genuine Vital Elixir.

THE REASON THOUSANDS CANNOT GET CURED of Chronic, Private, Special Complaints, Nervous Debility, Unnatural Waste, Loss of Memory and Manhood, Liver, Lung, Bladder, Kidney and Stomach Troubles, Impurities of the Blood, Pimples, Sores and other Skin Diseases, is owing to a complication called Prostatorrhœa with Hypersthesia, which requires special treatment.

DR. LIEBIG'S INVIGORATOR No. 1 is the only positive cure for above diseases uncomplicated with Prostatorrhœa. No. 2 cures Prostatorrhœa. Price of Invigorator, $2; case of six bottles, $10; half-size bottles, half price. Books to men free.

DR. LIEBIG & CO. for nearly a quarter of a century have made a specialty of Diseases of Men. Disease, however induced, speedily, thoroughly cured; recent cases in a few days; inveterate cases skillfully treated; charges moderate.

Consultation Free. Call or address, 400 Geary Street, San Francisco, Cal. Private entrance, 405 Mason Street.

CAUTION. Avoid packages of poisonous nostrums, whose makers are as unskillable and unskillful as they are unscrupulous, guaranteeing cures for $5, or offering to refund. Don't be deceived—get DR. LIEBIG'S INVIGORATOR.
